"(25) It is not againſt right, moſt noble Earle, "that the honor of this daies ſeruice, and firſt aſſault, "ſhould be permitted vnto you, in regard of the "greatneſſe both of your deſcent, and your martiall "atchieuement; but yet, if Deſcent be ſtood on, "I my ſelfe am both the ſonne, and nephew, of a "mightie King; if Valour, heere now are many of "choiſeſt worth, of whom none liuing can challenge "precedence for proweſſe. But other reaſon ought "now to ſway. For ſith the King, contrarie to his "Oath made to my Siſter, impiouſly vſurped the "Kingdome, he hath made a confuſion of all things, "both in cauſing the bloud of many thouſands to "be ſpilt, and in making many Owners (as himſelfe was) of that which was not their owne, by de-"priuing other of their rightfull inheritance: Theſe "therefore thus diſherized, ought of right (in aſſu-"rance of helpe from their righteous Iudge and re-"uenger) giue firſt aſſault on their vnrighteous op-"preſſor; and God who juſtly judgeth his people, "will (doubtleſſe) looke downe from his heauenly "habitation, and will not leaue vs ſuccour-leſſe, "whiles in a juſt cauſe, wee impugne a moſt vnjuſt "Intruder. And conſider farther with "mee, what kinde of Captaines they haue: Firſt, A-"laine Duke of Britaine, he comes armed, not againſt "you, but God himſelfe, a furious perſon, ſpotted "with all filth of ſinne, in malice vnmatchable, who "thinkes it his greateſt diſhonour, to ſee any man ex-"cell him in crueltie: With him commeth the trea-"cherous Earle Robert Mellent, the very craftes-ma-"ſter of fraud, in whoſe heart dwels impiety, guile "in his mouth, cowardize in his actions; high of "minde, vaine-glorious in words, degenerous in per-"formance; laſt in the fight, firſt in the flight. Next, "comes Hugh By-god, his name neerely ſounding his "perjurie; who thought it not ſufficient to breake "his Oath with the Empreſſe, but that hee muſt be "once again forſworne (as all the world doth know) "that Henry at his death bequeathed the Crowne "vnto Stephen, to the prejudice of his owne daugh-"ter; a man (in a word) who accounts Treacherie "a Vertue, and Periurie a courtly quality. The Battles ioine

(28) A ſore battaile was fought, and with equall ſucceſſe a long time maintained: for the band of the diſherited, whoſe particular wrongs whetted their courage, (and were therefore politiquely placed in the front) brake terribly into the Kings Vaunt-gard, and contrariwiſe William of Ypres into the Welſh, vntill the Foreward of the Kings Horſemen beganne to ſhrinke backe, and (not without ſuſpition of Treaſon) galloped away; when preſently the Earle of Cheſter encountred the Kings battaile of foote, in whoſe ſtrength he repoſed moſt truſt; but it being ouer-laide with Aſſailants, beganne alſo to faint and to flie, leauing the King enraged, both with his friends faint-heartedneſſe, and with his foes ſucceſſe. A very ſtrange ſight it was, (ſaith Paris) there to behold King Stephen, left almoſt alone in the field, yet no man daring to approach him, whiles grinding his teeth, and foaming like a furious wild Boare, he draue backe with his battle-axe whole troupes aſſayling him, and maſſacring the chiefeſt of them, to the eternall renowne of his courage: If but a hundred ſuch had there bin with him, a whole Army had neuer bin able to ſurprize his perſon: yet as he was ſingle, he held out, till firſt his Battle-axe brake, and after that, his ſword alſo, with the force of his vnreſiſtable ſtrokes, flew in peeces; and he now weaponleſſe, and (by an vnknowne, doubtleſſe an vn-noble hand) ſtricken downe with a great ſtone throwne at him, was ſeized on by William of * Kahames, a moſt ſtout Knight, and by Earle Roberts commaund, preſerued from any violence to his perſon, was carried priſoner vnto Maud the Empreſſe at Glouceſter, and thence was ſent bound vnto Briſtow, where in the Caſtle he remained in ſafe cuſtody.

(29) The Empreſſe hauing thus got the Lion in her hold, triumphed not a little in her owne fortune, and now as ſole Soueraigne of Englands Monarchie, commaunded all buſineſſe, elected her Councellors, and beſtowed many dignities, where ſhe moſt fauoured. (30) But the Empreſſe conducted in State to Wincheſter, had the Regall Crowne of the Kingdome there deliuered her; no man more forward then Henry the Biſhop, and Brother of Stephen, who vpon the vowing to be ruled by his aduiſe in affaires of Eſtate, being then the Popes Legate, ſolemnely in a Synode of the Clergie, accurſed all ſuch as withſtood the Empreſſe, and bleſſed all them that aſſiſted her intereſt: but both hee, and his friends forgot not to adde that wonted trayterous clauſe of their oath, ſo long to keepe faith to her, as ſhee kept her Couenants with them: and ſo with applauſe of the people, ſhee came to London, and after much perſwaſion and mediation (for that the Citizens were very ſtiffe againſt her) was receiued into the City with a roiall Proceſſion.

The Empreſſe receiued into London.

(31) Neither was King Stephen thus defeated of England onely, but Normandy alſo caſt off the yoake of ſubjection: for Geffrey of Anion, husband of the Empreſſe, hauing ſome intelligence of this atchieued victorie, induced the Normans to incline vnto him, by publiſhing the captiuation of Stephen, vnable now to relieue them, or himſelfe; and Dauid King of Scotland for his part was not behinde, to ſet forward the claime of Lady Maud, aſſuming in her behalfe the County of Northumberland.

(32) Maud thus eſtabliſhed, all now eſteemed her as Fortunes deare-darling, and beheld her as their onely riſing-Sunne; the Priſon-walles ouerſhadowing the Preſence, feature, and fauours of the now-dejected vnfortunate Stephen, whoſe ſorrowfull wife Queen Maud, inceſſantly ſollicited the Empreſſe in her Husbands behalfe, deſiring his liberty, but not his Crowne, which hee was now contented to let her enjoy; and thereunto offered for pledges many great perſons, who proteſted for him to the Empreſſe, that hee thenceforth would deuote himſelfe vnto God, and either become a Monke or a Pilgrime: Henrie of Wincheſter alſo became a ſuiter vnto her in the behalfe of his Nephew Euſtace, King Stephens ſonne, that the * Counties belonging before to the Father, might be conferred vpon the ſonne.

(33) The Londoners likewiſe hauing receiued her into the Citie as their Lady, thought now (as moſt doe with new Princes) they might haue what they would aske, and became her importunate Suppliants, that the ouer-hard Lawes impoſed by her Father, might now be remitted, and thoſe of King Edward might wholly be in force. But ſhee rejected all theſe Petitioners, out of Pride, ſay ſome; but it may ſeeme rather of policy, holding it ſafeſt, to paſſe affaires of importance, not vpon intreaty, but by due aduice, and to gouerne the ſubiect with a ſeuere auſtereneſſe, rather then an indulgent lenitie. But this too regular ſtrictneſſe, which might haue done well in a ſetled gouernement, in this her yet greene, and vnſecured eſtate, prooued not ſo behouefull. For firſt, Queene * Maude ſent to her ſonne Euſtace, that their ſuites muſt bee obtained onely by warre; willing him to make ſtrong his partie by the aſſiſtance of the Kentiſh: the Nobles likewiſe, Stephens vnder-takers repined, that they were ſo ſlightly regarded, or rather rejected: and the Londoners alſo ſtorming at the repulſe of their deſires, deuiſed how they might take the Empreſſe their Priſoner, and ſo redeeme King Stephen, to whom their affections were euer firme: but ſhee hearing of their conſpiracie, fled ſecretly in the night, and tooke into Oxford, which in all her difficulties ſhee euer found true vnto her, out of their loue, both to her cauſe, and to her Father; and threatning due reuenge for her late wrongs, wrought it vpon the Nobles in priſon, and (more then was due or decent) vpon Stephen himſelfe, whom ſhe commanded to be laden with Irons, and to bee abridged of all princely ſeruices.

(36) Seauen weekes thus ſpent, in this counter-ſiege of the Citie and Caſtle, the Biſhoppe, to deceiue the Empreſſe, commaunded peace to be proclaimed, and the Gates to be ſet open towards euening. The Empreſſe then, who had indured ſuch troubles, and ſo long a reſtraint, greatly deſired to change her lodging, and to recreat her perplexed ſpirits in ſome other place; ſo taking horſe, accompanied with her brother, Reinold Earle of Cornewall, her ſeruants, and many others her friends, beſides Earle Robert, who followed behinde with a troupe of Nobles and Knights; preſently at the Biſhoppes commandment, ſhee was purſued by his Souldiers, and many of her traine wounded and taken priſoners; the Empreſſe by good prouidence eſcaped into the Caſtle of Lutegareſhall, and thence to the Caſtle Dinize: where vnderſtanding that ſhee was ſtill in hazard to be ſurprized, ſhe deuiſed, (as what will not neceſſitie endure, and a womans wit deuiſe?) to be laid in a coffiine as dead, bound faſt with cordes; and ſo, as if it had beene her Corſe, carried in a Horſe-litter to the Citie of Glocester: in which bonds of her owne diſtreſſe, ſhee had good occaſion to remember the chaines of King Stephens captiuitie. To ſuch extreamities were theſe two Princes at the ſelfe-ſame time ſubiect, that whiles they turmoiled for ſpacious Kingdomes, brought themſelues to the very extream wants, of aire, and of elbow-roome; but with ſuch dalliance doth Fortune (wee ſee) oftentimes follow her game, that ſhee maketh euen Monarchs the Balls of her play, and toſſeth them laſtly into the Hazard, whence hardly they eſcape with ſafetie of life. Yet this was not the worſt; for Earle Robert her brother, whileſt hee was buſier in prouiding for her ſafetie then for his owne, was taken by his purſuers at Stoubreg with others; brought backe to Wincheſter, and there preſented by the Biſhop vnto Queene Maude, King Stephens Wife, who committed him to the cuſtodie of William Ypres, and he for more ſafety to Gloceſter; but others taking ſanctuarie in the Nuns Monaſtery of Warwell, were burned together with the place: Thus then the King on the one ſide, and the Earle on the other, were kept in ſafe cuſtodie; but the Queene labouring for the Kings releaſe, and the Counteſſe for the Earle, many Articles were propounded, and many meſſengers imploied: at length, this was thought fitteſt, that Stephen ſhould be reſtored to his Kingdome, and Robert vnder him to haue the whole gouernement of the Land; ſo that both of them ſhould now iointly vphold that, which they (the two Ring-leaders) by oppoſition had caſt downe. But Earle Robert as he was no whit dejected in mind, with any frowne of Fortune whatſoeuer, ſo reſerued hee his fidelity to the Empreſſe vnſtained, and vnmoued either with feare or faire inticements, ſtill refuſing to capitulate for his freedome, but to his Siſters liking; who likewiſe bare ſo braue a mind, that were her ſtate neuer ſo weake, ſhee would not conſent, nor giue the leaſt eare to any compoſition for the Crowne.

(37) Then was enmity increaſed, the Kingdome diuided, and the peoples hatred kindled in mainetaining the factions, all fore-running the ruine of the Land: For theſe two Chief-taines wearied with irkſomneſſe of Irons, and hard impriſonment, made exchange the one for the other, without any farther mention of peace, and ſo ſtudied not onely to renew their former deſignes, but to encreaſe the Lands miſerie by more eager warres. Stephen in England wrought the people for him, and Robert * taking pledges of the Nobles to attend and guard the Empreſſe at Oxford till his returne, went into Normandie to ſolicite Geffrey her husband for her defence. But the Earle hauing troubles with his owne Nobilitie, and the Normans ſcarſly brought to any ſubiection, thought it not conuenient by his owne abſence for a ſtate in hope, to hazard that in hand; and therefore ſent with Robert ſome ſtrength of Armes, and with them his young ſonne Prince Henrie into England.

(39) In the meane while, Earle Robert, with Prince Henrie, were arriued in England at Warrham hauen, and preſently beſieged the Caſtle there, (ſo to withdraw the King from ſiege of his ſiſter;) but hearing of the happie eſcape of the Empreſſe, came with young Henrie vnto his Mother, whoſe ſight made her forget the griefe and ſorrowes that ſhe had long indured. Then was Oxford vpon conditions yeelded to the King; and Wilton fired by the baſtard Earle Robert: The Towre of London, with the Caſtles of Walden, Pleiſes, and Lincolne, yeelded to Stephen; the Caſtles of Warrham, and Portland, yeelded to Robert: The Earles of Cheſter, and Eſſex, ſurprized by the King; William Martell the great fauourite, taken and impriſoned by the Earle. Thus ſundrie yeeres paſſing with variable ſucceſſes to and fro, and euery yeere heaping on each ſide freſh calamities, to the great ruine of the whole land; the Empreſſe, euen wearied with thoſe warres and vncertainties of ſucceſſe, went into Normandie, chuſing rather to be vnder the protection of her husband in peace, then to raigne in England perplexed with troubles: and to the ſame end ſhe had not long before, ſent her young ſonne Henrie to his father, who deſired to haue him rather heire of a Dukedome with ſafetie, then of a Crowne with daily hazard.

(42) Where long he staied not, but that Geffrey his Father departed this life, and left him his Heire both of Anion and Normandy; and the yeere following, hee matched in marriage with Eleanor Dutches of Guien and Aquitane, lately diuorced from Lodowicke King of France for consanguinity, and adultery (saith Paris) after shee had borne him two daughters; Lodowicke fearing issue-male by this marriage, to the dis-heriting of his said daughters, greatly impugned Duke Henry; and Stephen, suspecting his greatnesse, now being Duke of Normandy, Anion, Aquitane and Guien, both of them sought each way to impeach his peace: Lodowicke, with Prince Eustace, in the parts beyond seas, and Stephen in England, to make sure his succession, sought to inuest the said Prince Eustace with the English Diademe; both to preuent, and vtterly to depriue Henry Fitz-Empresse for euer: for calling a Counsell at London, King Stephen commaunded Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury to consecrate Prince Eustace for their King; which hee refused to doe, and that by commandement from the Pope (whose holy See can deale on both sides, as makes most for their aduantage) alledging now, that his Father was an vsurper, and perjured Intruder: whereupon the honest Archbishop fled into Normandy, and the King seized vpon all his possessions. It may seeme, that one cause of the Popes inclining to young Henries title, was to strengthen him against his enemy King Lewis of France, who had highly offended his Holines, for casting the Popes Bulles (whereby hee required the fruits of Vacancies of all Cathedrall Churches in France) into the fire, saying, hee had rather the Popes Bulls should rost in the fire, then his owne soule should frie in hell.

But Henry after hee had calmed the boisterous stormes of warre, in the parts beyond the seas, came ouer into England well appointed, vnto whom also resorted many of the Nobility, who yeelded vp themselues, and aboue thirty strong Castles to the young Duke; now well furnished, hasted to raise the siege of Wallingford, and there vndertooke a great enterprize; for hee incircled the Besiegers with a great and deepe Trench, whereby hee kept them from relieue, as they did keepe the Besieged.

With these and the like allegations, at last Stephen began to bend, & a parley for peace was signified vnto the Duke. Henry already warme for the battaile, and his thoughts fixed on nothing lesse then peace, could hardly moderate his youthfull affections; yet at his friends importunity, hee yeelded to conferre with King Stephen.

(45) The place for conference was so appointed, that the Riuer Thamesis parted the presence of these two Princes; so that from either banke they saluted each others, and after a long conference, agreeing on a truce, and vpon faire tearmes of amity departed, commanding all weapons and attempts of warre to be laid aside.

Hee married Conſtance ſiſter of Lewis the ſeuenth King of France, daughter of King Lewis the Groſſe: who afterward was re-married to Raimond the third, Earle of Tholouze: for Euſtace died before her, without Iſſue by her, the tenth day of Auguſt, in the eighteenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of Grace, 1152. (53) William, the third and yongeſt ſonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud, married Iſabel daughter and heire of William Warren, the third Earle of Surrey, with whom he had that Earledome, he was in his Fathers life time Earle of Surrey, Lord of Norwich, and Peuenſey in England, Earle of Mortayne, and Lord Eagle of Normandy. After his fathers death, King Henry the ſecond made him Knight, reſumed thoſe things that he held of the Crowne, reſtored him to all that his Father held before hee was King. And ſo he was Earle of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortaine, and being with him in his iourney to Tholouze, died without iſſue, in his returne homeward, in the Moneth of October, the ſeuenth of King Henries raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 1160.

(54) Maud, the eldeſt daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was borne before her father was King, in the raigne of King Henry the firſt, her vncle; in whoſe time alſo ſhee deceaſed, being but young, (though ſome report ſhee was wife to the Earle of Millen) and was enterred at London, with her brother Baldwin, in the Priorie of the Trinity aforeſaid, then commonly called Chriſts-Church, and now lately named the Dukes-Place within Algate.

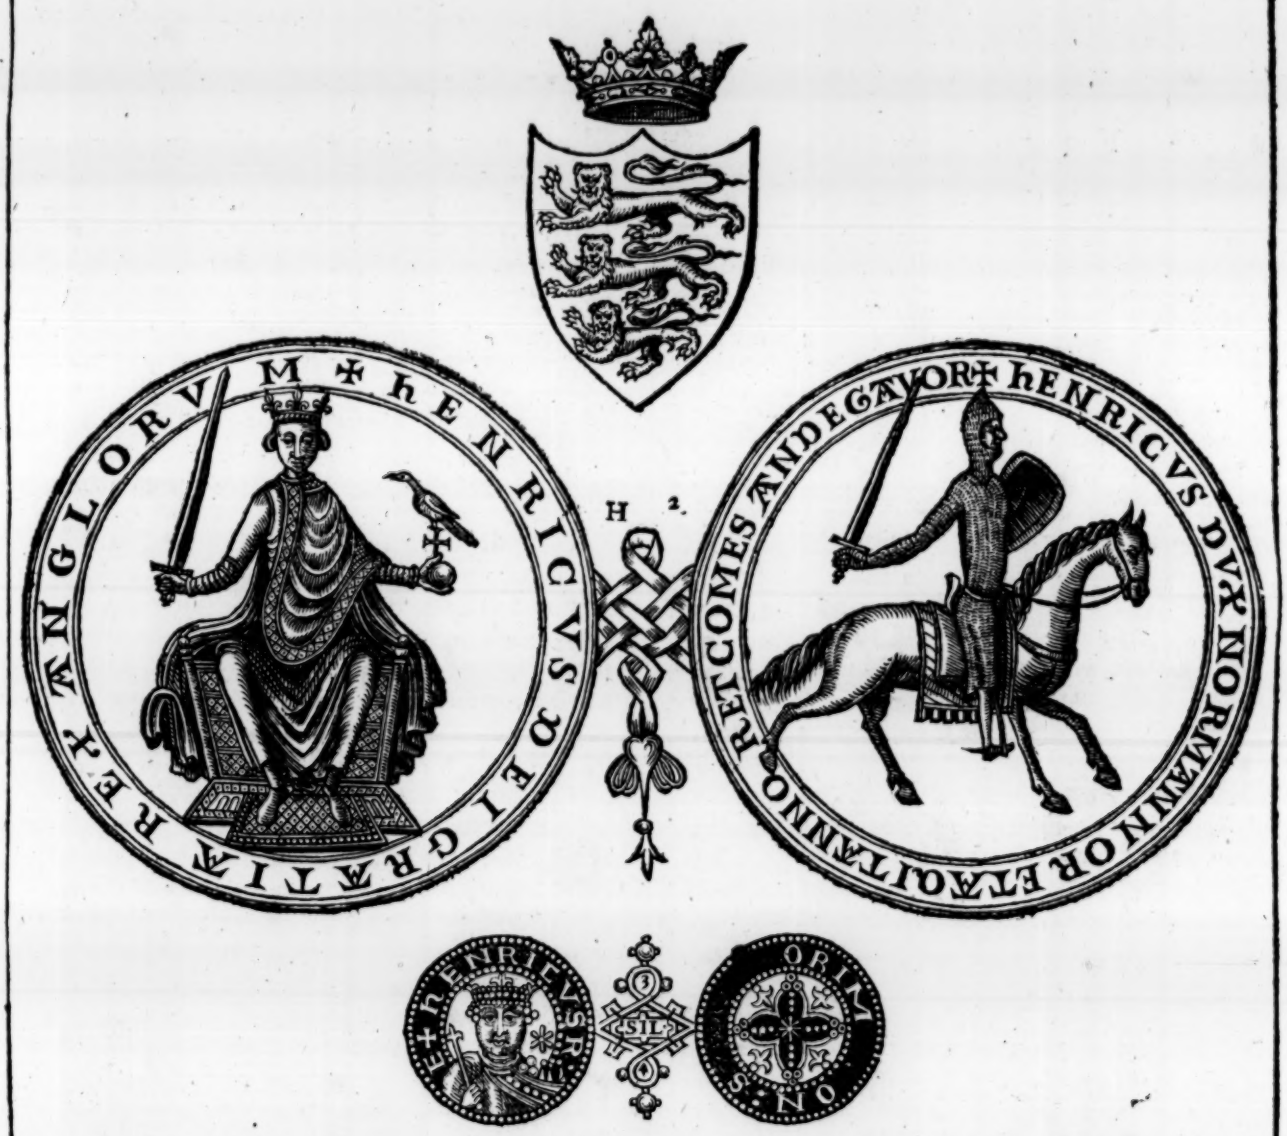
HENRIE THE SECOND, DVKE OF NORMANDY, GVYEN AND AQVITAINE, THE FORTIE THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS AND ISSVE.

Monarch 43



CHAPTER VI.

HEnry, of that name the second, by the double interest of descent and adoption (as you haue heard) succeeded in the Kingdome of England, whose Pedegree, (which Mathew Paris extendeth by the mothers side, in a right line vp to Noah) and former fortunes, hauing already been touched; his counsels, acts, and other affaires of greatest importance, after the death of King Stephen, come now to be handled.

Ad A.D.1155.

(2) He came not to the Crowne vnexpected, nor vndesired; for the opinion of the man, and hope conceiued of his future gouernment, had the force to hold England in good obedience without the presence of a King, about sixe weekes, whose entrance like that of the Soule into the Body, did quicken, and enspirite the Realme, as then (in the person of England) this clozing verse, or Epiphoneme spake:

The great expectation of King Henrie.

Matth. Paris. Henry Hunt.

Spiritus es, caro sum: te nunc intrante reuixi.
Thou, soule; I, Body am: by thee to life I came.

Henry Hunt.

Neither did his presence diminish the expectations raised, but was saluted King with generall acclamations, and with no lesse ioy, at Westminster by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, anointed and crowned: the summe of whose first courses for setling his State was this.

His accesse and Coronation. Ypodigm. Neustr. Matt. Paris.

(3) Sundry Castles (nests of Rebels) hee flatteth to the earth, some others he fortifies or resumes at his pleasure; chiefly such estates, as had beene alienated from the Crowne, as the hire and vniust reward of those who withstood his claime. Others write, that he promiscuously tooke all such lands into his owne possession, as were by Iurors found vpon oath to haue belonged at any time vnto the Crowne. Some Earles vnduly created, he reduceth to priuate condition, and purgeth the Realme from forraine forraine Souldiers; chiefly from the Flemings, whose mercenary swarmes most pestered the same, and had most infected him. And because Gouernment is the Soule of State, and Wisedome the Soule of Gouernment, hee chooseth to himselfe a Body of Councell out of the most eminent persons of both sorts: such was Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury; and for that selfe consideration, he laid the Chancellorship of England vpon Thomas Becket, and held in speciall fauour Iohn of Oxenford, with sundry other Prelates of chiefest note: of the Laity, hee had Robert Earle of Leicester, chiefe Iusticiar of England, Richard de Luci, Iocelin de Bailull, Alan de Neuile and others: but for a Cabanet-Counsellour at all times, he had his owne mother, Matildis the Empresse, one of the most sage and experienced Ladies of the World. Thus then furnished, and assembling a Councell at Wallingford, he as well for his owne securing, as for the assurance of his Children, sweares the Realme to the succession of his sonnes William and Henry, the one being in remainder to the other.

(4) But quiet consultation did not take vp the most of his time, euen in the daies of these Sunne-shining beginnings: for the raigne of Stephen, a most gentle Prince (who thought, out of the necessitie of his owne estate, that it was not safe for him to be seuere) hauing giuen way for many of the mighty to maintaine sundrie insolencies; these now feeling a restraint, began not a little to repine: but Hugh de Mortimer, wanton with greatnesse, and the most arrogant man aliue, stuft his Castles of Gloceſter, Wigmore and * Bridge-north with rebellious Garrisons; which Henry notwithstanding reduced to subiection, though in the siege of the last-named, not without imminent perill of his person, had not Hubert de S. Clare, cast himselfe betweene death and the King, taking the arrow into his owne bosome to preserue his Soueraignes life. It bound Tiberius to Seianus most of all, when a part of the banqueting Caue in which they were, suddenly falling, Seianus was found to haue borne the ruine from the Emperour, with the perill of his life: but Seianus suruiued that aduenture, which our Senclere did not, saue onelie in the better renowne thereof, which deserues to be immortall, being an Act of Piety, worthy of a Statue, with Codrus, Curtius, Manlius, or whosoeuer else haue willingly sacrificed themselues for their Country, or for the Father of their Country, the King.

(6) His domesticke enemies being subdued, or appeased, hee put his brother Geffrey by force to a pension, the summe whereof (if it be any thing to the purpose to know) was 1000. l. English, and 2000. l. Aniou by yeere, wringing out of his possession all such territories, as by their Fathers last Will and Testament, were bequeathed to h m in France. But Geffrey did not long enioy the said annuity, or his brothers friendship: for in the third yeere, death brought a discharge, and Henry was disburdened of those paiments. For his violence in taking away those lands, King Henry might alledge he was eldest brother; but that allegation might be auoided with his owne consent, which once hee gaue: but the great Elixar, called Reason of State, (though falsly so called, vnlesse it be seasoned with Iustice, and Religion) hath so transmutatiue a faculty, as to make Copper seeme Gold, right wrong, and wrong right; yea, when all Pleas faile, it will stand for good, while there are forces to support it.

(7) This accord between the two brethren, being thus (howsoeuer) established, the King repaires into England, and at Chester enters amity with Malcolme King of Scots, on such termes, as his Grandfather had done, yet Saluis omnibus dignitatibus suis, sauing to himselfe all his dignities: and the said Malcolme restored to Henry the City of Carleil, Newcastle vpon Tyne, &c. and Henry restored to him the Earledome of Huntingdon in England. And so iustly dreadfull did the growing puissance of this young Monarch appeare to his greatest enemies, that Hugh By-god Earle of Norfolke, who had potent meanes to doe mischiefe, rendred his Castle to be at his disposall.

(8) The Welsh notwithstanding forsooke not themselues, but did some memorable matters, vnder conduct of the valiant Prince Owen, against the English, in defence of North-Wales, and their Countries liberty, to the losse of the English, and extreame danger of the Kings owne person, whose Standard-Royall was cowardly abandoned, and the King reported to be slaine: for which Henrie de Essex, the Kings Standard-bearer at that conflict, was afterward accused by Robert de Montford his neere Kinsman, and in single battaile within lists was vanquished at Reading, where the said Henry de Essex was shorne a Monke, and died. Mathew Paris relates the whole voyage of King Henry summarily thus: That Henry prepared a very great Army against the Welsh, with full purpose to ouercome them both by land and sea; that hee cut vp the Woods and Forrests, and laid open a way; that he recouered the Castle of Ruthlan, and other fortresses taken from his Ancestors; that he repaired the Castle of Basingwerke, and that hauing brought the Welsh to his will, hee returned with triumph into England.

(9) After this, himselfe and his Wife Queene Elinor being openly crowned vpon Christmas day, (* some say Easter day) at the Citie of Worcester; they both at the Offertorie laid their Diadems vpon the high Altar, vowing neuer to weare them after; this being now the third time in which at three seuerall places, Westminster, Lincolne, and Worcester, he had beene crowned. This deuout act of his, did flow perhaps out of some such speculation as that of Canutus, who thought none truly worthy the name of King, but God alone; or that, vpon which Godfrey of Bolloign, refused to weare a crowne of gold in Hierusalem, where our Lord and Sauiour had beene crowned with thornes. For this King had at times the pangs and symptoms of mortification and piety, and did herein acknowledge the onely giuer and taker-away of Kingdomes God-almighty; putting himselfe, and Realme, vnder the protection of that Maiesty of whom he held paramount; and professing (as it were) that from thenceforth hee would direct his actions to the glory of his omnipotent Master, which is indeede the onely finall cause of all true monarchie.

reason of a marriage concluded vpon, betweene Richard, King Henries second son, and Alice the French Kings daughter: All which and some other, not drawing with them any extraordinary sequel, nor affording much matter for ciuill document, must not preponderate the handling of things more rare and considerable.

An.D.1163. The great contention between the King and Becket Archbish. of Canterbury.

(11) For after these accidents, began the famous controuersie betweene the King and his Arch-bishop Becket, a man of an inuincible stomacke and resolution in his life, and after death reputed by some for a great Saint or Martyr; as is likewise noted of Henrie * that he was the most politicke, martiall, rich, and honoured Prince of all his time. This Prelate, by birth a Londoner, (though his mother, a Sarazen, * say some) by profession a * Ciuilian, was by Theobald Archbishop of Canterburie, both made his Archdeacon, and also placed about the person of Duke Henrie, who being now King, aduanced him in the very first yeere of his raigne to be Lord Chancellor of England, in which high honour he carried himselfe like another King, and afterward vpon the death of Theobald, though the Monkes obiected against Becket, that neither a Courtier nor a Souldier (as * he had bin both) were fit to succeed in so high and sacred a function, yet the King gaue him that Arch-bishopricke, partly in reward, and partly in further hope of his ready & faithfull seruice. Which to be true, a Legender of his Miracles can best relate. Nonnullis tamen, &c. Many (saith he) iudged his promotion not Canonicall, because it was procured more by the importunity of the King, then by the voices of Clergie, or People; and it was noted as presumption & indiscretion in him, to take vpon him to guide the Sterne, who was scarce fit to handle an Oare, and that being skil'd only in worldly affaires, he did not tremble to ascend vnto that sacred top of so great dignity. Whereto agreeth the reports of two learned Monkes who then liued, (for such Authors only we will herein follow, as shal be vnpartiall) *one of which testifies, that the Pope about that time calling a Councel at Tours (& the King giuing Licence to his Arch-bishops and Bishops to goe thither) Becket secretly surrendred his Arch-bishoprick, which he had receiued from the Kings hand, into the Popes hands. The other saith, Becket himselfe confessed, that, not Canonicall Election did call him, but publicke power droue him in, nor the will of God, but mans pleasure, placed him in the roome. Howsoeuer, these being memorable arguments of the Kings exceeding loue; let vs now see how this great Prelate endeuoured to deserue it, or how he chanced to lose it.

(12) Great and flourishing was the state of the English Church and Common-wealth at this season; the quiet of both which, the King studied and hoped to establish by the vndoubted assistance of his great fauorite Becket, whose counsell & authority he knew might much further his princely designes, especially touching affairs of the Church, & abuses of Churchmen, which then were grown to a dangerous height: whereof let vs heare the Monk of Nuborough speak; It was declared in the Kings presence, how that Clergy men had committed aboue an hundred murthers vnder his raigne; wherwith the King highly offended, he was in punishing of them somewhat too vehement; but the blame of the Kings too much earnestnes, must lie on the Prelates, in as much as they gaue the cause therof: for, whereas sacred Canons ordaine, that Clerks found guilty, not onely of hainous and grieuous sins, but also of lesser, should be degraded, and thousands of such were in the Church of England, like innumerable chaffe amongst a little good corne; yet very few such, for these many yeeres haue beene depriued. The Prelates forsooth, while they bestirre themselues, rather to vphold the liberties and dignities of Clerks, then to chastice & cut off their vices, thinke they doe God and his Church good seruice, in protecting frō publike Discipline such hainous offenders, whom (by duty of their places) they ought to correct according to the Canons censure, whereby they through their impunity, hauing liberty to do what they list, haue neither feare of God, (whose iudgement they thinke is farre off) neither of men in authority, sith on the one side their Prelats neglect to reforme them, & on the other side they are thus exempt by their order from the temporal Iurisdiction.

(13) This being the state of the Church & Realm, wherein some were so iniured without remedy, and others so iniurious without coertion, as if neither sort were in condition of Subiects; the King (who was a man of excellent Wisedome, Constancy, and Zeale) tooke especiall care of quickning the publike Discipline, and the rigour of ancient lawes, which thus lay neglected; for which end hee had setled choise Ministers of Iustice through all parts of his land; and vpon complaints brought him by his Subiects of the remissenesse, and other defects of his Iudges, hee accordingly by his princely prouidence applied remedies, and chastised the delinquents. The like remissenes (to censure it no harder) was complained of in his Spirituall Iudges; occasioned by a murther, committed by a Priest of Sarum Dioceese, whom the Archbishop commanded to be depriued, & put into an Abbey, wherby he was freed from sharper punishment, intended by the Kings Iusticiaries: with which (and some other like affronts of his Archbishop) the King conceiued no little displeasure, as requiring that Iustice should be administred to all alike without partiality, and seeing this apparantly to tend vnto the ruine of all royall gouernment: the Archbishop on the other side, stood no lesse peremptorie on the immunities of his Cleargy and See: yea so farre, as that he challenged from the Crowne (to the Kings great offence) the custody of Rochester Castle and other Forts, which the King for securing his state had resumed into his owne hands.

(14) This maine controuersie betweene Regnum, & Sacerdotium, the Crowne and the Mitre, Howeden (who then also liued) thus summarily deliuers: The King would that all such of the Clergy as were deprehended in any Robbery, Murder, Felony, burning of houses, and the like, should be tried & adiudged in his temporall Courts, as Lay-men were: against which, the Archbishops resolutiō was, that al Clergy men so offending should be tried only in the Spirituall Courts, and by men of their owne coate, who if they were conuict, should at first be only depriued of their office and benefice: but if they should againe be guilty of the like, they should then be adiudged at the Kings pleasure. The King finding himselfe to be hereby but a Demi-King, depriued of all Soueraignty ouer one half-deale of his Kingdome, and perceiuing Beckets stiffenesse, in thus contesting with his Soueraigne, to be no way mollifiable by whatsoeuer his old fauours, or fresh perswasions; notwithstanding resolued to put nothing in execution, which should not first be ratified & strengthened with consent of his Bishops; of whose ready assent to so iust demands, hee had no cause to doubt: who thereupon assembling at Westminster, the King, tooke both offence there, at the Archbishops thwarting his desires, and occasion also to establish sundry other Articles, which hee called his Grandfathers customes, peremptorily vrging Becket to yeeld thereunto, without any such reseruation of sauing in all things his order, and right of the Church wherewith he would haue limited his assent.

(15) The points in those Ordinances which the Archbishop principally stucke at, as * himselfe did set them downe in his letters to the Pope, and his owne Suffragan Bishops within the Dioceese of Canterbury, were principally these; 1. That none should appeale to the See of Rome for any cause whatsoeuer, without the Kings license. 2. That it should not be lawfull for any Arch-bishop or Bishop to depart the Realme, and repaire to the Pope, vpon his summons, without the Kings license. 3. That no Bishop should excommunicate any one whomsoeuer, holding of the King in chiefe, or put any other of his officers vnder Interdict, without the Kings license. 4. That Clerks criminous should bee tried before ſecular Iudges. 5. That it ſhould not bee lawfull for a Biſhop to puniſh any one for periurie or faith-breach. 6. That the Laity, whether the King or other ſhould hold pleas of Churches and Tithes, &c.

(16) Theſe points ſo neerely touched the Papall Soueraignty, and Church-Liberties, that the reſolute Metropolitane mainely oppoſed his whole powers againſt them. Henrie alſo perſiſted, as his Grandfather Henry the firſt had done, who hauing a * like warre with Anſelm his Archbiſhop, was ſo vehement therein, as hee would not ſuffer him to returne into England (though after ſome yeeres baniſhment) vnleſſe he would abſolutely binde himſelfe to obſerue, not his Fathers cuſtomes onely, but his brothers alſo, who were the two fatall Williams, the Conquerour and Rufus.

* See before in Henry the firſt.

Reaſons mouing King Henry to vrge the Archbiſhop to aſſent.

(17) Many reaſons moued Henry to attempt this buſineſſe; as firſt, the enlargement of his Regall authority: Secondly, to exempt his State by degrees, from the dependancy on any externall Gouernment, as lineally claiming both from a Conqueſt, and from abſolute-Soueraigne Anteceſſors, and ſo to introduce that free Empery, to which he ſaw no way lie open, but by ſubordinating the Perſons and Cauſes of Church-men to the ſecular ſoueraignety, in a few points firſt, and then in other. And that this was the ſecret, will not obſcurely appeare in * that Article, which was ſummarily this: That appeales ſhould be made from the Conſiſtory to the Arch-deacon, from him to the Biſhop, thence to the Archbiſhop, and ſo to the King. Thus farre M. Fox; but Mathew Paris hath more: That the King ſhould command the Arch-biſhop to end the ſuit, and that it ſhould proceed no further without licenſe of the King.

* Acts and Mon. pag. 265.

(18) A third reaſon was, for that hee had by his owne perſwaſions, and by the Councell of one Ernulph a * Biſhop, drawn vnto his purpoſes the Archbiſhop of Yorke, and all the other Biſhops in a manner, who were now ſure vnto him, and ready to yeeld to his demands, which they ſaw, did tend to the good of the State wherein they liued. Moreouer, hee was perſwaded of great facility in obtaining his deſire, both in regard of the * aduantage which the Schiſme then vpholden by Frederick the Emperour againſt Alexander the third did giue, which might make the Pope afraid to leeſe or hazard his friends: as alſo for that the King, till he found the contrary, thought himſelfe aſſured of his Thomas, whom (if * Gilbert Biſhop of London ſaid true) he aduanced to that dignity againſt the will and liking, aſwell of Matildis the Empreſſe his mother, as of the Clergy and people.

(19) Beſides theſe and other reaſons encouraging the King, Pope Alexander very deſirous to keepe the Kings loue (though ſecretly wiſhing well to Beckets attempts) ſent one Philip his Almoner purpoſelie to compoſe the controuerſie, by whom the Pope and Cardinalls required the Archbiſhop to make promiſe vnto the King to the keeping his ſaid Ordinances abſolutely, and without any ſauings or exceptions: whereupon Thomas ſeeing his ſcrupuloſity thus diſapproued by his Soueraigne, by all his Brethren the Biſhops, and by the Court of Rome it ſelfe, hee rode to Woodſtocke to the King, and there promiſed, that he would keepe his ſaid lawes, bonâ fide, & ſine malo ingenio, in good faith, and without mal-engin.

Then was there at Northampton, (where the king had ſummoned a Parliament) an account demanded of him for the king, to the value of thirtie thouſand pound, which came to his hand during his Chancellorſhip. Whereunto his anſwere was, * That ſeeing he had formerly accounted, and that the kings eldeſt ſonne Henrie, on his Fathers behalfe, and all the Barons of the Exchequer, and Richard de Lucie Iuſticiar of England, had acquitted him toward the King of all accounts, and that hee came free from all actions and dangers to the Archbiſhopricke, that now therefore hee would not anſwere, as a Lay-man, hauing heretofore had ſo ſufficient diſcharge: which refuſall of his was aggrauated with diuers accuſations layde vpon him, as of contempt towards the King, in denying to come to his preſence, being thereto commanded by him, and the like: whereto though he made excuſes (reaſonable enough, if true) yet the Peeres & the Biſhops condemned all his moueables to the Kings mercy: and the Prelates perceiuing the Kings diſpleaſure to tend yet to ſome farther ſeuerity, premoniſhed him to ſubmit himſelfe, for that otherwiſe the Kings Court intended to adiudge him a periured perſon, and alſo a Traitor, for not yeelding temporall allegiance to his Temporall Soueraigne, as himſelfe had ſworn to doe: and accordingly the Prelates themſelues by ioynt conſent adiudged him of Periury, & by the mouth of the Biſhop of Chicheſter, diſclaimed thenceforward all obedience vnto

(31) Notwithſtanding, the Pope forgot not his faithfull Thomas, and therefore after hee had graced him with a confirmation of all the Priuiledges, and powers, which any of his Predeceſſors in that See did enioy (to the daring and defiance as it were, of the Kings vtmoſt indignation) the King ſent a letter into Germany, declaring that hee would forſake Pope Alexander, and ioyne with the Emperour, and Antipape. Whereupon, when the Biſhop of Rome had commanded Gilbert Biſhop of London, to admoniſh the King to giue ouer his courſes, and cuſtomes preiudicious to the Church, the ſaid Biſhop obeyed, and in his anſwere ſought to perſwade the Pope to a conniuencie, and forgets not to iuſtifie his Soueraigne, as, That the King was ready to obey the ſacred heſts of the Church, ſauing to himſelfe his own & his Kingdomes dignity: That as for Appeales, he claimed that honor, by the ancient inſtitution of his Kingdome, that is to ſay, That no Clerke ſhould for a ciuill action depart the ſame, vntill right could not be had in his Courts at home, and then he would hinder no man. That he did not baniſh the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who might return at his pleaſure, ſo as he would obſerue all thoſe his Grandfathers cuſtomes, which once he had giuen his faith to doe: That the King thinks himſelfe greatly iuſtified, in that he is willing to ſtand to the iudgment of the whole Church of his own kingdom, &c

(32) But when mediations, letters, meſſages, or other waies, would not preuaile; the Pope admoniſheth the King, that he meant no longer to reſtraine the Archbiſhop from reuenging his owne, and his Churches injuries with the ſword of cenſure, and thereupon (for a beginning) the Archbiſhop excommunicates Gilbert Biſhop of London, and proceeded ſo farre with others, that there was ſcarce found in the Kings owne Chappell and preſence ſuch as might performe the wonted ceremonies.

(33) The King both touched with his owne wrongs, and tender of their caſe, who for his ſake vnder-went that ſeuerity, animates Biſhop Gilbert with moſt louing offers to beare the charges of proſecuting his appeale againſt Becket, and deſires the Pope to ſend him Legates which might abſolue his excommunicated Subiects, and ſettle a peace, or elſe hee ſhould be compelled to prouide otherwiſe for his owne ſecurity and honour.

Comforted by the King.

(34) Two Cardinals therefore, Gratian and Viuianus, comming into France to end the contention, returne notwithſtanding without poſſibility of doing good; for that Becket would not yeeld in any point to thoſe Cuſtomes, at which he had once excepted, but with his ordinary limitations. At laſt yet by the Popes mediation, the two Kings of England and of France met at Paris, whether the Archbiſhop repaired, and yet no peace enſued: for that the King refuſed the kiſſe of peace with him, and Becket would either haue a ſound and full peace, or none at all; where, though the King of England refuſed to ſatisfie any thing vnder the name of reſtitution, as being againſt his honour (becauſe all reſtitution implyed a wrong) yet in the other maine matter of his Auitall Cuſtomes, offering to ſtand to the iudgement, not of his owne onely, but euen of the Pariſian Diuines, and Church of France; he came off from that conference with ſome aduantage and fauour, in the opinion of the hearers.

(35) King Henry (for all this) ſeeing no iſſue of his long diſquietnes, and vn-regall vſages, vnderſtanding alſo that the Archbiſhop of Seins in perſon had ſolicited the Pope, to put the Kingdom of England vnder Interdict, (which is the prohibiting of the publike vſe of Chriſts Religion, & Chriſtian Buriall throughout the whole land) hee being then in Normandy, ſends forth his Edict: That if any man bring from the Pope or Becket, any letters of Interdict, he ſhould preſently ſuffer as a Traitor to the King & the State. That no Clerke whatſoeuer goe forth of the land without a paſſe from his Iuſticiaries, and none returne againe without letters of licence from the King himſelfe. That none receiue any meſſage from the Pope or Becket, nor make any appeale vnto them, nor hold any Plea by their mandates. That if any Prelate or Clerke, or Lay-man ſhall obey any ſentence of interdict, he and all his kindred ſhall be forthwith expulſed the land, & all his goods eſcheated to the Crowne. That all Clerkes who haue rents in England, return home within three Moneths, or elſe all their rents to fall to the King. That certaine Prelates ſpecified, be cited to anſwere in the Kings Courts for interdicting Earle Hughs lands. That Peter-pence be not paid to Rome, but reſerued. Thus, (as Geruaſe the Monke lamentably complaineth) all from the eldeſt to the youngeſt throughout England, were made to abiure obedience to Pope Alexander and Becket.

(36) After all this, it came into King Henries mind, to ſweeten theſe his many cares with ſome ſolace, and to crowne his eldeſt ſonne, young Henry, King of England, now in his owne life time: A counſell not more temerarious, then vnfortunate: but of which he did hope to reape this conſolation: that it was done in contempt of Becket (whoſe office it was to haue crowned the King,) with ſome aduantage alſo toward the perpetuation of the Auitall Cuſtomes, and that alſo without ſcruple of conſcience, his ſonne receiuing the Crowne without caution, to preſerue the Churches liberty, either by him put in, or by others exacted. Yea rather, an Oath miniſtred, and by the young King taken, to maintaine thoſe Auitall Cuſtomes to the vttermoſt.

The King cauſeth his ſonne to be crowned King.

Ep. Alex. Pap. apud Roger Houeden.

(37) This ſolemnity was performed, at Henrie the fathers commandement, by Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, (the anciently riuall See of Canterbury) contrarie to the Popes expreſſe Inhibition, the father himſelfe King Henrie, being preſent thereat, though without any fortunate preſage in comming, or cauſe of conſolation in the action. For * he, in his inauſpicious paſſage out of Normandy, arriuing not without very great peril, at Portſmouth, the beſt and neweſt ſhip he had was ſuncke in the ſtormes, and therein, beſides Henry de Agnellis and his two ſonnes, Gilbert de Sullemni, Mr. Ralfe de Bealmunt, the Kings Phyſition and fauourite, with about foure hundred men & women more, were deuoured of the working waues. And at the feaſt, the ioyfull father himſelfe, carrying the firſt diſh, and the Arch-biſhop of Yorke ſaying in pleaſance to the young King: Reioyce my faire ſon, for there is no Prince in the world, hath ſuch a ſeruitor attending at his table as you: The vnnaturall yong man anſwered; why? wonder you at that? my father knowes he doth nothing that misbecomes him, for ſo much as he is royall borne but of one ſide, but our ſelfe are royall borne both by father and mother.

(38) Adde heereunto, that this vnluckie Coronations triumphes, were celebrated with bon-fires kindled by the furies in Normandie; which Lewis the French King inuaded with fire and ſword, becauſe his daughter Margaret was not crowned aſwell as the young King her husband: but the father ſpeeding into thoſe parts, quencht this flame with a promiſe to re-crowne his ſonne, and then his daughter

Margaret

Margaret ſhould be honoured with like ceremonies. Thus the fathers patience was exerciſed on euerie hand, and worſe things were feared.

Matth. Paris. The laſt meeting for a peace betweene the King and Archbiſhop.

(39) So now yet at laſt, in the ſeauenth yeere of Beckets baniſhment, another meeting was had at Seins, whither, the two great Kings, and the Arch-biſhop of Seins, and Biſhop of Neuers, beeing together, the Arch-biſhop of Canterburie repaired, and the treat e of Peace was entred into, which at Ambois, in another meeting (at procurement of Rotrod Arch-biſhop of Roan) was finiſhed; and the Arch-biſhop (knowing the King was terrified with the expectation of the foreſaid imminent Interdiction) was reſtored to the Kings fauour, and permitted to haue full vſe of his Metropolitane See, and all the profits thereof with the arrerages. Which concluſion, the King ſignifies to his ſonne into England, whither the Arch-biſhop returnes, and lands at Sandwich: And thus the co.ntrouerſie betweene the King and his Arch-biſhop ſeemed to be ended.

The Archbiſhop publiſheth new cenſures.

(40) But the Arch-biſhop had not beene long in England, before hee publiſhed the Popes Letters, by which, Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, and Hugh Biſhop of Dureſme, were ſuſpended from the vſe of their Epiſcopall function, for crowning the young King, in preiudice of the See of Canterburie; and the Biſhops of London, Exceter, and Salisburie, cut off from the Church by cenſure, for aſſiſting the ſaid Arch-biſhop at that Coronation; whom Becket would not, but vnder conditions, at the young Kings requeſt, abſolue. Whereupon a great complaint was carried into Normandy, to the father-King,* by ſome of the Biſhops: and in the meane time, the Arch-biſhop Thomas, putting himſelfe vpon the way to viſite the young King, at Woodſtock in Oxford-ſhire, was commanded not to approach.

(41) At the newes of theſe late cenſures, the father-King was ſo ſore diſpleaſed, that ſome words ſlipping from him, and arguing his great diſcontent, mooued Hugh Moruill, William Traci, Hugh Brito, and Richard Fitz-vrſe, knights and courtiers, to poſt into England, and there in a furie, (without either warrant, or priuitie of their Soueraigne) to murther the Arch-biſhop (being then about * forty and eight yeers old) in his owne Church of Canterburie; which ſacred Place, & Time, beſides his high Calling, might haue pleaded for pitie, had not the men been wholly tranſported with barbarous rage. For howſoeuer wee are far from their fancies, who, for his zeale to the Popes Soueraignety, haue ſo mounted him to the top of Martyrs glory, that not onely the baſeſt part of his Shrine was pure gold, and his * old Shoe was deuoutly kiſſed by all * paſſengers, but alſo ſhameleſſe and numberleſſe Miracles are blindly aſcribed vnto him, and his * Bloud almoſt matched in vertue with our euer-bleſſed Sauiours: yet wee no leſſe condemne their butcherly execution, who (how great ſoeuer his offence was againſt the King and State) had no lawfull authoritie to beare them out, or acquit them, from the guilt of Bloud.

(42) To ſhut vp this long contention (which, as you ſee, would not be extinct but by bloud, nor take end but by his death,) becauſe any cenſure of our owne will be ſaid to ſauor of Time-ſeruing, or State-pleaſing, we will onely annexe the bare judgement of the fore-cited learned Monke of that time, who thus ſpeaks. Indeed though moſt mens cuſtome is, in thoſe, whom they loue & praiſe, to extol whatſoeuer they haue done, (an argument of their great affection, but ſlender wiſdom) yet in plain truth, thoſe things, which the venerable Archbiſhop ſo acted, that no profit at all thence proceeded, but the Kings wrath onely was kindled (whereby ſo many miſchiefes afterward aroſe) I do not think to be praiſe-worthy) though they ſprang from a laudable Zeale; as it was in the bleſſed Prince of the Apoſtles, who attaining the top of Apoſtolicall perfection, taught the Gentiles by his exãple to Iudaize; for which the Doctor of the Gentiles declares that he deſerued to be reprehended, though he did it with a praiſe-worthy & pious intent.* And in another place. The Archbiſhop was hot in zeale of iuſtice, but whither fully according to knowledge, God knoweth, (for it is not for a man of my mean quality, raſhly to iudge of ſo great a mans actions) but I think, the bleſſed Pope Gregory wold haue dealt more mildly, and winkt at thoſe things which might haue bin borne, without any hazard of the Chriſtian faith, &c. and then concludes: Therefore, that which the venerable Archbiſhop then did, I neither iudge that it is to be commended, neither preſume I to condemne it, &c. For good men are ſo to be loued, or lauded by vs, that wee neither loue nor land thoſe acts wherein they ſhew themſelues to be fraile men, but onely thoſe things wherein without ſcruple wee ought to imitate them: and therefore they are wiſelie and warilie to be praiſed, that Gods prerogatiue may be reſerued intire to himſelfe.

(43) Some other learned men there were, who liued neere to that time, whoſe cenſure was far ſharper then that Monks: Such were ſome of thoſe Diuines of Paris, mentioned by * Cæſarius the Monke, who ſaith, The queſtion was debated to and fro amongſt the Doctors, in the vniuerſity of Paris, whether Thomas were damned or ſaued: amongſt whom, Rogerius the Norman auowed, that hee deſerued death and damnation, for his contumacie againſt his King, the Miniſter of God: but Petrus Cantor alleadged, that his miracles were ſignes of his ſaluation, &c. And indeede if all be true which one man hath written in fiue books, containing his 270. Miracles, we cannot but acknowledge him, both the greateſt Saint, and the merrieſt to, that euer got into heauen; ſo ridiculous are many things recorded of him. As that of Ailwardus, who for ſtealing of a great whetſtone (which the Author that writes it, beſt deſerued) being depriued of his Eies & * Virilities, by ſentence of Law; vpon prayer to S. Thomas he had all reſtored againe: Yea, euen a* Bird, hauing beene taught to ſpeake, flying out of her cage, and ready to be ſeized on by a Spar-Hauke, ſaid onely, S. Thomas helpe me, & her enemie fell preſently dead, and ſhe eſcaped, and (belike) reported it. Of which great power in this Saint, how can we doubt? ſith we read, that euen in his life time the * Virgin Mary her ſelfe was contented to be his Sempſter, and ſowed his ſhirt with red ſilke? Many of which kind of follies, (if that word be ſharpe enough) might be heere inſerted, were not our preſent argument more ſerious, and theſe forgeries fit onely for Monkes to endite, children to read, and fooles to beleeue.

King Henry projects the conqueſt of Ireland.

(46) Henry therefore, among ſo many perplexities riſing out of the Archbiſhops murther, ſaw no way ſo ready for the calming his owne perturbations, or for the auerting mens thoughts from the conſideration of that ſcandalous Tragedie, as to vndertake ſome great and noble enterpriſe, which now offered it ſelfe very ſeaſonably. For Ireland, a verie ſpatious and plentifull Iland, and lying commodiouſly for the vſes of the Engliſh, burned in it ſelf with ciuill diuiſions, kindled among the petty Kings and Princes thereof: while Rotherick the Great, called O Conor Dun, Prince of Connaught, abuſing his power and the aduantage of the times, to the oppreſſion of his Neighbours, ſought to make himſelfe the vniuerſall King thereof, hauing already inuaded the Title and Stile of KING AND MONARCH OF IRELAND. And this his purpoſe was much aduaunced by the fatall and familiar errour of proceedings in like caſes: for the Iriſh Princes, either through diſtruſt or pride, forbearing to vnite their forces againſt the common enemy, while each prouides for one, they are all, as it were, ouercome.

(48) The onely diſpoſer and tranſlator of Kingdomes is God; & in Ireland to moue him to offence (without which no Kingdome is transferred) againſt the people thereof, all ſuch ſinnes abounded, as commonly forgoe the greateſt changes: for not onely the manners of the Nation were extreamely corrupted, but the Chriſtian faith it ſelfe decayed; barbariſme ouer-running the one, and * more then ſuperſtitions the other. But it may ſeeme by ſome *Authors, that King Henries particular inducements to that Action, were both an ancient title vnto that Kingdome, deriued from his anceſtors (the Kings of England) for many ages before him; and *many vnſufferable wrongs (by their Piracies) vnto the Engliſh Nation, buying and ſelling their Captiues, and vſing Turkiſh tyranny on their bodies: which made the Iriſh Clergy themſelues confeſſe, that they had deſerued no other, then that their land ſhould be transferred to that Nation whom they had ſo cruelly handled. Notwithſtanding, King Henry, who knew how great and dangerous tumults the Popes had raiſed on ſmall occaſions, thought his way would be much eaſier, if he went onward with the Popes good fauour, which he eaſily obtained (ſo liberall is his holineſſe of that which is none of his) for a fee; viz. a penny yeerely to be paid to Saint Peter of euery houſe in Ireland. Touching which point, Roſſius of Warwick (no Proteſtant, I aſſure you,) ſaith, That Englands King is not bound to rely on the Popes graunt for Ireland, nor yet to pay that taxe, becauſe hee had claime to that Kingdome by an hereditary right: and that the Pope had no temporall intereſt therein (as his fauorites pretend) the often-mentioned Monke of Newborough can tell vs, who ſaith, that Nunqnam externæ ſubiacuit ditioni, Ireland was neuer ſubiect to any forraine command.

The Earle accepted the conditions, reſo-lute to ſet vp Dermot againe, and for that purpoſe bound himſelfe by ſolemne contract, to the full per-formance of his part within a certaine time.

*The Iriſh phraſe to vſe thou and thee.

*This ſeemeth to be ſpoke, becauſe his mother Iſabel was Aunt (by the mother) to Malcolm King of Scots: Cambd. Annales Hibern. Anno 1169. Earle Richard agrees.

(53) Dermot hauing thus negotiated his affaires and ſet it in ſo good forwardnes, while his friends in England prepared themſelues and their Forces, leſt hee ſhould ſeeme to relie vpon forraine aides; and ſo to diminiſh with them the reputation of his owne valour and alliances at home; hee ſayles backe into his Countrey; carrying with him the promiſes of confederates, and there both by his preſence and perſwaſions did the beſt hee could to facilitate the entrance of the Engliſh; whoſe honourable enter-tainements, deuotions, ciuility, riches, valours, wiſedome, and victorious greatneſſes he ſpared not to celebrate, as inſtruments aduancing his owne de-ſignes: which rayſed no little expectation, mixt with contrary affections of deſire and feare.

(54) The next yeare, when the ſeaſon grew fit for an Army to take the Field, Robert Fitz-Stephen accompanied with Maurice Fitz-Gerald his halfe-brother by the ſurer ſide, and * a competent number of Souldiers, repoſing (vnder God) their chiefe hope in their ſwords and courages, ſet ſaile for Ireland; and in the beginning of May came on ſhore, at a place called by the Iriſh, Bann (by the Engliſh at this day commonly, Bagg and Bunn) which in our Language ſignifies Sacred: a word which (ſo much as names may be preſages of things) did as it were hallow the attempt of the Engliſh with a lucky and gracious o-mination, whereof the Inhabitants at this preſent retaine this rime,

(55) The next day after, Maurice de Pender-gaſt alſo, with * other men of Armes, and many Ar-chers in two ſhippes arriued there, beeing parcell of Fitz-Stephens Forces and Companions of his For-tunes, who ioyning themſelues together, immediat-ly marcht to the Citie of Weisford vnder their Ban-ners, and that in the greateſt brauery they could, (the Knights and Men at Armes, in their * Co ates of Armes & Colours) to draw thereby now at the firſt the greater reputation to themſelues, and with opi-nion ſo gotten, to fill vp the ſmalneſſe of their num-ber: in which manner aſſailing the Citie, the Iriſh therein rendred themſelues, and in reward of the ſeruice, being alſo * according to capitulation, and en-couragement of others, who were to proceede in this warre, Dermot, to whoſe vſe the Engliſh Gene-rall had taken it, * beſtowed the Citie it ſelfe, and the Country about vpon Robert Fitz-Stephen, at his pleaſure to be diſpoſed of: and there the firſt Co-lony of our Nation was planted, which hath euer ſince immoueably maintained their abode among innumerable changes in the World, retaining at this day the ancient attire of the Engliſh, and the language alſo it ſelfe, though brackiſh with the mixture of vulgar Iriſh, which therefore by a diſtinct name is called Weisford ſpeech, current onely in that City, & the County about.

(the Iriſh name of Waterford) and vpon the very next day tooke the City by force, and ſacrificed the armed Inhabitants, to the reuenge of Dermot, ſo the rather to make roome, and ſecurity for themſelues, to the exceeding terrour, and juſt diſmay of all about, as they who found, that, howſoeuer the pretence was to re-ſettle Dermot, the purpoſe was to ſeat the Engliſh for euer.

He marrieth the Lady Eua.

(57) But Dermot, Author of this calamity to his Nation, reſolute in his purpoſe in full complement of his Contract, doth openly in ſolemne manner beſtow his promiſed daughter Eua, vpon the Conquerour in marriage, with his owne right hand giuing her in the Church: at which time, the famous Strong-bow did not celebrate his particular Wedding-day, but the indiſſoluble knot of the Iriſh allegiance to the Engliſh Soueraignetie, with the ſame Ring which circuled his Wiues Finger, affiancing that Iland to this our Country.

(58) The marriage performed, it was far from the mind of the Earle to ſpend much time in reuels and feaſts, but conſults with his men of warre what was next to be done for the ſetling his Father in law King Dermot, and for finiſhing the Conqueſt which was now ſo happily begunne, in two ſeuerall parts of Ireland at once. Leauing therefore a ſufficient Garriſon to make good the places already gain'd, and to ſecure the landing of freſh ſupplies, he ſets forward with his ſelected Companies, to whoſe victorious weapons the whole Realme lay open, ſo farre forth, that Rotherick himſelfe was very wel contented (notwithſtanding his lately vſurped, and ſwelling title of Monarch of Ireland) to hold himſelfe within the bogs and faſteneſſes of his peculiar Realme, the wild, and mountainous Connaught; meane while, Strong-bow keepes on his way ouer the boſome of Ireland to the principall City thereof, Dublin, taking in (as he marcheth) all the places about, and ſecuring himſelfe by pledges, of their loyalty, or otherwiſe as he ſaw moſt fit. In which journey, pleaſed with the delight & fertile ſituation of * Kildare, he reſolued there to ſettle his abode, and to erect a ſeat to his poſterity.

Earle Richard marcheth to Dublin.

Dublin taken.

The conqueſt of Dublin being ſpeedily, and moſt happily atchieued; not long after, Dermot Mac Murgh, Father in Law to the Earle, (whom the Iriſh for his affection to the Engliſh, call Dermot Ningall, that is, Dermot the Strangers friend) breathed his laſt at Fernys, dying, (plenus dierum.)

(59) The fame of theſe ſucceſſes wafting ouer the Iriſh-Seas, and comming to the King, made him reſolue to paſſe in perſon thither, that he might haue the honor of the Conqueſt: and not approuing ſuch forwardneſſe in the Earle, who (as ſome ſay) went againſt his expreſſe commaundement, (and indeede * Giraldus, who liued at that time, calls his leaue no better then an Ironicall leaue) and for that he knew not to what inſolency ſuch faire fortune might in time allure, as alſo for that they ſeemed to handle the Natiues too rigorouſly; * thereupon hee forbids by his Proclamations, any Veſſell to carry any thing out of his Dominions into Ireland, and commands all Engliſh to returne before Eaſter, and leaue off their attempts, or their eſtates in England ſhould be ſeized for the King. By which Edict theſe affaires were brought into fearefull extremity, which was changed into better condition by the trauell of Herueius de Monte Mariſco, on the behalfe of the Earle, and the aduenturers, who finding the King in Gloceſterſhire with an Army for Ireland, appeaſed his diſpleaſure vpon theſe termes: That the King ſhould haue the head-City of the Kingdome, Dublin, with the adjacent Cantreds, with all the Coaſt-townes and Caſtles, the reſt to remaine to the Conquerours to hold of the King, and of his Heires, and ſo to be vnder his protection, as Subjects ought, and as they were before; which ſubjection it ſeemed to the King they meant to haue renounced.

(60) The Kings goodly Nauy lay in Milford-hauen, to which as hee journied, hee thundred againſt the Welſh Nobility, comming to entertaine him, for ſuffering Strongbow to depart: At laſt being imbarkt, he had a faire Gale which ſet him ſafe in Ireland with all his Forces at Waterford, where firſt hee commits to priſon Robert Fitz-Stephen, whom the Citizens preſented bound, hauing held him in cuſtody, vnder color of doing good ſeruice, becauſe hee had entred Ireland without the Kings particular leaue; yet ſoone after the King releaſed him, but depriued him of Weisford, and the Territories. Then takes he the homages of ſuch petty-Kings, and principall perſons of the Iriſh as repaired, diſmiſſing them in honourable ſort, meaning to winne them by gentle, and not exaſperating courſes; and marching through Oſſyrie to Dublin, he takes ô Rotherick the King of Connaughts homage by Hugh Lacie, and William Fitz-Aldelm: Laſtly, at Dublin he kept his Chriſtmas in Royall ſtate, which to behold, very many of the Iriſh Princes came thither.

(61) Mindefull now of his duty to God, the Iland being calme, and ſilent, through the preſence of ſuch a mighty Monarch, the moſt noble King of England, and Triumphator of Ireland (as *mine Author ſtileth him) cauſeth a Synode to be holden at Caſſils for reformation of the Iriſh Church, where amongſt ſundry other conſtitutions, to which the Iriſh Clergy did willingly ſubmit, it was decreed, That all the Church-Lands, and their poſſeſſions ſhould be altogether free from the exaction of ſecular men, and that from thenceforth, all Diuine things ſhould be handled in euery part of Ireland in ſuch ſort, as the Church of "England handleth them. For, (ſaith the Conſtitu- "tion) it is moſt juſt, and meete, that as Ireland hath "by Gods mercy obtained a Lord, and King out of "England, ſo alſo that from thence they ſhould re- "ceiue a better forme of life, and manners, then here- "tofore they vſed.

(62) The King continuing his politicke jealouſies, and thinking Strongbow to be as yet too great, draws from his dependency Raimund, Milo Cogan, William Makarel, and other of the beſt Captaines, and makes them his owne by bounty. But before hee could fully eſtabliſh that Kingdome (the inſeparable euill fate thereof, which would neuer ſuffer it to enjoy the bleſſed benefit of exact ciuility) other affaires which hee eſteemed more neceſſary, call him away, and therefore hauing left Hugh Lacie at Dublin, he ſets ſaile for England vpon Eaſter *Monday, and landed happily at Saint Dauids in Pembrookeſhire, from whence with all ſpeede hee poſteth into Normandie.

The condition of his abſolutions were; That he ſhould at his owne charge maintaine two hundreth Souldiers for an whole yeere for defence of the Holy-land. That hee ſhould ſuffer Appeales to be made freely. That he ſhould reuoke all Cuſtomes introduced to the prejudice of the Churches libertie. That hee ſhould reſtore and make vp the poſſeſſions of the Church of Canterburie. That hee ſhould freely receiue all ſuch as were in baniſhment for Beckets cauſe, &c. Not long after, Thomas was canonized by Pope Alexander, and ſo not onely the victory clearely giuen him againſt King Henry, but a triumph alſo.

Math. Paris. Sabellicus Ennead 9. lib. 5.

Matth. Weſtm. Nic. Triuet. Holinſh. pag. 83.

(64) Now began the wombe of rebellion, and vnnaturall conſpiracies to diſcloſe the miſchiefes which were ordained to exerciſe this right redoubted King and Warriour, hatched heere at home by the malice (ſome ſay) of Eleanor his Queene, at ſuch time as he was abſent in Ireland, ſo that as * one writes writes, God ſtirred vp the Kings owne bowels againſt himſelfe. Cauſes of this vnhappie diſſention, there were many: Firſt, a Queene and Wife, violently vindicatiue for wrong done vnto her Bed by the King, who was immoderatly addicted to varietie of loues: then Ambition in an euill-natur'd Child; and laſtly, pernicious Actors and inſtruments, who, for their owne ends, nouriſhed this curſed miſchiefe; ſo as if we ſhould out of our ſtories re-capitulate the ſeuerall occaſions taken by the ſonne againſt the father, wee ſhould rather ſhew you the colours, then the cauſes: For none of thoſe cauſes which his Son pretended, ſeemed great enough with men that feare God, to beare out ſuch continuall diuiſions as followed.

(65) The head of this conſpiracy was very great, and juſtly very terrible: for on the ſide of King Henry the ſonne, there were the Kings of France and Scotland, * Richard and Geffrey, two yonger ſonnes of the King of England, whom by their mothers perſwaſions they forſooke, to follow the young King; Dauid the Scotiſh Kings brother, Philip Earle of Flanders, (a Peere of France, and a potent Prince,) Matthew Earle of Boloigne, Theobald Earle of Blois, Hugh Earle of Cheſter, Robert Earle of Leiceſter, Hugh Bygod Earle of Norfolke, Roger Mowbray, and other great ones, in great numbers, ſo as nothing ſeemed wanting, but onely a good cauſe, which (ſuch as it was) Queene Elianor, like an Alecto, kept aliue, ſo much as lay in her, with perpetuall fomentations. And indeed the ſcope of theſe confederats did require no leſſe a combination, it being to depoſe the Father, whom it pleaſed them (for countenance of their vngodly armes) to repute no King, becauſe hee had crowned his ſonne.

(66) Though nothing then could come more greeuous, to the bleeding heart of a moſt louing father, then ſuch a warre; yet not to be vnprouided, hee (like a Souldier) prepares himſelfe, when faire meanes fail'd, and found multitudes readie to liue and die with him; the indignitie of the vnnaturall reuolt, did ſo much inflame all honeſt courages, which acknowledged him their Soueraigne.

(67) The particular accidents of the wars would fill a volume. At one time Normandie, Guyen, and Britaine were inuaded by the confederats in France, and at the ſame time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had friends in all thoſe parts, & himſelfe hearing that Vernuil was * beſieged by the French King in perſon, hee began at laſt to kindle, hauing, like a ſleeping Lion, ſitten ſtill all that while, and for that the place had (vpon parlea) agreed to render if aid came not by a day) hee arriued to their ſuccour within the time, * ſending King Lewis word that hee ſhould get him forth of Normandie with ſpeede, or he would without faile, come, and ſee how hee did vpon that very day. Lewis, meaning nothing leſſe then to put his owne Crowne in danger, while he ſought one for his ſonne in law, (and therefore in all the warre-time would neuer ſet vp his reſt vpon a battell,) but willing otherwiſe to doe to King Henrie the father, all the harme hee could, by countenancing the faction, and ſupporting the reuolted male-contents with his beſt meanes, and knowing King Henry was a ſower and terrible Prince when he came indeede to fight, immediately raiſed his ſiege, and with as much haſt as hee might, abandoned the place, * leauing his Campe, Tents, and warlike prouiſions behinde, and retired into France.

An. D. 1173.

(68) And though King Henrie, beginning now indeede to ſhake his dreadfull ſword, had many faire daies of his enemies, mixt with ſome loſſes both of men and other ſtrengths, though not great, nor many, in regard of the ouerthrowes which on his behalfe were giuen: For that in Britaine his forces had in battell vanquiſhed * Hugh Earle of Cheſter, & Ralph de Foulgiers, and ſlaine about one thouſand and fiue hundred of their army; & in England, Reignald Earle of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucie, had in bloudy battell * ouerthrowne the inſolent Earle of Leiceſter, and * entred the towne of Leiceſter by force; and that hee had the perſons of the ſaid * Hugh Lupus Earle of Cheſter, Ralph de Foulgiers, and verie many other priſoners of eſpeciall note and Nobility; yet Lewis the French King mooning a parlea, the father deſirous to vſe the good fortune of warre, to reclaime his rebels, was ſo willing to make peace, that hee might ſeeme to haue out-gone expectation in the qualitie of his offers, but through ſuch wicked perſwaſions as were vſed, preuailed not.

(69) A violent fire-brand in this diuiſion, was Robert Earle of Leiceſter, being matched with a Ladie no leſſe proud, and ſtomachious then himſelfe; who at this meeting, was not contented to haue affronted King Henrie the father, on the behalfe of his young Lord and Maſter the ſonne, but (after many words of reproach) is ſaid to haue laide his daring hand vpon his ſword, with purpoſe to haue ſtrucken the King, had he not been with-holden: (and where ſuch ſpirits had to doe, it is eaſie to gueſſe what kinds of counſell were like to be embraced and purſued;) hauing forſaken the father, not for that the others cauſe was more honeſt, but for that (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) the father-King, labouring to enlarge the Regall-power, ſought to ſet his foot vpon the necks of the proud and haughtie.

(70) But God, who meant to chaſtiſe the King, and not to deliuer him vp into his enemies hands, deſtroyed thoſe hopes that mooued the ſonnes to their vnnaturall attempts; for it was not long after, when newes came into Normandy, that his faithfull friends and ſeruants, * Richard de Lucie, and Humphrey de Bohun high Conſtable of England, together with the powers of Reignald Earle of Cornwall the Kings Vncle, Robert Earle of Gloceſter, and William Earle of Arundell, not farre from Buries, couragiouſlie encountred with the Earle of Leiceſter, and his * Flemings, of whom aboue * fiue thouſand were ſlaine, or taken, and among the priſoners was the Earle himſelfe, & * his Amazonian Counteſſe, whoſe perſons at his commaundement were not long after brought ouer into Normandie.

(71) This * great victorie and other good ſucceſſe, did ſo much aduauntage the King, that Lewis beginning to diſtruſt the enterprize, ſought for ſixe moneths truce for himſelfe, and had it granted: but becauſe there were yet in England, two principall men, * the Earle of Norfolke, and Roger Mowbray, which held out; hauing Leiceſter for their Randeuou, and ſeat of warre, with no ſmall numbers of partakers, notwithſtanding that Geffrey (the Elect of Lincolne, the Kings baſe ſonne) had taken two of Mowbraies Caſtles, and done other good ſeruice for his Lord and Father, the truce ſerued the enemie for no other purpoſe but to breath, and to repaire himſelfe.

(72) The father (of whom Lewis ſaid, that, hee ſeemed not to goe, but to flie, hee went with ſuch celerity from one place and kingdome to another) in the meane while, recouers Xaincts from Richard his violent ſonne, weakening that partie by ſo much, and would haue weakened it farre more, but that aduertiſments came poſt, declaring ſuch matter, as made him ſpeed into Normandie.

(73) Thither * came vnto him out of England, Richard (the Elect of Winchеſter) ſent with all haſt by the Kings Iuſticiaries, to lay open vnto him, the dangerous eſtate wherein the Realme at that time ſtood. For after that Philip Earle of Flanders had ſolemnelie ſworne to inuade England, in ſupportation of young Henries quarrell, ſundrie forces arriuing and ioyning with Hugh Bygod Earle of Norfolke, had taken & ſpoyled the City of Norwich, and done otherwiſe much harme, whereby the young King and his faction had taken great encouragement, as if the die of Warre were turned, and aſwell the young King as the Earle of Flanders, were come with forces to the Coaſts, there to tranſport for England: * Moreouer, Robert Earle Ferrers of Derby (who was falne

King Henrie ſailes into Normandy.

(74) The Father wonderfully ſtirred heerewith, leaues Normandy in as good aſſurance as the time would permit, and ſends before him to the Ships, Eleanor his owne Queene, and Queene Margaret his ſonnes wife, his ſonne Iohn, &c. the Earle of Leiceſter and his Counteſſe, with many other priſoners, and a mightie Armie; but the winde changing, and hee compelled to ſtay in harbour at Barbefleet in Normandie, where he had taken ſhipping, hee is ſaid (GOD touching his heart) to haue vttered theſe wordes with much remorſe, in the preſence of all; If my purpoſe in this voyage be for the "peace of the Clergy and people, and if the King "of Heauen ſhall vouchſafe to quiet and calme theſe "troubles at my arriuall, then for his mercies ſake "wee beſeech him to ſend vs a proſperous winde: "But if he be againſt it, and hath reſolued to viſit the "Kingdome of England with the rod of his fury, let "him graunt mee neuer to touch the ſhore of that "Country more. His Prayer thus vttered from the depth of ſoule, was ſeconded with a freſh perie of winde: whereupon ſetting ſayle, hee arriued ſafe the ſame day with all his Nauie at the Port of Hampton in England.

(75) The next day he tooke his journey towards Canterbury, where (as it appeareth) the reſidue of his penance enioyned him at his Abſolution, was to be performed. For, beſides the fore-mentioned conditions, the Legates enioyned him (ſaith the *Author of Beckets life) ſome other thing ſecretly, which came not to our knowledge; yea the * Legates themſelues wrote in their owne letters, that he then promiſed to doe (voluntarily, if yee liſt to beleeue it) ſome things which was not fit for them to lay open in writing. And well might they be aſhamed thereof; but if it were ſo vnfit to be written, how vnfit was it to be impoſed on ſuch a Soueraigne Prince? what it was, let * Houeden report. The King comming towardes the Church, where the late Archbiſhop was buried, clad all in woollen, went three miles bare-footed, inſomuch, that the verie ground where he went, was bloudie, as was euidently ſeene, much bloud running from his tender feete which were cut with the hard ſtones. Neither yet was this the worſt; for after all this, Hee receiued Diſcipline at the hands of the Biſhops, of a great many Prieſts, and of the Monks. Geruaſius names Abbots alſo, whereby appeares, that euery ſeuerall ſort were to haue a hand in that ſeruice. Matthew Paris can tell you more plainly what that Diſcipling was: viz. he receiued the diſcipline of rods on his bare fleſh, receiuing of euery religious man, (a great multitude of them being there gathered) 3. or 5. jerkes a peece: whence we may eaſily beleeue, Baronius and his *Author ſpake within compaſſe, who acknowledge he receiued 80. laſhes. To ſuch height was the Papall tyranny and pride grown towards thoſe, of whom God had ſaid expreſly, Touch not mine Annointed.

(76) Yet ſome Monkes of that age, attribute the happy and great ſucceſſe which enſued, to the reconcilement which King Henrie thus made with GOD for the bloud of Thomas, becauſe it pleaſed God to deliuer his enemy William King of Scots into the hands of his ſouldiers about that very time, and did alſo with ſtormes beate backe into France his diſobedient ſonne the young King, being now vnder ſaile for England, ſcattering the whole Fleete, and almoſt ſinking it with tempeſt.

(77) The Kings other actions till his next returne into Normandy, which was not long after, (becauſe Lewis King of France, and his ſonne in law the young King Henrie, the head to which all this putrified humour drew, with the Earle of Flanders had laid a ſtrong ſiege to the Citie of Roan) * Thomas Walſingham comprehends in theſe few wordes; He tamed his rebels, put his enemies to flight, ſeized on their fortreſſes. And ſo hauing in a manner miraculouſly quieted the Realme, hee takes with him the King of Scotland, the Earles of Leiceſter and Cheſter, with other his chiefe Priſoners, * (whom hee afterwards firſt impriſoned at Cane in Normandy, & then at Faleis) but leauiug his ſeditious wife behinde him vnder ſtraight cuſtody, hee arriues with his puiſſance in Normandy, which being vnderſtood in the Confederates Campe, the ſame * brake vp, and firſt ſetting fire on all the engines of warre, retreated into France, in ſuch ſort, that the Engliſh ſouldiers laid hold vpon much munition and warlike furniture. Roger Houeden, (a very ſure Author) ſaith * that the confederates had onely beſieged Roan vpon one ſide, and that Lewis hearing that the victorious King Henrie was within Roan, did firſt ſend away the weake, and worſt of his Armie, and then deceiuing the Engliſh with a ſolemne promiſe of returning the next day, to enter into a conference with the King about making a finall agreement, did depart; ſo that Houeden aggrauates the diſhonour of the retreat, with the note of faith-breach.

(78) Let the greatneſſe and felicity of this King be now but ſleightly looked vpon, and it will appeare, that no Prince of thoſe times was hitherto ſo much bound to God for manifold fauours as hee. The King and power of France, after ſo many attempts with the young King of England, and all their forces, flying at his preſence without any ſtroke ſtrucken, the valiant king of Scotland priſoner, and the chiefeſt of his Rebels vnder his foote, England aſſured, Scotland diſmayed, Ireland retained, Wales miniſtring ſouldiers, Normandy in poſſeſſion, and all the coaſting Regions, Britaine, Anjou, Poictou, Main, Tourain, Limoſin, Gaſcoign, Guien, &c. from thence as farre as the Mountaines which ſeparate Spaine from France, vnder his dominion; and the bleſſing of Peace, ſhortly after enſuing, vpon ſuch termes as himſelfe could reaſonably wiſh, made him like another Salomon to be ſought vnto: his Wiſedome and Magnificence being in ſuch high credite through the Chriſtian World, that the Kings of Caſtile and Nauarre choſe him ſole Arbiter in their debate, which to both their contentment he moſt wiſely determined; and then * at one time in his Palace at Weſtminſter were ſeene together, the Ambaſſadours of Manuel Emperour of Conſtantinople, of Fredericke Emperour of Romans, of * William Archbiſhop of Triers in Germany, (a mighty Prince) of the Duke of Saxonie, and of Philipp Earle of Flanders. Moreouer he had the gouernment of France for a time, the Kingdome of Ieruſalem offered him, but refuſed, and two of his daughters married to the two Kings * of Caſtile and Sicilie.

(79) There was firſt therefore a truce taken betwixt the three Kings, Lewis and the two Henries; wherein Richard (who ſtood out) was left to his Fathers proſecution, who ſeeing himſelfe thus deſtitute after many flaſhes of preparation to reſiſt, and great conflicts with himſelfe, put himſelfe moſt humbly into his Fathers mercy, and throwing himſelfe * with teares at his feete, obtained the pardon hee begd, and a full reſtitution to his moſt inward grace and fauour. A moſt chriſtian, fatherly, wiſe, and happy Act; for Richard ouercome with this vnexpected and incredible goodneſſe, neuer deſiſted till he had brought the yong King to a finall attonement, armes armes being laid apart vpon all hands. The chiefe points of that wiſhed peace were: 1. That Henrie the young King, with Richard and Geffrey, his Brethren, ſhould returne, freed from all oathes of confederation, to the King their Fathers obedience, as to their Lord and Father. 2. That Priſoners ſhould be ſet at large without ranſome on all hands. 3. That William King of Scots, the Earle of Leiceſter and Cheſter, Ralph de Foulgiers, & other, who had compounded for their ranſome, before this concluſion, ſhould haue no benefit of this exemption. 4. That King Henry the Father ſhould take aſſurance of loialty toward him by hoſtage, or oath of ſuch as were enlarged. 5. That King Henry the ſon ſhould ratifie that Grant which his Father the King had made to his ſon Iohn, of ſome Caſtles, & yeerly rents in England, &c. The Seale it ſelfe, wherewith the yong king made this mentioned Ratification, we haue here annexed.

That King William was to pay 100000. li. Sterling for his ranſome, the one half in preſent coine, the other 50000. li. vpon time. 2. That for aſſurance of that ſumme the Earledomes of Northumberland, Cumberland, & Huntington ſhould reſt in morgage. 3. That K. William ſhould moue no warre againſt England for the retention of thoſe lands. 4. (82) The face of England at this preſent, was like that of a quiet skie and ſea, no blaſt, no billow, no appearing ſigne of diſcontentment; which the better to continue, King Henrie the Father accompanied with the King his ſonne, omitted no office of a juſt and prudent Gouernour, viſiting a great part of his Realme in perſon, conſulting, ordering and enacting ſuch Lawes and courſes, as might moſt eſtabliſh the good of Peace. Hence it came, that at London both the Kings were preſent in a Synode, in which Richard lately choſen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, did publiſh (*with the Kings aſſent) certain Canons for the better gouernement of the Church of England, beginning thus; At the true fountaine of all happy rule, that is to ſay, at the honour of God, and eſtabliſhment of Religion and Diſcipline, &c. and amongſt the reſt, this one Canon in eſpecial words is enacted, both by authority of the King & Synod, (and indeed worthy for euer to be in force) That euery Patrone taking reward for any preſentation, ſhould for euer looſe the Patronage thereof. And the ſame King not long after being at Woodſtocke, in accompliſhment of ſuch holy purpoſes, by aduiſe of the Clergy prouided men to ſuch Biſhopricks, Abbacies, and principal Cures as were vacant, where King Henrie the Father forgat not his true friend Iohn of Oxenford, whom he preferred to the See of Norwich.

In an other Parliament, not long after, at Northampton, he cauſed England to be diuided into ſixe circuits, & to each Circuit three Iuſticiars Itinerants deputed; and as well to giue his lawes more free paſſage, as alſo the better to ſecure himſelfe, hee threw to the Earth ſundry * Caſtles which had bin formerly kept againſt him, as Leiceſter, Huntington, Walton, Groby, Stutesbury, &c. and had the reſt both in his Engliſh and in his French Dominions committed to his diſpoſition.

(88) Who would not haue thought, that this ſtirring Prince, ſhould haue had opportunitie to end his daies in peace and glorie? but it was otherwiſe ordained by God, and ancient Writers hold, he was principally ſcourged, for being drawne, by ſeeming reaſons of State, to put off an holy enterprize, the occaſion whereof, was laide as it were at his foote. (97) In the treaties therefore between Henry and Philip; the demaunds of Philip on the behalfe of Richard were ſuch, and ſo vnſafe for the King (as that all his ſubiects ſhould ſweare fealty to Richard during the Fathers life; but yet reſeruing their allegiance to the Father) that Richard apparantly fell off, and became Liegeman for Normandy, &c. to Philip King of France; and at a new Treaty (by mediation of a Cardinall Legate) the demands of Philip being more hard then before, as that King Henry ſhould not onely ſettle the Kingdome vpon Richard, but take Iohn alſo with him into Paleſtine, or that otherwiſe Richard would not goe (being iealous of his brothers grace with his Father:) Henrie would conſent to none of thoſe inſolent propoſitions, but diſdaining to ſeeme to be enforced, they betooke themſelues on all ſides to their ſwords.

(98) The effect whereof was, that former good fortunes forſaking King Henry, hee ſuſtained many loſſes by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, and was driuen out of Mentz in Main; (the city where hee was borne, and which hee loued aboue all other places) by firing of the Suburbs before the enemie came, being caſually conſumed, he was glad to yeeld to ſuch conditions as it pleaſed Philip to preſcribe. It is written* that at the meeting of theſe two Kings, the skie being cleare, a thunderbolt ſtroke betweene them, and after a little pauſe comming together again, it thundered more terribly, ſo that Henry had falne off his horſe, but that his people ſuſtained him; whereupon he came preſently to an end, though it were to his vnſpeakeable griefe; his Kingly heart being vſed to giue, and not to take conditions.

(99) Fearefull was the ſpeech which King Henry, when hee abandoned Mentz by reaſon of the fire, "vttered againſt Richard; which was, That ſith he "had taken from him that day the thing that he moſt "loued in this world, he would requite him, for af-"ter that day hee would depriue him of that thing "which in him ſhould beſt pleaſe a Child, to wit, his "Heart. But after the peace concluded, (vpon mediation) betweene the ſides, another thing ſtrucke neerer; for finding the name of his ſonne Iohn firſt in the Catalogue of the Conſpiratours againſt him in that action, hee bitterly curſed the howre of his birth, laying Gods curſe and his vpon his ſonnes, which hee would neuer recall, for any perſwaſions of the Biſhops and others: but comming to Chinon, fell there grieuouſly ſicke, and feeling death approach, hee cauſed himſelfe to bee borne into the Church before the Altar, where after humble confeſſion, and ſorrow for his ſinnes, he departed this life.

He was buried at Font-Euerard.

His Wife.

(101) Eleanor, the Wife of King Henry, was the eldeſt of the two Daughters, and the ſole Heire of William Duke of Aquitane, the fift of that name, and the ninth in ſucceſſion, ſonne of Duke William the fourth, her Mother was Daughter to Raimund Earle of Tholouſe, and her great Dowrie was motiue firſt to Lewis King of France, (who had two daughters by her, Mary and Alice) & after to Henry King of England, to marry her. There are of the * French Hiſtorians who report that King Henry had a former wife, and that ſhe bare vnto him Prince Henry: but Writers of our owne (and * ſome alſo of the French,) acknowledge but onely Eleanor for his wife. Certaine it is, that King Henries times were much famouſed by two Women of much differing qualities; the one was his renowned Mother Matildis, whoſe Epitaph thus compriſed part of her glory.

The other was this Eleanor his Wife; the firſt cauſe of theſe bloudy Warres, which long after continued as hereditary betwixt England and France, yea and the bellowes of that vnnaturall diſcord, betwixt her husband & his ſonnes. Shee much out liued her husband (as a bad thing ſtickes longeſt) being ſo' happy as to ſee three of her ſonnes, aduanced to the Crown, and ſo vnhappy as to ſee two of them in their graues: Shee departed this life the yeere of Chriſts incarnation, 1204. the ſixt of her ſonne Iohns raigne, and was buried in Font-Euerard, by K. Henry her husband.

His Concubine.

(102) Roſamund, ſo called for her ſurpaſſing beauty, was the daughter of Walter Lord Clifford: whoſe face and feature ſo dazeled King Henries eyes, as by gifts he got this Paragon to his bed, and to hide her from his Iunoes eye, hee built (as our hiſtorians report) an intricate Labyrinth at Woodſtocke, & therein beſtowed this his pearle of eſteeme, vnto whoſe cloſet (for the inexplicate windings) none could approach, but the King himſelfe, or ſuch as he inſtructed. Notwithſtanding his iealous Queene Eleanor by a clew of ſilke, fallen from Roſamunds lappe, as ſhee ſate to take ayre, and ſuddenly fleeing from the ſight of the ſearcher, the end of the ſilke faſtened to her foot, and the clew ſtill vnwinding, remained behinde: which the Queene followed, till ſhee had found what ſhee ſought, and vpon Roſamund ſo vented her ſpleene, as the Lady liued not long after. Her body was buried at Godſtowe neere Oxford, a little Nunnery in the rich Meadows of Euenlod, with this Epitaph in olde ryme vpon her Tombe.

But afterwards thoſe chaſte ſiſters gathered her bones, and put them in a perfumed lether bagge, incloſing them ſo in leade, and layd them againe in the Church vnder a fayre large graue-ſtone; about whoſe edges a fillet of braſſe was in-layd, and thereon written her name and prayſe. A croſſe likewiſe theſe ſiſters erected neere vnto the entrance of their gate, and to the honour of her memory theſe verſes inſcribed.

His iſſue.

(102) William, the eldeſt ſonne and firſt childe of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was born before his father was King, and while hee was but Duke of Normandie, in the eighteenth yeere of the raigne of King Stephen, 1152. and the fourth yeere after, (his father being then King, and in the ſecond yeere of his raigne) the Nobilitie of England ſware vnto him their fealty, as to the heire apparant of the Kingdome, at the Caſtle of Wallingford in Barkſhire; but hee deceaſed the yeere following, being the third of his fathers raigne, and the fift of his owne age 1156. He was buried in the Monaſtery of Reading at the feete of his great Grandfather, King Henry the firſt.

(103) Henry, the ſecond ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, being borne the laſt of February 1156. was their heire apparant; after the death of his brother William; was Duke of Normandie, Earle of Aniou and Maigne; and was crowned King of England at Weſtminſter, by Roger Arch-biſhop of Yorke, the fifteenth of Iulie 1170. His Wife was Margaret, daughter of Lewis the Yonger, King of France, married to him at Nuburgh in Normandie, the ſecond of Nouember 1160. crowned Queene at Wincheſter, by Rotrocke of Warwicke Arch-biſhop of Roan, the 21. of Nouember 1163. and ſuruiuing him was re-married to Bela King of Hungarie: He died without iſſue, before his father, at Marcell in Touraine, the eleuenth of Iulie, the twenty ſixe yeere of his fathers raigne 1182. and was buried in the Church of our Lady at Roan.

(104) Richard, the third ſonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Oxenford, (in the Kings Pallace there, called Beau-Mount) in September the fourth yeere of his Fathers raigne 1157. He proued a Prince of great valor, and was therefore ſurnamed in French Cuer-de-Lion; in Engliſh Lions-heart: hee was created Earle of Poyctou, and had the whole Dutchie of Aquitaine, for which he did his homage, to King Lewis the Yonger of France, in the eighteenth yeere yeere of his fathers raigne 1170. yet afterward hee conceiued ſome diſcontentment againſt his father, and maintained warres vpon him, but was reconciled againe into his loue, and ſucceeded him in his Kingdome.

(106) Geffrey, the fourth ſonne of King Henrie, and of Queene Eleanor, was borne the twenty third of September, in the fifth yeere of his fathers raigne 1159. Hee married Conſtance, daughter and heire of Conan Duke of Britaine, and in her right was Duke of Britaine, & did his homage to his brother Henry for the ſame Dutchie, and receiued the homages of the Barons of the ſame: he died at Paris, in the 32. yeere of his fathers raigne 1186. the nineteenth of Auguſt, and is buried in the quire of our Ladies Church there: he had iſſue Arthur Duke of Britaine, borne after his fathers deceaſe, the heire apparant of King Richard, and by ſome ſuppoſed to be made away by King Iohn; and alſo Eleanor called the Damſell of Britaine, who died in priſon in the raigne of King Henrie the third.

(107) Philip, the fifth ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, may be miſtruſted, to be miſtaken by Antiquaries of our time, as miſ-vnderſtanding the ancient writers, who mentioning the birth of Philip the Kings ſonne, might by good likelihood, be thought to meane, Philip ſonne of Lewis the Yonger King of France, who was borne about this time, and was after King of the ſame Countrey. But M. Thomas Talbot, an exact trauailer in genealogies, hath not onely ſet him downe in this place, amongſt the children of this King, but alſo warranteth the ſame, to be done with good authority: howſoeuer, it is apparant, his life was very ſhort.

(108) Iohn, the ſixth and yongeſt ſonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, in Anno 1166. he was ieſtingly ſurnamed by his father Sans-terræ, in Engliſh, without Land, becauſe he was borne laſt, as if there had beene nothing left for him: Notwithſtanding ſoone after, he was created Earle of Mortaigne, and had moreouer by degrees, the Earledomes of Cornwall, and Gloceſter, the Counties of Derby and Lancaſter, the Honors of Wallinford and Nottingham, the Caſtles of Tikhill, Marlborow, and Ludgarſall, with many other great Seigniories, and (aboue them all) was alſo Lord of Ireland, and at the laſt ſucceeded his brother Richard in all his Dominions, and was King of England.

(109) Maud, the eldeſt daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, borne in the third yeere of her fathers raigne, married to Henry, ſurnamed the Lion, Duke of Saxonie, had iſſue by him Henry Duke of Saxony, Lothar that died young, Otho the fourth German Emperor, and William borne at Wincheſter, progenitor of the Dukes of Brunſwicke, who bare for their Armes, the Coat of England, with the two Lions, as King Henry his Grandfather bare, before the match with Queene Eleanor, and Maud married to Geffrey Earle of Perch: She ſuruiued him, and died in the firſt yeere of the reigne of her brother King Richard, and was buried by her husband, in the Church of S. Blaſe at Brunſwicke.

(110) Eleanor, the ſecond daughter of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Roan in Normandy, in the eight yeere of her fathers raigne, 1162. She was married to Alfonſo, the ninth of that name, ſurnamed the Good, King of Caſtile in Spaine, and had iſſue by him Sanches, that dyed in his infancie; Ferdinando that died in his youth, Henry King of Caſtile after his father, Blanch Queen of France, wife to King Lewis the 8. and mother of S. Lewis. Berenger married to Alfonſo King of Lion: Vrraca Queene of Portugall, and Eleanor wife of Iames King of Arragon.

(111) Ioane, the third and yongeſt daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne at the City of Angiers in France, in the moneth of October, the 13. yeare of her Fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1166. When ſhe was eleuen yeeres of age; ſhee was with great honour conueied to the City of Palermo, and there married to William the ſecond of that name, King of Sicil, Duke of Apulia, and Prince of Capua, vpon Sunday the 13. day of Februarie, 1177. and was crowned Queene the ſame day, at the ſame place. Shee had a ſonne by him named Boamund, whom his Father when he was returned from his Chriſtning, created Duke of Apulia: but the child died firſt, & the Father after, leauing no iſſue. And ſhe ſuruiuing, married againe, and was the third wife of Raimund the fourth of that name, Earle of Tholouze: By him ſhe had iſſue Raimund the laſt Earle of that houſe, Bertrand Lord of Branquell, Montelore, and Saluiac, and a daughter married to Berald of Elbeire, Prince of Orenge.

His Naturall Iſſue.

(112) William the Naturall ſonne of King Henry, borne of Roſamund, was ſurnamed in French, Longeſpee, in Engliſh, Long-Sword. He was Earle of Salisburie, in right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and heire of William Earle of that County, ſonne of Earle Patrick; by whom hee had iſſue William Earle of Saliſbury, Stephen Earle of Vlſter, Ela Counteſſe of Warwicke, Idà Lady Beucham of Bedford, and Iſabell Lady Veſcie: his ſonne Earle William the ſecond, had Earle William the third, Father of Margaret, Wife of Henry Lacie Earle of Lincolne: he died in the Caſtle of old Salisbury, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of the New City, in the ninth yeare of the raigne of King Henry the third.

(113) Geffrey an other Naturall ſonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Roſamund aforeſaid: This man in his tender youth, was (by his Fathers procurement) made Arch-deacon of Lincolne, and after Biſhop of that See, which hee held aboue ſeuen yeeres without conſecration, and then reſigning it, in the yere, 1181. into the hands of Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Father; hee was made Chancellor of England, and afterward by his brother King Richard, he was aduanced to the Archbiſhopricke of Yorke, (being conſecrated at Tours in France, An. 1191.) which See he gouerned with good approbation. But in the time of his Brother King Iohn, hee vnder-went many difficulties, by oppoſing the Kings purpoſes, who therefore made ſeiſure of his whole ſtate, and An. 1207. he left the Land, and after fiue yeeres baniſhment, died, viz. An. 1213.

(114) Morgan, another Naturall ſonne of King Henry, is thought by * ſome (becauſe ſo ſmall mention is made of him) to haue beene of no long life after his birth, and to haue been born of ſome woman in Wales, where this Chriſtian name is moſt common vſed, and whether this King vpon many occaſions, ſometime reſorted. But *ſometime others (whoſe ſtudious paines, deſerue much thankes of poſterity) report, that he was gotten on the wife of one Rodolph Bloeth (or Blewet) a Knight, and liued both to bee Prouoſt of Beuerley, and to be elected to the Biſhopricke of Durham, when comming to Rome for a diſpenſation (becauſe his Baſtardie made him otherwiſe vncapable) the Pope willed him to profeſſe himſelfe Blewets lawfull ſonne, and not the Kings Naturall, promiſing to conſecrate him on that condition: but he, vſing the aduice of one William Lane his Clerke, told the Pope, that for no wordly promotion hee would renounce his father, or deny himſelfe to be of Royall bloud: ſo blinde were ſome Prelates of thoſe times, who eſteemed ſpirituall functions, to be but worldly promotions.

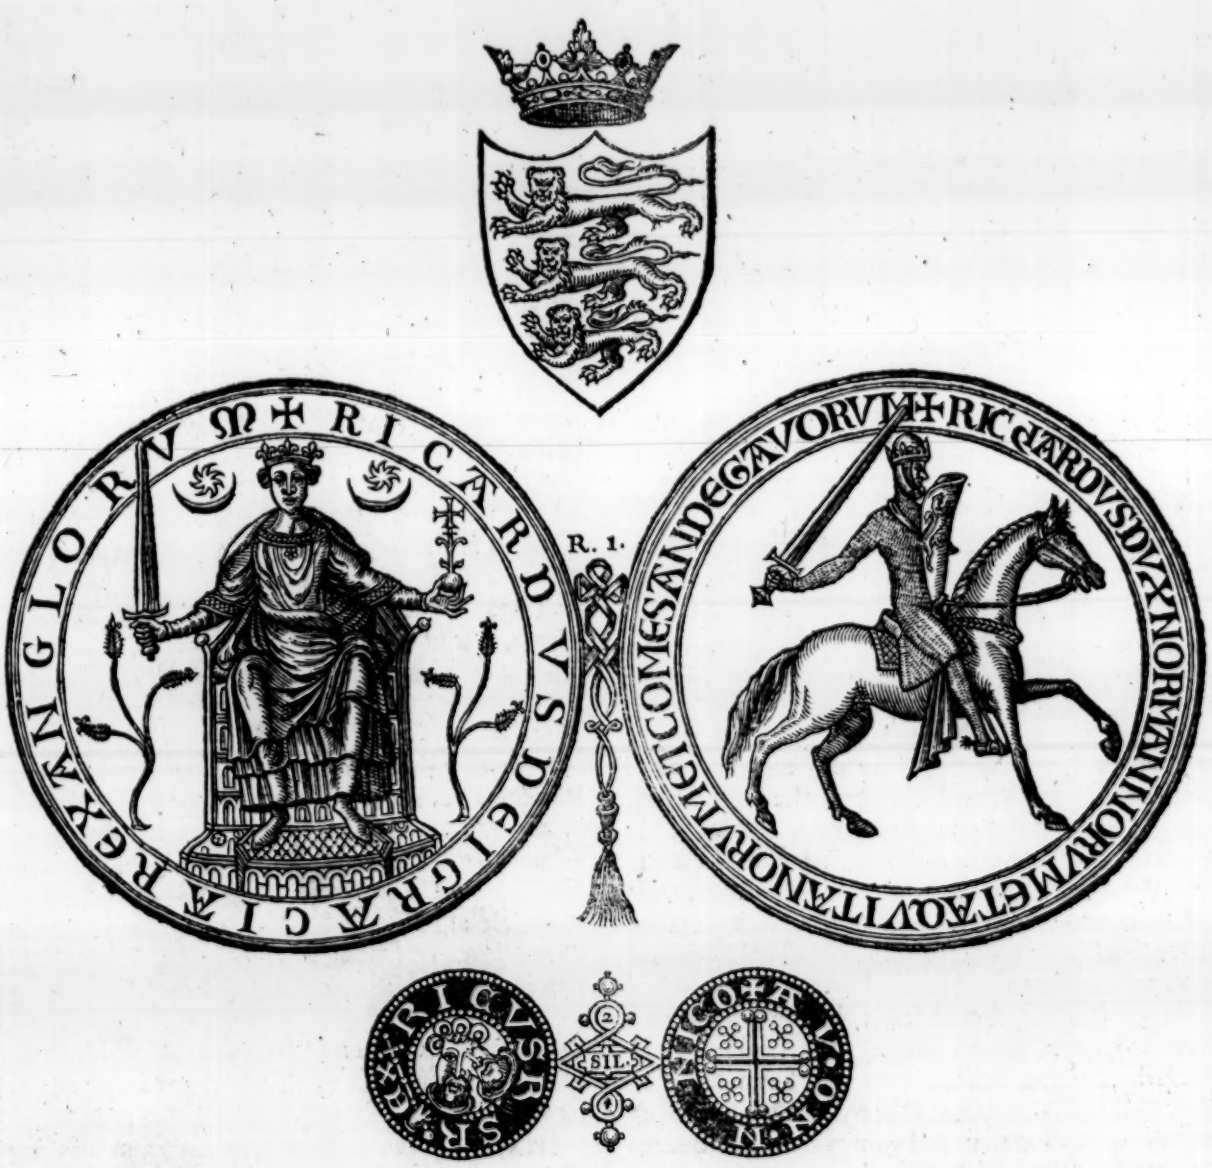
Richard I.

RICHARD THE FIRST, DVKE OF NORMANDY, GVYEN AND AQVITAINE, &c. THE FORTIE FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 44.



CHAPTER VII.

An.D.1199.

RICHARD succeeding to his deceaſed Father Henrie, brought forth that wonder, which a Writer of that age thus celebrated,

Mira cano; Sol occubuit,
Nox nulla ſecuta eſt.

A wonder ſtrange I write,
the Sun did ſet, yet was no night.

Meaning, that though Henry were dead, yet the glory and happineſſe of the Land was not thereby clouded, for that Richard was another Sunne, and in ſome reſpects farre the more bright, and farther ſhining of the two; as hauing for honour of Chriſtian Cheualrie, wholy conſecrated his warlike minde and actions to the ſeruice of God, and re-aduancement of the Croſſe of Chriſt, diſhonoured by the Infidels in Aſia: in which enterpriſe hee was ſo feruently zealous, that from the time of his Fathers death (in whoſe vowes it had beene) hee meditated ſcarſe any thing elſe, diſpoſing the affaires of his Eſtate (but not * careleſly, as ſome would impoſe) as of things which did but onely vnder-ſerue, and conduce to the maine and principall end of aduancing his Sauiours glory, whereunto he iudged that action did tend.

* Rand. Higden in Rich. 1.

(2) Hauing therefore ordered his weightier buſineſſes in Normandy, and other his tranſmarine Dominions, & in England by his letters, ſet* the Queen his Mother at liberty from that captiuity, wherein her late husband the King had long detained her, (who ſenſible of others woe by her owne, did afterward exerciſe many workes of mercy in that kinde) he cuts ouer hither, aſwell to receiue all the rights of Soueraignety, and to ſettle the ſame; as alſo to leuie meanes for proceeding in his intended holy voyage, together with Philip King of Fance, and other Chriſtian Potentates.

* Ger. Dor.

(3) And though before his Coronation, moſt Writers doe not call him a King; yet ſure it is, that he Kingly power before Coronation.

he and others did immediately, and vnqueſtionably, from the firſt accruement of the intereſt, (which was at his Fathers laſt gaſpe) exerciſe all the offices of the royall power; for ſo he reſtored Robert Earle of Leiceſter to his whole eſtate: So plaine it is, that our Gouernment allowes not the dangerous convulſions, and empty ſpaces of an Interregnum, ſuch as in meere electiue States are common, if not continuall.

Rog. Houed. fol. 374.

(4) But in nothing more could this noble Prince ſhew his iudgement (though he were otherwiſe Sagacis ingenij, of a ſharpe and ſearching wit) then in this: That hee baniſhed from his familiarity, and (as my *Author ſaith) hated all thoſe of what profeſſion ſoeuer they were, who had forſaken his Father, and both retained, and enricht thoſe other, who had loyally ſtood for him againſt himſelfe in all aſſaies.

King Richards choiſe of friends and ſeruants.

 Geru. Dorob.*

(5) At his Coronation, which was moſt magnificently performed at Weſtminſter, by Baldwyne Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the points of the Oath which hee made to God, and the Kingdome of England, at the Altar vpon the holy Euangeliſts, before the Prelates, Nobles, and whole people * were theſe: 1. That all the daies of his life he would beare peace, honour, and reuerence to God, and holy Church, and the Ordinances thereof: 2. That in the people vnto him committed, hee would exerciſe Right, Iuſtice, and Equitie. 3. That hee would blot forth naughty lawes, and peruerſe cuſtomes, if any were brought vpon his Kingdome; and would enact good lawes, and the ſame in good faith keepe, and without mal-Engyn. Which oath being moſt ſolemnely taken, and the ſacred vnction performed; the Archbiſhop ſtanding at the Altar, forbad him, on the behalfe of Almighty God, to aſſume that honour, vnleſſe hee had a full purpoſe to keepe what hee had ſworne: whereto Richard aſſenting, and with his owne hands, humbly taking the ponderous Crowne Imperiall from off the Altar, in ſignification, as is probable, that hee held it onely from God, hee deliuers it to the Archbiſhop, who thereupon accompliſhed all the Ceremonies of Coronation.

Chiefe matters at the Coronation of Richard.

 Roger Houeden. fol. 374.*

(6) Which Act was accidently hanſeld, and auſpicated with the bloud of many Iewes (though vtterly againſt the Kings will) who in a tumult (raiſed by the Ocean*) were furiouſly murthered, which (though it were afterward puniſhed by the Lawes) might ſeem a preſage, that this Lion-hearted King (as his by-name Ceur-de-Lion did import) ſhould be a ſpeciall deſtroyer of the enemies of our Sauiour.

Iewes ſlain at the Coronation.

 So Martiall cals the multitude.*

(7) After counſell therefore (firſt moouer in all worthy enterpriſes) Money was in his firſt and chiefeſt cares; for raiſing whereof, to furniſh the intended pilgrimage, he ſold, morgaged, eſtated, and (by a thouſand princely skills) as if he ſhould neuer haue come againe, added incredible heapes to thoſe huge ſums, which he had ſcruzed out of Stephen de Turnham, his fathers Treaſurer, (amounting to eleuen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, if ſome ſay true) all hoorded by King Henry. What could indeed be ſaid enough for ſuch a voyage? and it was a cogitation worthy ſo glorious a purpoſe, ſo to order his eſtate, as if hee were not to returne at all; becauſe, looking backe doth vn-bend and ſoften reſolutions.

Richard purueis for the Holy Land.

(8) As for men and ſoldiers, the Prelates, Friars, and other Preachers, had ſtirred vp innumerable, by their manifold exhortations (the Archbiſhop of Canterbury hauing * trauailed through Wales in perſon for that purpoſe, going afterward with the King to Paleſtine, where alſo * he died) in pulpits and priuate conferences, ſounding nothing but the Croſſe and Paſſion of Chriſt, calling the world to reuenge his cauſe vpon the Pagans, and ſetting ſoules on fire with vehement geſtures, actions, and perſwaſions. But the kingdome of England he ordered thus.

 Gir. Camb.*
 Rog. Houeden. Matth. Paris.*

(9) The onely maine danger of the State in his abſence, was in his brother Iohn Earle of Mortone, of whoſe ambition hee was ſomewhat iealous, as

* knowing that King Henrie, not long before his death, had intended the Crowne to him: to conquer therfore his appetites, with bounty, and munificence; and to take away all murmuration in him, for want of Princely competencies, King Richard did as it were ſhare the Realme with him, giuing him ſixe Earledomes, Cornwall, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaſter, beſides Caſtles, Honors, Manors, Forreſts, and much other Riches, and finallie the Earledome of Gloſter, with the Heire of that County to be his Wife, though the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury forbad the Nuptialls, alledging ſhee was within the degrees of conſanguinitie.

 Geruaſius.*

(10) But leſt, through euill nature or aduiſe, Earle Iohn ſhould conuert thoſe ſo great gifts to the ſubuerſion of the beſtower, He entruſted him with no part of the Regall power, as the Key, and ſecret of his proper ſafety: but laid the maine burthen of Gouernment vpon William Longchamp Biſhop of Ely, * chiefe Iuſticiar, and Lord Chancellor of England, and Papall Legate, (a perſon out of all ſuſpition for aſpiring to the Crowne) wherby was conferred vpon him, whatſoeuer either King or Pope could grant, for accompliſhment of his authority; ſo that hee might well be ſtiled * Prince and Prieſt of England; as hee was one, the moſt powerfull ſubiect for the time, that perhaps this Realme hath had: for, though the King had (as it were) ioyned with him in Commiſsion, one Hugh Biſhop of Durham, for the parts of England beyond Humber; yet, as it * hapned in the Conſulſhip of Cæſar and Bibulus, that nothing was reported of Bibulus, but all of Cæſar; ſo did Longchamp in a ſhort time eaſily make himſelfe ſole and abſolute, his ſway burying in ſilence, the name and endeauours of his Colleague.

Roger. Houed. Matth. Paris. & alij.*
 Sueto. li. 1. c. 20.*

(11) Thus the ſumme of command, or the Soueraigne power it ſelf, was in the Chancellor as Vice-roy, but for defence and preſeruation of his iuſtice, he * did ſubordinate or aſſociate to thoſe Biſhops, William Earle of Arundell, Hugh Bardolfe, William Marſhall, Geffrey Fitz-Peter, William Bruuer, Robert de Whitfield, Roger Fitz-Remfrey, wherein he did ſhew his loue and care of the Engliſh Nation, as alſo of Iuſtice it ſelfe: for that many of theſe, were of the moſt honourable Peeres of the Land (and not men bred-vp or formerly enured to make Iuſtice, or their owne Tongues venall, for a fee:) honour being the rule of their proceedings, and ſtrength of priuate fortunes, with their Princes fauour, the pillar to ſuſtaine that honour.

 Rog. Houed.*

Iuſtice is beſt where it brings Honour rather then riches.

(12) There remained to prouide for (before hee left England) the neighbour-hood of Scotland and Wales, which might otherwiſe make vſe of his abſence, to his preiudice: But Rheſe ap Gruffith (of whom there is extant a ſhort but elegant Panegyris) Prince of South-Wales (being already in amitie) came as farre as Oxford toward him; but becauſe the King (who was there) came not in perſon to meete him (as his father King Henry had done) the Prince (notwithſtanding Earle Iohn the Kings only brother had conducted him from the Marches with ſpeciall honor) tooke it in ſo high ſcorne and indignation, (for euen the meaneſt, from whom ſeruice or loue is expected, will againe expect regard) that hee forthwith returned into his Countrey, without once ſaluting the King; who by this neglect, loſt Rheſes loue, as vpon the like omiſſion, and vnreſpectiueneſſe, Auguſtine (the too ſupercilious Monke) did leeſe the affections of the Monkes of Bangor, Rheſes owne countrie-men, in another part of Wales.

(13) As for William King of Scots (a very worthy Prince) hee iournyed hither to King Richard into England, and heere concluded a firme friendſhip, which hee kept very religiouſly, euen in the greateſt troubles of King Richard, to the glory of himſelfe and his Nation, and as ſome write, ſent his Brother Dauid with 5000. Scots, to ſerue him in the ſacred warres. (14) The State of England being thus in the maine, and other meane points eſtabliſhed, King Richard croſt the Seas into France to Philip King thereof, according to appointment, that from thence, with mindes & forces vnited, they might ſet forward vnder the Enſigne of the Croſſe; which after ſome ſtay (occaſioned by the* death of the French Queen) they did, vpon theſe Chriſtian and friendly termes; 1. That each of them preſerue the others honour, and beare faith to him for life, and member, and earthly dignity. 2. That neither of them ſhall faile the other in their affairs; but that the King of France ſhall helpe the King of England to defend his land, euen as he would defend the City of Paris, if it were beſieged; and Richard King of England, ſhall helpe the King of France to defend his land, euen as hee would defend his City Roan if it were beſieged. This * being fairely engroſt, and afterward ratified with oath, and ſent, by the Kings themſelues in perſon, the Earles and Barons ſware in ſolemne manner, that they would not treſpaſſe againſt their fealty, nor ſtirre any warre in either of the Kings Dominions, ſo long as they were in that pilgrimage: on the other ſide, the * Archbiſhops and Biſhops did firmely promiſe (in verbo veritatis, in the word of truth) that they would accurſe and excommunicate all ſuch as did tranſgreſſe this agreement.

(15) Thus (after ſome neceſſary ſtaies) theſe two the greateſt Monarchs of the Weſt, ſet forward ouer land (toward the publike ſeruice of Chriſtianity) with ſuch numbers as themſelues thought beſt; which were ſo great, that hauing aduanced (not without ſome little loſſe of people by the* fall of the Bridge ouer the riuer Rhene at Lions, which brake by reaſon of the throng,) beyond the ſaid violent ſtreame they parted company; Philip paſſing ouer the Alpes into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-ſide at Marſilia, there to meet with his Nauie, which being compact of all the chiefe Ships in England, Normandie, and other his French Dominions, was there appointed to attend.

 Rog. Houeden. Matth. Paris.*

(16) But the voyage being very long, and King Richard comming to the Port before his Fleet, after eight daies expectation there, waxing impatient of delay, embarkt himſelfe *in 20. hired Gallies, and ten great hulkes or Buſſes (a kind of ſhipping as it ſeemes peculiar then to the Mediterranean ſeas) and ſet ſaile toward Meſſana in Sicilia, the Rendeuow of both the Kings, and of their Armies: in which paſſage, lying at Anchor (on occaſion,) in the mouth of the riuer Tyber, not farre from Rome; Octauianus the Biſhop of Hoſtia repaired vnto him, deſiring him in the Popes name, that he would viſit his Holineſſe; which the King denied to doe, laying to the Popes charge many ſhamefull matters touching the Romiſh Simony & Couetouſneſſe, with many other reproches, alleadging that they tooke 700. Markes for conſecration of the Biſhop of Mains, 1500. Markes for the Legatiue power of William Biſhop of Ely; but of the Archbiſhop of Burdeaux an infinite ſumme of money: whereupon he refuſed to ſee Rome. Thus (after ſundry accidents and commings on land) hearing that his Nauy was ſafe, hee ſtaid for them by the way, & then came to anchor not long after (to wit, 23. of September) before the City of Meſſana, with ſo great a ſhew of power, and ſound of Warlike Inſtruments, and other ſignes of Maieſty, in the ſight of Philip and his French, and of many other Nations there aſſembled, that it ſtroke horror into the Inhabitants, (ſaith Houeden,) and moued no ſmall enuy in the hearts of his confederates.

(17) From this time forward, as it may ſeeme (the Enemy of Concord feeding the maleuolent paſſions of men with perpetuall matter of debate) the King of France was neuer truly King Richards friend in heart, but vpon the ſame day (whither ſtreightned in prouiſions or otherwiſe) he left the King of England; but by contrary winde was driuen back before night, where (after many troubles and quarrels betweene the Engliſh and Sicilians) the two Kings peaced againe, and ſetled a new and as firme a league as they could, during that martiall pilgrimage.

(18) Tancred was at that time King of Sicilia, by vſurpation, after the death of William, who had married Ioan ſiſter of King Richard, whom (at that time vpon diſpleaſure and quarrell being priſoner) Tancred ſet at liberty, ſending her in honourable manner to her brother, and did yeeld to ſundry Articles, and alſo preſent paiments of ample ſummes. Feare wrought on both parts; for Richard being among ſtrangers, and not very ſure of the French, ſeiſed vpon a ſtrength of the Griffons (people much redoubted in thoſe parts, till the arriuall *of the Engliſh) and in a tumult tooke the City of Meſſana it ſelfe, where hee diſplayed his Enſignes, till for the French Kings loue he was content to diſ-aduance them, & to entruſt the City to the Knights Templars and Hoſpitalers, vntill Tancred had fulfilled all ſuch things as Richard did challenge to be due, being many.

out any reluctation) to put his dominions (vpon any his breach) vnder ſeuereſt cenſures.

(22) This peace and accord being happily thus concluded, King Tancred (hauing moſt royally and louingly feaſted the King of England for three daies and three nights in a Caſtle of his) diſcouered, vpon the way at Tauernium in his returne, a foule and vnprincely conſpiracy of Philip (whom one of our writers cals the vain-glorious King) againſt the head and ſafety of King Richard; which comming to bee ſcanned betweene the two Kings, the French charged the Engliſh with picking of quarrels; and added, that vnleſſe Richard married his ſiſter Alice, according as he ought, hauing bin contracted long before together, he would be his enemy while he breathed; whereunto King Richard (being preſſed) did replie: That his * ſiſter during the time of her abode in England, had a childe by his Father Henry King of England, which he was ready to proue by many witneſſes there preſent: ſo that King Richard had farre more cauſe then a ſuſpition of diſhoneſty (which * ſome write) to refuſe the marriage. This falling out ſo ſhamefully, Philip (vpon certaine conditions betweene Richard and him) left him at liberty to take a wife where he thought good, but neuer (as it may ſeeme) forgaue him his euill will while they two liued together.

(23) And becauſe acts of Chriſtian remorſe and humility are too rare among the Great ones of this vaine world, it were a crime to pretermit the exemplar humiliation of this famous Generall K. Richard, at this time, who (to vſe my * Authors words) inſpired with diuine grace, and ſtudying to fit himſelfe for the great attempt he had in hand, was ſtung at the ſoule with ſo iuſt compunction for his ſinnes, that calling before him his Archbiſhops and Biſhops into a Chappell, at the houſe where hee was lodged, without the walls of Meſſana; hee bluſhed not to make a penitent confeſſion of his manifold exceſſes, humbly praying God of mercy, and them (as his ſubordinate Miniſters) of Abſolution; and God (ſaith Houeden) *reſpected him with the eyes of Mercy, and gaue him a penitent heart, ſo that from thenceforth he proued a man fearing God, eſchuing euill, and doing "good. O fælicem illum, &c. O happy he, who ſo fals, "that he may riſe more ſtrong: O happy he, who after "penitence, relapſeth not into fault and ruine.

(24) Whereupon addicting his mind to diuine contemplations, & meditation of the Chriſtian Church, whoſe Champion now he was; he deſired conference of one Ioachim (a Ciſtercian Abbot) whoſe great learning and deep vnderſtanding in the Scriptures, with an opinion of a Propheticall inſpiration, made him ſo famous ouer the world, that King Richard ſent for him, being then in Calabria neere Sicilie, whom at his comming he heard preaching & expounding the Apocalyſe of Saint Iohn, touching the afflictions of the Church, and of Antichriſt, which (ſaith he) was then borne, and in the City of Rome, and ſhall be aduanced in the See Apoſtolike, of whom the Apoſtle ſaid, he ſhould extoll himſelfe aboue all that is called God; and that the ſeuen Crownes were the Kings and Princes of the earth which obeyed him. Surely, neere about this very time hapned that in Rome, which might ſeem to giue great probability to that Abbots opinion, eſpecially, if Emperours and Kings be truly called * Gods, ouer whom Antichriſt alſo ſhould extol himſelfe: for in the ſame moneth that Richard left Meſſana, was the Coronation of Henry the Emperor, and his Empreſſe Conſtantia, in S. Peters Church; where Pope Celeſtine the very next day after his owne conſecration to the *Papacie, ſate in his Pontificall chaire, holding the Emperiall golden Crowne betwixt his feete, and the Emperour (as likewiſe the Empreſſe) ſtooping low, receiued on his head the Diadem from the Popes feet; and preſently againe the Pope ſtrake the Emperors Crowne with his foot, and daſht * it to the ground; ſignifying that he had power to throw him (vpon his demerits) out of his Empire: but the Cardinals catching vp the crowne put it againe on the Emperours head.*

(25) The ſame day in which Philip & his French forces ſet ſaile out of the Hauen of Meſſana, arriued Elianor King Richards mother, accompanied with Berengaria his new intended Spouſe, daughter to Sanctius King of Nauarre, whom afterward hee tooke to wife in Cyprus; but his Mother after a ſhort ſtay returned by Rome into England, leauing the young Lady with Ioan Queene Dowager of Sicilie, both which accompanied the King toward the holy Land, his whole Nauie being * one hundred and fifty great ſhips, and fifty three Gallies, well appointed for the warre, and * many other Sailes and Veſſels: and (not to omit the ſame, becauſe it is recorded as a ſingularity) he had among all theſe, * thirteene Buces or Buſcies, which had each of them three courſe of Sailes to ſaile with: but no Writer (ſo farre as wee yet find) declares what numbers of Souldiers were in the Engliſh Armie.

(26) This Nauie royall, betweene the Iſles of Rhodes and Cyprus, (for the honor and good of King Richard) was ſcattered by God with a terrible tempeſt, ſome one or two of which ſuffered wreack vpon the Iſle of Cyprus, whom * Curſac (or as other call him Iſakius, Emperor of the Griffons) being a * tyrant did ſpoyle, and contrary to Chriſtian Religion, (which was his profeſſion, though * ſome miſtake) and all honour and humanity, he would not (among other his vnprincely, or rather barbarous behauiours) ſuffer the Kings ſiſter, and Lady Berengaria, with other of that tender ſociety, to come into harbour, to their great diſcontentment and perill, a * Ship or two ſinking there: but neither would God, nor King Richard forgiue it him.

(27) For the ſaid vnworthy Prince hauing thrice refuſed to make reſtitution of his vnlawfull ſeiſures and priſoners, was entred vpon by the Engliſh, driuen from the ſhoares with great diſhonour and ſlaughter; the City Limeſzun left for a prey to the victors, and himſelfe beaten againe out of his Campe, and taken, and after an eſcape made by him, his onely daughter and heire yeelding her ſelfe, and her Father laſtly comming againe of his owne accord (as deſpairing to lye hid) vnder cuſtody, and thruſt into fetters of gold and ſiluer, the whole Iland (with all the people, ſtrength, and riches thereof) became ſubiect to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter led away into captiuity.

(28) There arriued at Limeſzun, to ſalute and honour King Richard, within three daies after his firſt victory, Guido King of Ieruſalem, Geofrey de * Lenizant his brother, Raimund Prince of Antioch, Earle Boemond his ſonne, &c. offering their ſeruices, and ſwearing to be his againſt all men; with whoſe priuity King Richard ſeized the flouriſhing and ſpatious Iſland of Cyprus, by antiquity celebrated as the very ſeate of Venus; which that it might ſo proue to himſelfe, in the ioyous moneth, he ſolemnly tooke to wife his beloued Lady Berengaria.

(29) The perſon of the Emperour (for by that lofty title Writers call him,) was ſent to Tripolis in Syria, vnder the cuſtody of Ralph Fitz-Godfrey, Lord * Chamberlaine to King Richard: his daughter was committed to the two Queenes Berengaria and Ioan: the Iland it ſelf was entruſted to Richard de Camuile, and Robert de Turnham his Viceroyes, with competent force and prouiſions, and the Ilanders ſuffered to enioy all ſuch lawes and liberties, as they held in th: time of Manuel the Emperour of Conſtantinople, or (as now they call it) of Stamboli.

(30) This fame of Richard was much enlarged by his conquering a mighty * Argoſey, called a Dromond, wherein were aboord one thouſand and fiue hundred Sarazens (though diſguiſed vnder French Flagges) furniſhed, beſides all other prouiſions, with fire-workes, barrells or cages of venemous ſerpents, and the like, for the vſe of the Sarazens at Acon, (anciently called Ptolomais, to the ſiege whereof he was then ſailing,) thirteene hundred

(31) Philip King of France, (in hope perhaps to conquer Acon before the Engliſh could arriue, and to winne thereby that glory intire) came ſafe before that City in Eaſter weeke; but as yet had not forced the ſame: at which time (that the Reader may obſerue the generall diſpoſition of the weſterne Chriſtians in thoſe daies) there engirded Acon (omitting the many great Prelates, Princes, Earles, and Honourable Chiefes) theſe Nations following; the Genowayes and Florentines, the Engliſh vnder Hubert Biſhop of Salisbury, afterward * Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Flemings, Almaines, Danes, Dutch, Friſelanders, Piſans, Lombardes, beſides the Knights Templars (collected out of all Nations) and beſide the aides of the Aſians: all which lay quartered at the Siege in order, as heere they are placed, at that time in which the King of France arriued. But Richard King of England with his victorious and triumphant Nauie (which when it went out of Cyprus, being much belike augmented, did containe 254. tall ſhips, and aboue 60. Galliots) brought terror and diſmay to the beſieged, and comfort to the Chriſtians, vpon the Sunday after Pentecoſt, being about the middeſt of Iune.

(32) The ſiege was ſo vehemently plied, that (notwithſtanding ſundry diſſentions betweene Philip and Richard, the two competitors of glory in this voyage) after ſeuerall breaches and aſſaults, the laſt whereof was made by the Piſans and Engliſh, vpon the twelfth of Iuly following, many offers of compoſition made by the Saladine, being vtterly refuſed, the City of Acon was rendred to the Chriſtians vpon theſe conditions. 1 That Saladine (Prince of Miſcreants) ſhould by a certaine day reſtore the holy Croſſe. 2 That hee ſhould ſet at liberty fifteene hundreth Chriſtian Captiues. 3. That the City with all the things contained therein, ſhould remaine and bee to the Chriſtians. 4. That the Turkes or Sarazens ſhould haue their liues onely ſaued, if theſe conditions were performed. 5. That they ſhould pay twenty thouſand Bizants, (peeces of gold) toward the charges of the Kings. To take poſſeſſion for the French, there was ſent in, Drogon de Merlou, and one hundreth men of Armes, and for the Engliſh, Hugo de Gurnay, with the like number, who equally parted the City, goods, and people, betweene them.

(33) And euen now Philip King of France, aſwell becauſe the Earle of Flanders died at the ſiege without iſſue, whoſe countries hee long had coueted, as for euill will to Richard, whoſe noble Acts ſo farre out-went his, and becauſe, as ſome * write, he had taken bribes of Saladine, meditates nothing but returne, asking licence of King Richard to depart, being then but the tenth day after the Cities ſurrender; ſo badly his enuious eyes could, as it ſeemed, endure the ſplendor of his companions glory. The chiefe commanders of his Army hearing this, ſhewing themſelues true French-men, and ſenſible of their obligation to God, and honour, with many teares beſought him not to forſake that holy affaire, ita impudenter, ſo ſhameleſly. In what Prince would not this haue kindled a deſire of a better reſolution? But impotent paſſions carrying him, and miſcarrying him, he perſiſted to get leaue of Richard, who but two daies before, would haue had him ſweare to a ſtay of three yeeres longer in that ſeruice; but hee who had other cogitations, farre more vnworthy of a King, would needs depart, giuing his oath vpon the holy Goſpels, without which oath King Richard would not grant his good will; That he would well and faithfully keepe the lands and ſubiects of the King of England, and neither do dammage nor grieuance to them by himſelfe, nor ſuffer it to be done by others * till his returne.

(34) The King of France thus leauing Acon, in the Caſtle whereof King Richard, his Queene and Siſter were lodged, and the Duke of Burgundie remaining behinde with the French hoaſt, (to whom King Philip, not without ſundry ſecret inſtructions, had with it committed a great part of his treaſure) King Richard in the ſame day ſet forward vpon a new enterprize; but it is true which one writes * that by reaſon of the diſſention betweene the Kings, which of them ſhould ſeem the greater, little or nothing proſpered; and iuſt cauſe had King Richard to complain in * his letters, that Philip, to the eternall reproach of himſelfe and Kingdome, had fouly forſaken his purpoſe and vow vnto God.

(35) But when the Saladine could not by any meanes obtaine a longer day for performance of the ſaid Articles of compoſition, hee cut off the heads of all his Chriſtian Captiues; in reuenge whereof King Richard brought out his Turkiſh Captiues, (being about two thouſand and fiue hundreth) and in the ſight of the Saladines hoaſt cauſed their heads to be chopt off; the Duke of Burgundie doing the ſame to the like number, neere vnto the walls of Acon, ſeauen onely being kept aliue by the Chriſtian Generals, whereof Karakeys, Saladines * foſter-Father was chiefe. But Richard proceeding in his vndertaken action, and in his march to Ioppa, being ſet vpon by Sultan Saladine (who had put the Duke of Burgundie to flight, and ſlaine the valiant Iaques de Auennis, who only with a few in the Rereward made reſiſtance) ſo couragiouſly encountred him, that the Saladine with the loſſe of three thouſand his choiſeſt Souldiers was glad to turn his back and flie: whiles therefore this Champion is thus imployed in the Holy-land, let vs looke backe a little how the affaires of his Kingdome are managed at home.

(36) Iohn the Kings brother, making vſe in England of ſuch diſcontentments, as the incredible inſolencies, and intollerable tyrannies of the Chancellour (who carried himſelfe both like a Pope and a King) had bred among the Nobility and people, to aduance thereby his own deſignes, ſtirred againſt him (though ſtrengthening himſelfe like a Generall in the field,) ſo powerfull oppoſition, that in the end, (vpon warrant of a new * Commiſſion ſent from the King his Brother) hee with the reſt of the Peeres ſuddenly thruſt him out of all command, and ſhortly after moſt reprochfully (as it happened, for hee fled, and was taken in a Curtezans attire, il-beſeeming a Popes Legate) out of the Kingdome alſo, vpon occaſion; a of other foule demerites, ſo particularly of a ſacrilegious and barbarous outrage, committed by the Chauncellors command, vpon the perſon of Geffrey Elect Archbiſhop of Yorke (naturall brother to King Richard and the Earle) on pretence that he entred England contrary to his oath giuen to his brother King Richard, whereas he then came to take poſſeſſion of his See, to which hee was aduanced by the * Kings owne procurement, and by Queene Eleanors owne trauell to Rome in his behalfe. And albeit this puniſhment & ſhame deſeruedly followed the Chancellours pride and oppreſſion, yet in one maine point of oppoſing the Earles Ambition; (who ſought to aſſure to himſelfe the remainder of the Crowne, which in right of bloud belonged to his Nephew Arthur) his ſeruice to the State had beene very commendable, if it had proceeded from loialty of affection, and not from a ſwelling deſire of greatneſſe, which he hoped ſtill to enioy, if Arthur (a child) ſhould ſucceed in the kingdome, whereas he knew Earle Iohns aduancement could not be without his apparant ruine.

(37) But Philip King of France in all places labouring by * wrongfull and vnprincely aſperſions to deface the renowne of King Richard, though finding ſmall credit to his words (becauſe the man had done nothing himſelfe) deuiſed after his returne how to trouble and endamage his friends dominions, and had effected it, if the Lords of France whom hee ſollicited to that wicked worke, vpon pretence pretence of the compoſition made with King Richard at Meſſana, had not (to their immortall glory) *refuſed to aſſiſt him therein, till Richards returne, as well in regard of their owne oathes, as becauſe the ſentence of excommunication was denounced againſt all ſuch as did attempt to endammage him in his abſence.

*Ro. Houed. f. 408. Nubrigenſ. lib. 4. cap. 25.

(38) King Richard, notwithſtanding that the relation of theſe things greatly troubled him, gaue not ouer as yet, but after ſundry other matters of importance performed, did march vp within the ſight of Ieruſalem, where he skirmiſhed with the enemy, and ouerthrew the Conuoy or Caruan of the Saladine, which came laden from Babylon, guarded with tenne thouſand men; whom King Richard valiantly encountring with fiue thouſand ſelected Souldiers, put moſt of them to the Sword, and took three thouſand Camels, and foure thouſand Horſes and Mules, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine, and ſo gained the rich ſpoyle of all the Carriages.

Mat. Paris ſaith they were 7000. Camels, and makes no mention of Mules or Horſes.

(39) After this, and many other worthy things done, as the reſcue of Ioppa, and repulſe of Saladine from thence, &c. the King indefatigable in his braue attempts, deſirous to re-gaine Ieruſalem, and the City Baruck, was abandoned in that enterpriſe by the Duke of Burgundie (who is *ſaid to haue beene apparently corrupted with gifts from Saladine, and the regiments of French vnder his conduct:) whereupon hee was the rather perſwaded by the Knights Templars, and chiefes of the Chriſtian hoaſt, not to refuſe Saladines offers for a ſurceaſance from hoſtility, conſidering that hee had a purpoſe to returne with reenforced numbers and meanes; that his preſent powers by diuiſions, by ſickneſſe, by battailes were waſted, and that the dangerous eſtate of his owne Dominions did require his preſence, (the greateſt motiue, for he had ſupplies of money for his Souldiers wages from Pope Celeſtine) by reaſon of ſome vndue practiſes at home, and the rancour of King Philip his vnreconcileable aduerſary abroad. Whereupon a truce was taken for three yeeres, and Saladine re-paide ſuch charges as Richard had beene at in fortifying Askalon, which was brought to the ſame eſtate, as in which King Richard found it.

(40) But the King of England, though hee had very farre excelled all the Chriſtian Princes in great exploits at that journey, becauſe *he had neither conquered Saladine, nor Ieruſalem, did mourne, and parted penſiue. In the Holy-land he left Henrie Earle of Champaine, (who vpon taking the ſaid Baruck, was to haue beene crowned King of Ieruſalem, which Guido had reſigned) and he left Guido de Luſignian (the late King of Ieruſalem in Cyprus, to whom he had paſſed it, in exchange for the other, to aduance his Kinſ-man the ſaid Earle of Champain; which, vpon that Title, the family of Luſignian for *many deſcents after did poſſeſſe and enjoy. Thus Richard hauing ordered his affaires in the Eaſt parts, ſets ſaile home-ward. The Queenes Berengaria his Wife, and Ioane his Siſter, with the Captiue Ladie, Daughter of the Cypriot Emperour, vnder the conduct of Stephen de Turnham, (hearing of the Kings moſt heauie fortune) ſojourned at Rome about ſixe moneths, for feare of Richards enemies, & afterward came ſafe by Marſilia into Poictou.

(41) God, whoſe cauſe was onely pretended in this voyage of the Chriſtians, did not ſeeme to approoue the ſaid truce; for he *ſcattered the Engliſh with a terrible tempeſt, and the * opportunitie of Conqueſt was ſo loſt, that hitherto it could neuer be re-gained, and the King of England letting it ſlippe, when God had almoſt put the ſame into his hands, did miſerably fall into his enemies hands. Certainely, the name of Richard was at that time growne terrible to Saladine, who had receiued diuers loſſes, foyles, and ouerthrowes at his hands: Moreouer, the Saladines whole eſtate being endangered by ſuch of his owne ſect as reputed him a meere Vſurper, hee could not long withſtand the double impreſſion of the Chriſtian Chiualrie, and of his owne Allies and Country-men; as indeed not long after * he died, leauing his Empire foulely, but juſtly, diſtracted by ciuill confuſions: whereas by this Truce the crafty Turke made the world ſee, that the powers of two ſo potent Monarchs had in a manner effected nothing; and Richard could neuer haue time to returne for accompliſhment of his deſignes; for which all Chriſtendome hath at this houre reaſon to be ſorrowfull, and hereof himſelfe *was very ſenſible, ſo that hee would oftentimes cry out, that hee was not alwaies wiſe, alluding to this occaſion loſt.

(43) And though it is certaine that this Authour faines not this fact, for that ſome ſuch matter (and told by * ſome with more diſaduantage to Richards cauſe) is by others * related, yet the graueſt Authors agree (that next to the common enuy at his vertues) the greateſt pretence was the murther of the Marqueſſe Conrad, committed at Tyre, by two curſed Aſſaſines, a certaine ſect in the Eaſt, liuing vnder a Senior or Ruler, whom they honour as a Prophet, by whom they are ſent forth to murther ſuch Princes as fauour them not, promiſing themſelues the reward of immortality by obeying him in all things, though with the loſſe of their owne liues. Of which barbarous fact, Henry the Emperor, and Leopold the Arch-duke, (whoſe neere kinſ-man Conrad was) would ſeeme to beleeue that Richard was the Author, though therein they toucht his princely reputation and integrity, * moſt injuriouſly, for that the chiefe of that ſect by their owne publique *Letters (written with the bloud of the Shel-fiſh, called Murex, wherewith Scarlet vſed to be died) acknowledging the fact, declared the true cauſe thereof, which was a particular Act of injuſtice in Conrad himſelfe: There wanted not ſundry other pretences, as in ſuch caſes is vſuall, as * that Richard had entred leagne with Tancred King of Sicilia the Emperours enemy, and that he had thruſt the Cypriot (their kinſman) out of the Empire, and kept his onely daughter Captiue. But this booty, being too great for a Duke, the Emperour got into his cuſtodie, meaning to coine much Gold and Siluer out of his moſt vnjuſt affliction, by ſharpe impriſonment: which could not make him in any act or ſpeech, or geſture of his, ſhew beneath the Majeſtie of a victorious Prince and King of England.

of which Miſcreants, he ſacrificed to Mars and Neptune, keeping the reſt for ranſome.

(31) Philip King of France, (in hope perhaps to conquer Acon before the Engliſh could arriue, and to winne thereby that glory intire) came ſafe before that City in Eaſter weeke; but as yet had not forced the ſame: at which time (that the Reader may obſerue the generall diſpoſition of the weſterne Chriſtians in thoſe daies) there engirded Acon (omitting the many great Prelates, Princes, Earles, and Honourable Chiefes) theſe Nations following; the Genowayes and Florentines, the Engliſh vnder Hubert Biſhop of Saliſbury, afterward * Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Flemings, Almaines, Danes, Dutch, Friſelanders, Piſans, Lombardes, beſides the Knights Templars (collected out of all Nations) and beſide the aides of the Aſians: all which lay quartered at the Siege in order, as heere they are placed, at that time in which the King of France arriued. But Richard King of England with his victorious and triumphant Nauie (which when it went out of Cyprus, being much belike augmented, did containe 254. tall ſhips, and aboue 60. Galliots) brought terror and diſmay to the beſieged, and comfort to the Chriſtians, vpon the Sunday after Pentecoſt, being about the middeſt of Iune.

(32) The ſiege was ſo vehemently plied, that (notwithſtanding ſundry diſſentions betweene Philip and Richard, the two competitors of glory in this voyage) after ſeuerall breaches and aſſaults, the laſt whereof was made by the Piſans and Engliſh, vpon the twelfth of Iuly following, many offers of compoſition made by the Saladine, being vtterly refuſed, the City of Acon was rendred to the Chriſtians vpon theſe conditions. 1 That Saladine (Prince of Miſcreants) ſhould by a certaine day reſtore the holy Croſſe. 2 That hee ſhould ſet at liberty fifteene hundreth Chriſtian Captiues. 3. That the City with all the things contained therein, ſhould remaine and bee to the Chriſtians. 4. That the Turkes or Sarazens ſhould haue their liues onely ſaued, if theſe conditions were performed. 5. That they ſhould pay twenty thouſand Bizants, (peeces of gold) toward the charges of the Kings. To take poſſeſſion for the French, there was ſent in, Drogon de Merlou, and one hundreth men of Armes, and for the Engliſh, Hugo de Gurnay, with the like number, who equally parted the City, goods, and people, betweene them.

(33) And euen now Philip King of France, aſwell becauſe the Earle of Flanders died at the ſiege without iſſue, whoſe countries hee long had coueted, as for euill will to Richard, whoſe noble Acts ſo farre out-went his, and becauſe, as ſome * write, he had taken bribes of Saladine, meditates nothing but returne, asking licence of King Richard to depart, being then but the tenth day after the Cities ſurrender; ſo badly his enuious eyes could, as it ſeemed, endure the ſplendor of his companions glory. The chiefe commanders of his Army hearing this, ſhewing themſelues true French-men, and ſenſible of their obligation to God, and honour, with many teares beſought him not to forſake that holy affaire, ita impudenter, ſo ſhameleſly. In what Prince would not this haue kindled a deſire of a better reſolution? But impotent paſſions carrying him, and miſcarrying him, he perſiſted to get leaue of Richard, who but two daies before, would haue had him ſweare to a ſtay of three yeeres longer in that ſeruice; but hee who had other cogitations, farre more vnworthy of a King, would needs depart, giuing his oath vpon the holy Goſpels, without which oath King Richard would not grant his good will; That he would well and faithfully keepe the lands and ſubiects of the King of England, and neither do dammage nor grieuance to them by himſelfe, nor ſuffer it to be done by others * till his returne.

(34) The King of France thus leauing Acon, in the Caſtle whereof King Richard, his Queene and Siſter were lodged, and the Duke of Burgundie remaining behinde with the French hoaſt, (to whom King Philip, not without ſundry ſecret inſtructions, had with it committed a great part of his treaſure) King Richard in the ſame day ſet forward vpon a new enterprize; but it is true which one writes * that by reaſon of the diſſention betweene the Kings, which of them ſhould ſeem the greater, little or nothing proſpered; and iuſt cauſe had King Richard to complain in * his letters, that Philip, to the eternall reproach of himſelfe and Kingdome, had fouly forſaken his purpoſe and vow vnto God.

(35) But when the Saladine could not by any meanes obtaine a longer day for performance of the ſaid Articles of compoſition, hee cut off the heads of all his Chriſtian Captiues; in reuenge whereof King Richard brought out his Turkiſh Captiues, (being about two thouſand and fiue hundreth) and in the ſight of the Saladines hoaſt cauſed their heads to be chopt off; the Duke of Burgundie doing the ſame to the like number, neere vnto the walls of Acon, ſeauen onely being kept aliue by the Chriſtian Generals, whereof Karakeys, Saladines * foſter-Father was chiefe. But Richard proceeding in his vndertaken action, and in his march to Ioppa, being ſet vpon by Sultan Saladine (who had put the Duke of Burgundie to flight, and ſlaine the valiant Iaques de Auennis, who only with a few in the Rereward made reſiſtance) ſo couragiouſly encountred him, that the Saladine with the loſſe of three thouſand his choiſeſt Souldiers was glad to turn his back and flie: whiles therefore this Champion is thus imployed in the Holy-land, let vs looke backe a little how the affaires of his Kingdome are managed at home.

(36) Iohn the Kings brother, making vſe in England of ſuch diſcontentments, as the incredible inſolencies, and intollerable tyrannies of the Chancellour (who carried himſelfe both like a Pope and a King) had bred among the Nobility and people, to aduance thereby his own deſignes, ſtirred againſt him (though ſtrengthening himſelfe like a Generall in the field,) ſo powerfull oppoſition, that in the end, (vpon warrant of a new * Commiſſion ſent from the King his Brother) hee with the reſt of the Peeres ſuddenly thruſt him out of all command, and ſhortly after moſt reprochfully (as it happened, for hee fled, and was taken in a Curtezans attire, il-beſeeming a Popes Legate) out of the Kingdome alſo, vpon occaſion; as of other foule demerites, ſo particularly of a ſacrilegious and barbarous outrage, committed by the Chauncellors command, vpon the perſon of Geffrey Elect Archbiſhop of Yorke (naturall brother to King Richard and the Earle) on pretence that he entred England contrary to his oath giuen to his brother King Richard, whereas he then came to take poſſeſſion of his See, to which hee was aduanced by the * Kings owne procurement, and by Queene Eleanors owne trauell to Rome in his behalfe. And albeit this puniſhment & ſhame deſeruedly followed the Chancellours pride and oppreſſion, yet in one maine point of oppoſing the Earles Ambition; (who ſought to aſſure to himſelfe the remainder of the Crowne, which in right of bloud belonged to his Nephew Arthur) his ſeruice to the State had beene very commendable, if it had proceeded from loialty of affection, and not from a ſwelling deſire of greatneſſe, which he hoped ſtill to enioy, if Arthur (a child) ſhould ſucceed in the kingdome, whereas he knew Earle Iohns aduancement could not be without his apparant ruine.

(37) But Philip King of France in all places labouring by * wrongfull and vnprincely aſperſions to deface the renowne of King Richard, though finding ſmall credit to his words (becauſe the man had done nothing himſelfe) deuiſed after his returne how to trouble and endamage his friends dominions, and had effected it, if the Lords of France whom hee ſollicited to that wicked worke, vpon pretence

(45) In this most perillous time, the valour and loyalty of the Citie of Roan (the choysest of Normandy) did most clearely shew themselues, to the euerlasting commendation thereof: for Philip comming before it with a puissant Army, solicited them to reuolt, promising mountaines. In stead of answere * they set open the Gates, telling him that he might enter if he would, for no man hindred him: but the * vaine-glorious King beeing better aduised, (for the inhabitants, yea and the damsels of the City, whose heads were polde like as mens, powred molten pitch, and such like matter vpon the besiegers) retreated from the Walles, and marcht away confounded: and being certainely aduertized that the Emperour and King Richard were agreed, he sends ouer to Earle * Iohn, bidding him looke to himselfe, for the Diuell was now let loose. Hee thereupon crost ouer the Seas to Philip, who * excited him to vsurpe the Kingdome of England.

(46) Neuertheless by Queene Elianors negotiation (who in person trauelled to the Emperour) the King her sonne was come to be assured of his liberty, vpon these conditions. 1. That hee should pay to the Emperour one hundreth thousand Markes sterling. 2. That hee should pay fifty thousand Markes of like money to the Emperour and Duke. 3. That he should marry his Neece, (sister to Arthur Duke of Britaine) to Duke Leopolds sonne. 4. That the Emperour should secure him, till hee were vnder saile with a fore-winde. 5. That hee should set the Cypriots person at liberty, and deliuer his daughter to the Duke of Austria, who was her vncle, and should deliuer 67. hostages for assurance of all.

The Articles of King Richards liberty.

(47) But to colour this vnreasonable and vnprincely extortion, the Emperour by his Imperiall Charter giues vnto King Richard, Prouince, and sundry other ample Territories, containing 5. Archbishoprickes, and thirty three Bishoprickes (sometime parcell of the Empire, but both then and a long time before out of possession) & therof crownes him King, writing magnificent Letters into England, with such like offices.

King Richard crowned King of Prouince, &c.

(48) Now when King Richard (who had wonne to himselfe wonderfull honour and respect, euen of the couetous Emperour, by the proofe of his innocency, and by his most noble and constant carriage) did expect his liberty at an assembly or diet, where the greatest Princes and States of the Empire were in person; to wit, The three Archbishops of Mentz, Colein & Saltzburgh; The three Bishops of Wormes, Spire, and Leiges; The three Dukes of Swaue (the Emperours brother) Austrich, and Luuain; The Count Palatine of Rhene, &c. which had vndertaken for the Emperour, whose officers had already receiued the greater part of the ransome: behold euen then the Emperour shewes a willingnesse to breake off, producing the Letters of Philip King of France, and of Iohn Earle of Morton, in which they offer an huge summe, &c. too impious and diuelish to speake of: but the Princes who had vndertaken to King Richard for good dealing, went to the Emperour, reprouing him for his auarice, who would so dishonourably trauerse and start backe from the agreement: * vpon the fourth of Februarie therefore being Friday, the Archbishops of Mentz and Coleine restore him, * after fifteene moneths imprisonment, to Queene Elianor his mother, free from the Emperour, all that were present weeping thereat for joy.

Roger Houed.

(50) And indeed it was Gods Angell did it: for after all this, whiles the King stayed for a wind, and other preparations at the Sea-shoare, the Emperour repenting him of his release, sent speedily guarders to apprehend him againe, vowing hee should neuer be freede from bonds whiles hee liued; but some secret message (as Princes Courts neuer want Spials) speedily pre-monished him, and so by a very little time he preuented his surprisers, landing happily at Sandwich, in Aprill the Sunday after Saint Georges day; where in stead of all other triumphes, or particulars of joy for his returne, wee will content our selues with onely one, as signe of the rest. When the King drew neere to Rochester, the venerable new Archbishop of Canterbury Hubert (who had been with him at Acon in the Holy-land,) went joyously forth to meet him; whom when the King saw, he dismounted from his Horse, and hauing bowed his knee, fell vpon the earth, in like sort the Archbishoppe lay right against him; at the last both of them rising from the ground, they ranne into each others armes, comforting themselues with mutuall embraces and weeping with joy.

(51) The justice of a true history will not suffer vs heere to forget, in what sort the injustice of this vnnoble captiuation of Richard king of England, was punished by God, and on Gods behalfe. The Duke of Austrias Country, and people, being visited with these fiue plagues, Fire, Water, Barrennes, Wormes, and Pestilence: the Fire, casually burning his Towns; the Riuer of Danubius drowning ten thousand of his Subjects, in an ouer-flow; the earth waxing dry and sear; the Wormes destroying such fruit and graine as grew; and the stroke of Pestilence killing the principall Nobles and Gentlemen of his Dominions: The Duke for all this continued obstinate, like another Pharao, swearing to cut off the heads of K. Richards Hostages, vnlesse all Couenants (though extorted by cruell Duresse) were exactly and speedily performed. Baldwin de Betun (one of the Hostages) is sent to the King with this bloudy message; but before his returne, vpon S. Stephens day in Christmas, the Duke * spurring his Horse, in sport, vpon a Castle of Snow among youthes, which were counterfeiting a siege, and an assault, with the slip of his Horse, brake his foot in such sort, as it came to be * cut off, and within a while feeling himselfe perishing vpward, so that his death was certaine, could not be absolued of his Bishoppes from the sentence of Excommunication

And now, forty dayes of ſummons being exſpired, which were allowed to Earle Iohn, & Hugh Biſhop of Couentry, for making their appearance, to anſwere to ſuch hainous matter as was prepared, and they not appearing, Iohn was adjudged by the Peeres and States of England, to haue forfeited all that hee might forfeit in the Realme, and the Biſhop to be puniſhable by the Eccleſiaſticall cenſures, as he was a Biſhop, and likewiſe as an Officer of the King, by the Laitie. Richard afterward beſtirres himſelfe to draw in money more greedily then did become ſo great a Majeſtie, wherein yet (ſaith * one) hee was rather to be pardoned then accuſed, for that he was preſently to leade a mightie Armie againſt the French.

(62) After this, passed sundry interchanges betwixt the French and English, sometimes of warres, with wastes and spoyles, sometimes of truces with interuiewes and Parlies; in one of which, the Lady Alice, (cause of much mischiefe) K. Philips Sister, was restored (according to the contract of Messana) to her brother, who forthwith bestowed her in mariage vpon Iohn Earle of Pontif. In the meane while the Kings sought to make friends vpon all sides, but King Richard by his munificence, and other means, drew from king Philip a mighty party of his neerest neighbours: * Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Raimund earle of Tholouse (to whom also King Richard gaue in * marriage, his sister Ioan Queene of Sicilia) the * Champanois, and others: so that Philip was faine to trust wholly vpon himselfe: for whereas he had lately married the sister of the King of Denmarke, of purpose to vse the Danish shipping against the English, that affinitie proued enmity: for the * next day after his wedding, he put her away, pretending (beside * other things) that shee was of too neere a propinquity of bloud; albeit most vntruly, as her brother, the King of Denmarke proued before the Pope, though he could not be heard, the king of France more preuayling, either by feare or fauour.

(65) This was a famous victory; for besides a long Catalogue of great names extant in Authors; there were taken by the Kings Armie, 100. Knights and Seruitours on horse-backe, and foot-men without number, besides thirtie men of Armes, and other inferiour Souldiers not countable, which Markadey (Generall of the Rowtes) had for prisoners. There were also taken 200. great horse, whereof seuen-score had barbes, and caparisons armed with yron. King Richard in his owne person did most nobly, for with one speare he threw to the earth Matthew de Mummerancie, Alan de Rusci, and Fulke de Giseruall, and "tooke them. (67) At this enteruiew or treatie, Philip King of France, * (the sower of strife, though he sought peace) shewed to King Richard a deed, in which Earle Iohn newly yeelds himselfe Liege-man to King Philip, against his brother. A wonderfull thing, (saith Houeden) that Richard should beleeue it (being perhaps but a Copie of that deuice or tricke, if it were a deuice which they once had joyntly put vpon the same Iohn, as in the end of King Henrie the second you heard) who thereupon forth-with disseised the Earle his brother euery-where. But the Earle hauing searched and learned the cause of the Kings sudden displeasure, (whose loue hee had before redeemed with many loyal seruices,) He sends two men of Arms to the French Court, who should on his behalfe, in what sort soeuer, defend his honour and innocency, against any his accusers: but there was no man found in that Court, neither King nor any other, who would vndertake the proofe or maintenance therof; whereupon euer afterward Richard held his brother more deare, and gaue lesse credite to King Philips words.

Houed. ibid.

(68) But now ensued the fatall accident, which drew the blacke cloud of death ouer this triumphall and bright shining Starre of Cheualrie, the vnworthy occasion of which misaduenture makes it the more lamentable; which notwithstanding, for a document to the Great-ones, against the outrage of Auarice and Cruelty, God suffered thus to fall on him. Widomare, Vicount of Limoges, hauing found a great * horde of gold and siluer, sent no small portion thereof to King Richard, as chiefe Lord, with which being not contented (as pretending that treasure troue, was wholly his by vertue of his prerogatiue-royall, or else misliking that the Vicount should make the partition) came with a power to a Castle of the Vicounts called * Chaluz, where hee supposed the Riches were; the Garrison of which place offered to yeeld the same, and all therein, if onely their liues and limbes might be saued: but hee would not accept of any conditions, bidding them defend themselues as they could, for he would enter by the sword, and hang them all. It grieues mee to thinke that such a Prince should so forget himselfe: but behold the seuerity of Gods judgement. An Arbalaster, (or Archibalista) standing vpon the wall, & seeing his time, charged his steele bow with a square arrow or quarrell, * making first his prayer to God, That he would direct that shot, and deliuer the innocency of the besieged from oppression. Whereupon discharging it, as the King was taking a view of the Castle, within the danger and distance of such an Engin, and the King ( vpon hearing the bow goe off) stooping with his head, was mortally wounded in the left shoulder; the anguish and perill whereof was extremely augmented by the butcherly and vnskilfull hand of the Surgeon, who hauing drawne out the wood, and not the enuenomed yron, * mangled the arme with cruell incisions before he could preuaile; the paine whereof hastned his end.

(69) Concerning the name of this tragicall Archer, there is so much variety, as that we could willingly take that vncertainety for a warrant to silence it: being loth to ennoble him with our pen, it being a thing worthily punishable with vtter obliuion, to haue shed, (though defensiuely or but casually) the bloud of such a King. Matthew Paris * in calling him Peter Basily, seemes to allude to some ominous conceit in Basily, (which with the Greekes signifies a King;) him Thomas Walsingham followes therein, as Matthew Paris followed * another: there want not * some who also giue him a third name; but Houeden who deliuers this accident, as all the rest of this Kings life, in the most probable and fullest manner, cals him Bertram de Gurdonn, applying vnto him certaine * verses of Lucan, in commendation of his vnapalled constancy, when he came before King Richard: where thou maist perhaps (for satisfaction of thy mind, with beholding some reuenge) desire to know what became of the Actor. After that the Castle by continuall assaults was taken; and (by the Kings command) none left aliue but he (as being reserued * perhaps to some more shamefull death) the king (vpon a christian magnanimity) forgaue him the fact, which the party (without shew of dismay) did neither deny nor excuse, but alledged the necessity of his case, and the justice of Gods worke in it, for that the King had slaine his Father and two Brothers with his owne hand: being hereupon set at liberty, and one hundred shillings sterling giuen him by the King: Markadey (Captaine of the Mercenary Rowtes) after the King was dead, tooke him, flead him quicke, & then by hanging ended his life.

(70) King Richard feeling the approch of certaine death, disposed his worldly estate, thus: to his brother Iohn he gaue the Kingdome of England, and his other Dominions, with three parts of his Treasure, commaunding such as were present to sweare him fealty: to his Nephew Otho King of Almaine, hee bequeathed (as it * seemes) all his goods & chattels, money excepted, and the fourth part of his said treasure hee gaue to his seruants, and the poore. And hauing thus discharged his last cares toward the World concerning his transitory state, hee prepared himselfe for the presence of God, strengthening his soule * with heartie contrition, confession, and participation of the holy Sacrament: commaunding further, that when he was dead, * his bowels should be buried at Charrou, among the rebellious Poictouins, as those who had only deserued his worst parts: but his Heart to be enterred at Roan, as the City, which for her constant loialty had merited the same; and his Corps in the Church of the Nunnerie at

(70) There hath been an opinion, or fancy, that this King was called Cordelion, becausе hee encountred a Lyon, in prison, at the Emperours Court: but (saith * one very truely) these are fables, imagined by English tale-tellers, to aduance their King Richard, as the Britaines, by the like, aduanced their King Arthur. The like deuice, (though more loftie and Mathematicall) may theirs seeme, who conjecture, hee was called so of the famous * Starre, called Cor Leonis. But how the conceit of killing of a Lyon should come vp, as it is not worth the while to enquire, so certainely, Hugo de Neuile, (one of King Richards speciall familiars) is recorded to haue slaine a Lyon in the holy-Land, driuing first an arrow into his breast; and then running him through with his sword: whence perhaps that atchieuement is transferred from the man to the master; and the Storie applied to the by-name of King Richard, whereof the true reason is that which * Thomas Walsingham mentioneth, saying; That for the magnanimity of his heart (grositudinem præstans, saith an * other, meaning, as it seemes, that his materiall heart it selfe was bigge and massiue, which * another also saith was inexpugnable) this King was both by the English and Normans stiled Ceur de Lion.

His Wiues.

Alice the daughter of Lewis the seuenth, King of France, by Queen Alice daughter of Earle Theobald of Champaigne, is by * some reputed the first wife of King Richard, though indeede she were * onely contracted to him (being both children) and committed to his Father, but when hee demanded her, his father refused to deliuer her, or she to come to him, or both: Wherefore being King, conceiuing displeasure against King Philip her brother, and more then suspecting her continency with his owne father (by whom he alledged she had a child) he refused to take her: yet * gaue a hundreth thousand pounds to Philip, pro quieta clamantia, to be quite freed from her. She became the wife of William Earle of Ponthieu, & had issue Queene Ioan of Castile, the mother of Queene Eleanor, wife to King Edward the first.

Berengaria the second wife of King Richard, was the daughter of Sanches the fourth of that name, King of Nauarre, sonne of King Garcie the fourth: her mother was Beatrice, daughter of Alphonso, the seauenth King of Castile, called the Emperour of Spaine. She was conueied by Eleanor the Kings mother vnto the King in Sicily, and married to him in Cyprus, whence she accompanied him to the Holy-land. The king (vpon what cause we find not) neglected her company for a while, but vpon more setled thoughts, he resumed her againe to his loue and society, but had no issue by her.

His naturall Issue.

Philip, the naturall son of King Richard, seemeth to haue been begotten, while he was Earle of Poictou, of a Gentlewoman Poictouin, and to haue had of his fathers gift a towne in Poictou named Sumac, to haue taken also his sur-name and title of the same towne; and to haue beene the Progenitour of a Family of Gentlemen of the same sur-name & title, in the same Country.

Mr. Ferrers.

Isabel, (by * some who mention not Philip at all) is reputed the Naturall Daughter of King Richard, (whose mother the Author nameth not) and that she was married to Leoline Prince of Wales.

*Mr. Miles.

Three other Daughters, (Bastards no doubt) he is said to haue, of whose names and matches wee will report as we finde recorded. Whiles hee was in France, imployed in his warres against King Philip, Fulco a French Priest, came vnto him, telling him he had three very bad Daughters, which he wished him to bestow away from him in marriage, or else Gods wrath would attend him: when the king denied he had any daughter, yes (quoth the Priest) thou cherisest three daughters, Pride, Couetousesse, & Lechery. The King apprehensiue of his meaning, called his "Lords there attending, and saide: My Lords, this "Hypocrite hath found that I haue three daughters: "which I maintain, viz. Pride, Couetousnesse, & Lechery, which hee would haue me bestow forth in ma- "riage; and therefore (if any such I haue) I haue found "out most fit Husbands for them all. My Pride I be- "queath to the haughtie Templars and Hospitallers, "who are as proud as Lucifer himselfe: My Couetousnesse I giue to the white Monks of the Cisteaux "Order, for they couet the Diuell and all: But for "my Lechery I can bestow it no where better then on "the Priests and Prelates of our times, for therein "haue they their most felicity. Doubtlesse these mariages proued so fruitfull, that their issue hath now ouer-flowed all Kingdomes of the earth.

CHAPTER VIII.

An.D.1199.

Greateſt happineſs not in greateſt dignities.

THE luſtre of Diadems, and Soueraignty, ſo dazeleth the eyes, and bewitcheth the harts of ambitious beholders, that whiles they fondly deem the greateſt content to be in higheſt Titles, running after a ſeeming happineſſe, they often caſt themſelues head-long, and whole Kingdomes, into a reall and irrepairable ruine; as the calamities, which after the death of the noble Ceur-de-Lyon, lighted on the Pretenders to his Crowne, and on this miſerably diſtracted State, will yeeld vs too rufull a Preſident. To the full acting of which Tragedie, (for ſuch it was, and ſo we muſt now preſent it in this our Theatre,) concurred as principall Actors, the two (though theſe Patients rather, as the iſſue prooued,) vnfortunate Corriuals for the Crowne, Iohn Earle of Mortone, Brother to the late King, and his Nephew Arthur the [a] Poſthumous ſonne of Geoffry duke of Britaine, the Earles eldeſt Brother: their two Female (and therefore more emulous and reſtleſſe) Solicitors, Queene Eleanor and Lady Conſtance, each ambitious of their owne, in their Sonnes aduauncements: their two reuengefull Abettors, Otho the Emperour for Iohn, and Philip King of France for Arthur: thereupon, the two vnjuſt Intruders on the Crowne; Lewis the French Kings Sonne, and Innocentius the Pope, the one by vnprincely forces, the other by vnprieſtly fraud: and laſtly, their two ſorts of treacherous Inſtruments, of the Laitie for the one, and Clergie for the other; all which, like ſo many Tragicke fire-breathing Furies, ſet this State in ſo horrible combuſtion, as that the [b] ſmoake is not as yet, ſo many ages after, quite allayed.

calamities met,) had from his infancy beene fedde with high and royall hopes, as [c]being his Fathers only darling, from whom hee had the [d] poſſeſſion of the Iriſh, and [e] intendment alſo of the Engliſh Kingdome: and in his brothers time, ([f] whoſe return from the holy-warres all men deſpaired) had by gracious deportment towards the Subjects, obtayned an oath of Fealty to himſelfe, in [g] remainder, in caſe his brother ſhould die childleſſe: hauing now therefore the way to thoſe his deſignes made ſmoother by the [h] laſt Will of King Richard, and [i] allegiance of his Nobles then attending; (for theſe courſes may facilitate, but not make a juſt claime;) we may not thinke, that either hee was cold now, for the accompliſhment of that, which ſo hotly hee had before purſued, or ſo nice, as to neglect a Kingdome, vpon ſcrupulous points of Titles & Right. [k] Propinquity of Bloud pleaded for Iohn, as [l] Lineall deſcent for Arthur, the Kings Brother being neerer then his Brothers ſonne; but Iohn, who knew that the weaker vſe to argue their Titles, whiles the ſtronger hold the poſſeſſion, reſolued to try the ſtrength of his claime by no other Law then of Armes; and therefore, being at the time of King Richards death in thoſe forraine parts, he makes it his firſt care to faſten to himſelfe, by preſent [m] largeſſe, and large promiſes of future fauours, (the vſuall Rhetoricke of Competitours) all the Stipendarie Souldiers, and other Seruitours of his deceaſed Brother. To win himſelfe the like aſſurance of loue at home, and [n] to ſettle (if it might be) an vniuerſall quiet, he [o] forthwith deſpeeded into England, (there, to concurre with Queene Eleanor, his experienced Mother) three of the choiſeſt men of the State, Hubert Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William Marſhall a potent Peere, and Geoffry Fitz-Peter the great Iuſticiar, by whoſe ſeuerall intereſts, the three States, of Clergy, Chiualry, and Commonalty, might beſt be either allured to him by fauours, or awed by feare; himſelfe, the whiles [p] poſting to Chinon, where King Richards great Treaſure was kept; as knowing that he ſhould hardly get or keepe a Crowne by Forces or Friends, if he wanted Coyne and Crownes, to win and hold ſuch needfull Ayders.

(3) The Treaſurer, though [q] himſelfe with his Store, Caſtles, and Fidelity, thus aſſured to the Earle, had yet a powerfull* Nephew, the Caſtellan of Angiers, wholy [r] deuoted to Duke Arthur, to whoſe vſe he yeelded vp that Citie and Caſtle, with whom alſo [ſ] ſided the Nobility of Anjou, Maine, and Turaine, ſurrendring thoſe large Territories, as to [t] their liege Lord, ioyntly auowing it to be the [v] Law & cuſtome of thoſe Signiories, that the heritage which was to accrew to the elder Brother, if hee had ſuruiued, ſhould deſcend vnto his Sonne. But Conſtance, Arthurs mother, no leſſe [x] deſirous to be Regent to a King (for her ſonne was but [y] twelue yeeres yong) then Queene Eleanor [z] diſdainefull to goe below a Dutcheſſe, did not dare to build her high hopes on ſo low grounds, for that ſuch ſubordinate Princes as fauoured her cauſe, might eaſily be corrupted by faire meanes, or cruſhed by foule: and therefore vpon newes of King Iohns ſucceſſes in England (for with general applauſe and [a] homages hee was now proclaimed King,) diſtracted with violent and Woman-like Paſſions, Ambition of her ſons Right, Rage for his Wrong, Feare of his Safety, and (not the leaſt) Emulation that Queene Eleanor (whoſe Prudence & Grace with the Engliſh, had [b] ſwayed exceedingly) ſhould effect more in a wrong, then her ſelfe in a juſt cauſe; [c] ſhee flies to Turaine to the French King Philip, (to ſeeke a Wolfe to whom ſhee might commit her Lambe,) to whoſe Protection ſhee wholly ſurrenders his Perſon, his Cauſe, his Countries. *Philip pretending, (as Princes vſe) a tender care of his Neighbour Princes ſtate, but [d] meaning indeede out of ſo wiſhed a prize, to raiſe aduantage to his owne, forthwith ([e] without regard of Truth, or Truce ſworne to King Richard) re-enforceth all Arthurs Cities and Caſtles with his French Garriſons; ſome of which had ſcarſe put their foote into Maunz, but [f] King Iohn was at their heeles, to prouide them their laſt lodging, ſacking that Citie, and demoliſhing it to the ground, for a terrour to all others, which after fealty once ſworne vnto him, (as [g] they had done) ſhould dare to reuolt.

(4) Queene Eleanor, who hauing ſetled England in Peace, was now come ouer to forward her ſonne in the Warres, and was [h] preſent at the ſurpriſing of Maunz, is [i] cenſured to haue too much ſharpened his edge againſt her Nephew Arthur and his friends, out of her implacable diſdaine, and Enuie towards Conſtance her Daughter in Law, and appears no leſſe; for the King paſſing thence into Anjou, left there his [k] Captaines and Forces with his mother, who made Angiers participate the fortunes of Maunz, the Citie ruined, the Citizens captiuated; whiles himſelfe comming to Roan, [l] was there by the hands of Walter the Archbiſhop, in the Cathedrall Church with great pompe, on Saint Markes Feſtiual, girt with the [m] Ducall Sword of Normandy, and crowned [n] with a Coronet of Golden Roſes, (taking his Oath for faithfull adminiſtration in that Dukedome) which was the pledge or earneſt of his vnqueſtionable admittance to the Engliſh Diademe, which euery day now expected him. Neither yet may wee thinke, albeit King Iohns [o] mature and experienced age, his home-bred, and well knowne education, his re-annexing of Irelands kingdom to Englands, made his perſon more gracious then Arthurs, that yet his Agents all this while in England found no rubbs in their way, before [p] all the Earles, Barons, Burgeſſes, & Free-holders could be induced to diſclaime Arthurs apparant Right, and to ſweare fealty to King Iohn againſt all men liuing: yea, many of the* Engliſh Peeres (who through their laſt Kings abſence, and others conniuences, had habituated in them a conceit of vncontrouled Greatnes, which they miſcalled Liberties and Rights, vnder vayle whereof, they after drew, not onely vndue reſtraints vpon the Regaltie, but alſo infinite calamities and maſſacres on the people, whoſe good they pretended,) thought it fitteſt now (like cunning Statiſts) to worke on the aduantage of the time, and the neceſſities of their Prince, whoſe preſent condition fitted him for any obtruſions: and therefore in the great Aſſembly at Northampton, yeelded onely to ſweare a * Conditionall Fealty, to keepe [q] Faith and Peace to King Iohn, if hee would reſtore to euerie of them their Rights: which was the firſt ſeede of diſloyalties, which after grew to ſo great a height. Thus howſoeuer, all domeſticke difficulties ouerblowne, and Queene Eleanor * left in Aquitaine to prouide againſt Forraigne, King Iohn arriued at * Shoreham, and the next day comes to London, preparing for his Coronation to be at Weſtminſter; the morrow following, being Aſcention day.

(5) Strange it was to conſider, (if ought be ſtrange in State-plots) how men, otherwiſe very prudent, tranſported once with Worldly and ſeeming-politique reſpects, can ſo wilfully cloud their Reaſon, as to attempt thoſe things, which leaue both a preſent ſtaine on their Soules, and a laſting diſ-reputation both of their Integrity and Wiſedome, wherein ſo much they glory. For what elſe did Hubert Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, the man ſo * famouſed as [r] the Pillar of the Common-wealthes ſtability, & [ſ] incomparable for deepe-reaching Wiſe-dome, when in that ſacred and celebrious Aſſembly of [t] all the States, addreſſing for the royall Inauguration, he added to thoſe Lay-Peeres Conditionals, his Clergy-Sophiſmes, and [v] ſecond Seede-plot of Treaſons; perſwading them by a cunning, but diſloyall ſpeech (which yet [x] ſome by transforming, haue more deformed) that the Engliſh Crowne was meerely Arbitrary and Electiue at the peoples deuotion? That [y] they all in diſcretion were to know, how that no man hath Right or any other fore-Title to ſucceede another in a Kingdome, vnleſſe firſt (with inuocation for Grace and Guidance of Gods Holy-Spirit) hee be by the Body

Body of the Kingdome thereunto choſen, and be indeed ſome choiſe man, and picked out for eminency of his vertues; by the Preſident of Saul, the firſt Annointed King, whom God made Ruler ouer his owne people, though neither the Sonne of a King, nor yet of any Regall deſcent. So after him likewiſe Dauid, the Sonne of [z] Iſhai; the one for being valourous, and a Perſonage fitting Royall dignity, the other for being Holy and Humble-minded. To [a] ſhew that ſo he, whoſoeuer in a Kingdome excelleth all in Valour and Vertue, ought to ſurmount all in Rule and Authority: yet ſo, as that, if any of the Of-ſpring of a deceaſed King ſurpaſſeth others, it is fit ioyntly to conſent in election of ſuch a one. Thus he ſpake (as he profeſſed) in fauour of Iohn, who then was preſent, whoſe moſt illuſtrious Brother King Richard, dying without any Heire from him deſcending, Him they had all (firſt imploring the [b] Holy Ghoſts aſſiſtance) as being a Prouident, Valiant, and [c] vndoubtedly-Noble-Prince, vnanimiouſly Elected, as well in regard of his Merits, as of his Royall Bloud. So vniuſt a ſpeech from ſo great a Perſon, (eſpecially, blanching his diſloyall Aſſertion with Sacred Writ, and his lewde deuiſed plot, with the Holy Ghoſts aſsiſtance,) could not but moue much Offence and Wonder to many, euen to Iohn himſelfe, who doubtleſſe meant to ſtand to [d] his right of proximity by bloud: [e] but they durſt not then and there, moue Queſtions therof, as afterward [f] ſome did, to whom he gaue a reaſon of it, as ſtrange as the ſpeech it ſelfe; ſaying, [g] that he was aſſured by ſome diuining fore-ſight, that King Iohn would worke the ruine of the Kingdome, and that therefore, to [h] bridle him from ſo doing, he had affirmed his Admiſsion was to be by Choyſe, and not Hereditary Succeſsion: Implying, that as by Election he got the Crowne, ſo by Ejection on demerite he might as iuſtly looſe it. But for that preſent, the Ceremonies all pompouſly accompliſhed, (where [i] three Oathes were miniſtred to him; To loue Holy Church, and preſerue it from all oppreſſors; To gouerne the State in Iuſtice, and aboliſh bad lawes; Not to aſſume this Royall honour but with full purpoſe to performe that he had ſworne:) the firſt act and bounty of his Kingly Power, was to reward thoſe whoſe hands had lifted him to it, making William Marſhall and Fitz-Peter, Earles of Pembroke and Eſſex, and the Archbiſhop, Lord high Chancellour; who ſeeming [l] to glory in that addition of Honour, was told by the Lord Bardolf, that the height of Archiepiſcopall dignity was ſuch, as it was euer reputed a great aduancement for a Chancellor to be made Archbiſhop, but none for an Archbiſhop to be made a Chancellour. And yet in truth, this Office of Conſcience, ſuited farre better with the Miter, then that of [*] Lord chiefe Iuſtice of all England, which he (though [*] no great Lawyer) enioyed, in the Raigne of the late King.

(6) The Kings enemies, [m] who kept their heads in, whiles he was there in Armes, found opportunities to impeach him, while he was here ſetling his Peace: the [n] French King in Normandy ſurpriſeth the City Eureux, and recouers the County of Main, the Britaines re-gaine the City Angiers with other ſtrong holds: the newes whereof cauſed King Iohn with all ſpeed [o] to paſſe the Seas, to giue ſtoppage to that current; where on his arriuall, his Army of [p] Friends and and Voluntaries was ſo encreaſed, that King Philip was ſoone content to take [q] truce for fiftie daies; on expiration whereof, an Enteruiew was agreed on to eſtabliſh a laſting Peace. But Philip [r] long time noted of doubling, (ill beſeeming any, but chiefely a Prince) the [s] very day before the two Kings ſhould meete, giuing Duke Arthur the [t] Belt of Knighthood, and taking of him Homage for the Signiories of Aniou, Poyctou, Turaine, Maine, Britanny, and Normandy, hee made him faithfull vow, to yeeld him powerfull helpes, for acquiring thoſe poſſeſſions. Neither was King Iohn behinde him in that kind of preuention, when Philip Earle of Flanders, the French Philips profeſſed Enemie, [v] comming to Roan, and diſſwading King Iohn from truſting any French friendſhip, did there ſweare vnto him, both faithfull Helpe and Homage. Yet the two Kings keeping touch for the day, though not for the purpoſe of amitie (and yet making faire ſhew of that too) held Parley betwix Butauant and [y] Guletun [z] two dayes by Commiſsioners inter-current, the third by preſence and priuatie that not one of their Nobles or Attendants (who on each ſide lay far aloofe for the ſpace of an houre) vnderſtood any paſſages betwixt them. Thus much yet came to notice by after-relation, that [a] King Philip then required for Himſelfe the large Country of [b] Veulgueſsine, pretending that Geoffry Earle of Aniou granted it to Lewis le Groſſe, for aiding his Sonne King Henry the ſecond againſt King Stephen: and for Arthur, all Poictou, Aniou, Maine and Turaine: both which immoderate demands with others, King Iohn (conceiuing with [l] Salomon, Why doth hee not alſo aske for Adoniah the Kingdome?) [m] neither would nor ought to grant vnto him; whereby their amities intended, ended in more hoſtile defiances. But Philips capitulating then for Arthur, was onely perfunctory and complementall, as his owne words, (and afterward his actions) bewrayed: when being queſtioned by his Fauorites of his implacable [n] hatred againſt King Iohn, who had neuer harmed him, profeſſed it was onely, for that he had (not, defeated Arthur, but) poſſeſſed himſelfe of Normandy, and the other Demaines, without asking him leaue, or offering him Homage.

(7) The flames thus on all ſides breaking forth the ſtronger, by how much the more they had been for a time kept in, ([o] many Earles and Barons of France (who formerly adhered to King Richard) became Homagers to King Iohn, they ſwearing, neuer without his aſſent to reuert to Philip, and hee, neuer to make Peace with Philip, but they therein to be concluded. In the heate of which ſidings (if not before) a [p] chiefe adherent of the foreſaid Earle of Flanders (now col-leagued with King Iohn) being the Biſhop Elect of Cambray, fell into the hands of the French, at which time alſo [q] Philip Biſhop of Beauois, (a great French Peere) was held in priſon by King Iohn; and neither of them willing to forgoe their mitred Champions, [r] Petrus de Capua, the Legat, interdicted France for the one, and Normandy for the other, till they, as perſons ſacred and inuiolable, ſhould be diſmiſſed: yet King Iohn (whoſe Perſon and Title the Pope and Papals as yet much tendred) had the fauour to wring out of his prize, [s] ſixe thouſand Markes for his releaſe, and an Oath, neuer whiles hee breathed to beare Armes againſt any Chriſtian. [t] This Legat in K. Richards time, had made agreement with King Philip for a fiue yeeres Truce, which expiring with Richards laſt breath, hee ſtill laboured to eſtabliſh it betwixt the now-Kings: but King Philips great heart would not ſo come downe, which was likely to haue coſt him deere. For purſuing whither his Fury (a bad guide) did lead him, after his ſiege of Lauardin, (v Whence vpon King Iohns approach with his Army he fled to Maunz, and thence againe fled, King Iohn comming thither;) ſeized the Caſtle of Balun (which belonged to Arthur) and to preuent his enemy (as is likely) [x] he leuelled it to the very ground; which fact Duke Arthurs [y] Generall, William de Rupibus wrathfully expoſtulating with King Philip, as hauing done therein contrary to Couenants with his Lord Arthur, hee as ſcornefully anſwered, that hee would not for his Lord Arthurs pleaſure, forbeare his owne, in doing as himſelfe liſted, with ſuch Forts as hee tooke. The Generall ſeeing Arthur was but the outward maske, vnder which Philip reuelled for his hidden ends, [z] ſeriouſly perſwaded his Lord to reconcilement with his vncle King Iohn, and rather to hazard his hopes on the clemency of a Generous Foe, then on the guiles of a falſe-hearted Friend: and ſo making his peace with King Iohn, hee preſently yeelded vp to him both Maunz, &(with Lady Conſtance) the young Duke alſo, the important matter of of ſo great contentions. But heauens were not ſo propitious to theſe Reconciliats, as ſo to hold them long: ſome Philippines buzzing ſuch needleſſe [a] terrors of Impriſonment into the Noble Childes eares, that the next night, Feare giuing wings to his flight, as Loue did to his Mothers, (for leauing her Huſband [b] Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, ſhe was amorous of, and married Guido a gallant Gentleman, who then fled with her,) they eſcaped into Angiers. Arthur neither ſure of K. Philip, nor ſure to K. Iohn, had now caſt himſelfe betwixt two Milſtones; but (howſoeuer) Philip ment the grieſt in the end ſhould be his.

(8) The breach betwixt theſe two great Kings, was the more irreconcileable, by reaſon of the hatred betwixt King Philip and the Emperour [c] Otho, King Iohns Nephew, whoſe aduancement to the Empire (himſelfe perhaps [d] ayming to it) Philip ſtill endeauoured to impeach, [e] not regarding that the Pope (whoſe power Kings then regarded only, while it made for their purpoſe) had thundred his Anathema againſt all his Oppoſers: & Otho in [f] gratitude to King Richard, who [g] procured him the Diadem Imperiall, and in tender regard of his vncles honour, ſent him aduiſe, [h] not to haſten any finall attonement with the French King, for that himſelfe would bring him his vtmoſt Imperiall aßiſtance. Notwithſtanding, by the Cardinall-Legates aſſiduous interceding, a Truce was concluded till the [i] Feaſt of Saint Hillary: at which time, the Kings comming to a Treaty betwixt Guletun and Butauant Caſtles, [k] it was agreed, that Lewis the Heyre of France ſhould marry King Iohns Neece, Blanch, Daughter of Alphonſus King of Caſtile; that King Iohn ſhould giue for Dowry the City and County of Eureux, with ſundry Forts in Normandy, and thirty thouſand Markes in ſiluer; vowing alſo not to aide his Nephew Otho with men or meanes to attain the Empire: & further, [l] promiſing to leaue (if he died without Iſſue) vnto Lewis, all the Territories he held in France; all which Articles were [m] formerly engroſſed, but finally concluded betwixt Butauant and Guletun (the* one, K. Iohns, the other K. Philips Caſtle) the [n] Octaues of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, when, theſe Counties were actually ſurrendred to Philip; the Lady Blanch [o] eſpouſed to Lewis his ſon; Duke Arthur (Philips once vowed, but now vnualued charge,) yeelded ouer, and made [p] Seruant and [q] Homager to K. Iohn for his own Dukedom, whom yet his vncle was content to leaue with King Philip, who had now ſo left him, and erſt had vpheld him, onely as the baite of his owne aduantage. If Princes can be thus vnprincely degenerous, what truſt can men repoſe in baſer vaſſals? King Iohn hereupon proued much more ſtedfaſt to Philip, then either Philip was to him, or himſelfe to Otho the Emperour, who ſending his two Brethren Henry Duke of Saxony, and William (ſurnamed of [r] Winton) to demand the Counties of [s] Yorke and Poictou, with the Treaſure and Iewels which [t] King Richard bequeathed him: King Iohn denied to yeeld thereunto, [u] only in regard of his Oath which he had paſſed to Philip, to yeeld no kinde of aid to the Emperour. And further to teſtifie, (yea further then he ought) his faithfull meaning to preſerue intire this amity with Philip, [x] by his aduiſe he diuorced [y] Hawiſia his wife, as too [z] neere of Bloud, by ſentence of the Archbiſhop and Biſhops of Burdeaux, Poictoirs, and Xanton, and by the Archbiſhops hands eſpouſed Iſabell, [a] Heiretrice of Ailmar Earle of Angoliſme, a faire yong Lady, but [b] deſtined to another bed.

(9) This Finall Concord (ſo [c] called, but not prouing ſo) with Philip, who now acknowledged Iohn the [d] rightfull Heire of King Richards Crowne, gaue him more leaſure, to receiue peacebly all [e] Submitties, and bring in forceably all [f] out-ſtanders of thoſe his tranſmarine Dominions, and after to looke home to the affaires of his Kingdome, from which hee had beene (and wee there following him,) too long abſent. Yet in the heate of thoſe forraine imploiments, hee on occaſions had his recourſes hither to ſettle his State-affaires; and [g] Crowne-Reuenewes; to enact wholeſome [h] lawes for forraine and domeſticke Commerce; to Collect an [i] Ayde for his Neeces great Dowry, and Martiall vſes; which later (being three ſhillings on euery [k] Carrucata,) though his firſt and onely Subſidie ſince his comming to the Crowne, cauſed much heart-burning; eſpecially by meanes of his 1 owne brother Geoffry Archbiſhoppe of Yorke (touching whom the King was [m] fore-warned, that he would bring a Sword, and not Peace into England) who bearing himſelfe too bold on his bloud and place, [n] forbad the Collectours of that Aide in his precincts (though it were [o] granted to the King generally for all England) and alſo being required by the King to attend him into France, to conclude the Peace, and his Neeces Eſpouſall, hee very vndutifully denyed his ſeruice. The King [p] iuſtly moued with thoſe his diſloialties, cauſed all his Temporalities to bee ſeized on by his Sheriffe; whom therefore Geoffry (adding freſh fuel to the fire) did ſolemnly excommunicate, cauſed the Kings Officers to beare blowes, and interdicted the whole Prouince of Yorke. So partiall and vnhiſtoricall is the report of [q] one; (a Stranger by birth, but more ſtrange for bold vntruths) who faines the onely incentiue of ſuch indignation in the King, was that Prelates reprehenſion of his Rapines on the people. For (to giue a further taſte of that Authors [r] vehement fond malice, iuſtly ſo taxed) what ancient Iudicious Writers call an [s] Aide neceſſarie for Warres, that he enſtileth Rapines and Spoyles; where they make Iohn his Brothers Heyre by Will, hee makes Arthur; they ſay he was a [t] valiant man, he ſaith he was a Coward; where they make him [u] purſuing, and Philip flying, hee chargeth him to haue made onely plaints, when he ſhould haue drawne ſwords; where they charge the Peeres for [x] drawing backe from his Warres, hee makes them the onely Haſteings, and Iohn the Hinderer; briefly, if a [y] fire-ſhooting Meteor appeare aboue, it portends Heauens fury on Iohn; if the [z] watry Element ouer-flow, it bodes Iohns fury on his Land. But ſurely that part thereof, which fell on Geoffry, it was (you ſee) not vndeſerued: notwithſtanding, vpon the Kings* returne into England, and Geoffreys to his more loyal carriage and ſubmiſſion, his Peace was made, at the very time, and for the more celebrity, of Queen Iſabels * Coronation, with whom the King himſelfe was againe crowned at Weſtminſter by Archbiſhop Hubert.

(10) The Pompe of that ſolemnitie ended, the King reſolued of ending a long depending controuerſie with King William of Scotland, who formerly (before Iohn was proclaimed King) had challenged, as [a] his patrimonial right, the Counties of Northumberland, & Cumberland, and afterward ſeeing he got but words and delaies, was ready, (King Iohn being then in France) with an hotter and more forceable argument, to winne, what he could not craue: but being in dark [b] deuotion all night at Saint Margarets Hearſe, the ſtill true [c] Engliſh-hearted Queene perſwaded him by a Dreame, for certainely it was no other) not to infeſt England, her natiue ſoile; who therupon ſent backe his Army. But now hee commeth with a more friendly traine, vpon King Iohns ſending to him, in Honourable [d] Embaſſage, the Earles of Huntingdon & Hereford, King Williams Brother and Nephew, his three Sonnes in Law, Lacy, Veſcy and Ros, with others, to deſire him to giue him meeting at Lincolne, where accordingly they both [f] meet with kingly curteſies; and the next day, King Iohn to auſpicate his Temporall affaires with Spirituall deuotions,) and yet to ſhew what hee thought of ſome ſuperſtitious follies of thoſe times) went [g] vndantedly into the Cathedrall Church, being much diſſwaded by many, (for Monkiſh impoſtures perſwaded many it was very ominous for a King to enter that, and certaine [h] other places) and there offered a golden Chalice on S. Iohns Altar, which [i] no King before him durſt doe. Where his Deuotions performed the the two Kings (in preſence of * three Archbiſhops, thirteene Biſhops, the King of South-Wales, with a multitude of Engliſh, Scottiſh, French, and Iriſh, Princes and Peeres,) aſcending the toppe of that conſpicuous and high * hill, on the North ſide of the Citie, did there in a glorious ſolemnity, ſweare amitie and faithfull loue, k vpon the Croſier of Archbiſhop Hubert.

(11) That Spectacle ſo Royall to the beholders, was ſeconded with another, no leſſe Honorable to K. Iohn, (for Humility in ſuch great ones is more glorious then their glory,) when the King hauing lately left Hugh Biſhop of Lincolne (called the Saint, for the opinion of vnfained integrity, though l blemiſhed with ſome obſtinacies, and ſurcharged with Legends of m fained Miracles) at London very ſicke, (where himſelfe with gracious care n went to viſite him, and both confirmed his Teſtament, and promiſed the like for other Biſhops after,) now hearing he was * dead, and his Corpes then bringing into the gates of Lincolne, hee, with all that princely Traine, went forth to meet it; the o three Kings (though the Scottiſh was to depart that very day) with their Royall Allyes, carrying the Hearſe on thoſe ſhoulders, accuſtomed to vphold the weight of whole Kingdomes: from whom the Great Peeres receiued the ſame, and bare it to the Church Porch, whence the three Archbiſhops and Biſhops conuaied it to the Quier, & the next day (it there lying the meane time p open faced, mitred, and in all Pontificall Ornaments, with Gloues on his hands, and a Ring on his finger) interred it with all ſolemnities anſwerable. Yet heere the King reſted not to giue proofe, in ſo great a height, of his lowly minde, and then benigne (how euer afterward auerted) to the Clergy; when twelue Abbots of the Ciſteaux Habit (whoſe q whole Order had diſpleaſed him, by refuſing to giue Aid towards his great payment of thirty thouſand pounds) r came now to Lincolne, and all proſtrate at his feete, craued his gracious fauour, for that his Forreſters had driuen out (for ſo the King had giuen command) of his Paſtures and Forreſts all their Cattle, wherewith themſelues and Chriſts poore were ſuſtained. The King touched with remorſe on ſo venerable a troope of Suppliants, (though ſo great offenders) commanded them to riſe, who were no ſooner vp, but the King s inſpired with diuine Grace, fell flat on the ground before them, deſiring pardon, adding, that hee not onely admitted them to his loue, and their * beaſts to his Paſtures, (a ſpeciall fauour which Kings had granted that Order,) but would alſo build an Abbey for men of their ſort, (if they would deſigne ſome choice ſeat) wherein himſelfe meant to be enſhrined. Neither did hee promiſe then, more then he performed, nor were thoſe wylie Humiliates regardleſſe of chooſing a delicate plot for the purpoſe, where hee built a goodly Abbey of their Order, deſeruedly for the pleaſance of the place, named t Beaulieu, and of u rich Reuenue, and exceſſiue Priuiledge; continuing long of great renowne, as a Caſtle of refuge inuiolable; our Auncestors thinking it moſt hainous ſacriledge, thence to draw any, though wilfull Murderers or Traitors: wherein the Founders of ſuch vnſanctified x Sanctuaries & Temples of Mercy (ſo they called them) throughout this Kingdome, ſeemed rather to take Romulus for their Preſident, then Moſes, who granting fauor to caſuall Man-ſlaughters, yet y commanded wilfull Murderers to be drawne from the Altar to the ſlaughter. But this Ciſteaux diſ-Order was not alone, either in thoſe ſhamefull indignities, or gainefull attonements. The z Benedictines, in Antiquitie aboue them, in Priuiledges equall, ſcorned to be in courage behinde them for affronting their Soueraigne: who claiming the patronage of a * Benefice which the King his Father formerly beſtowed, * they impugned his royall title, lockt the Church doores againſt his Preſentee, (being the Kings neere friend) ſcorned his moſt princely louing letters of requeſt, reiected his often and earneſt meſſages; fenced the Church with armed men againſt the Kings Officers, aſſayled the Kings Sheriffe and his forces, and put them to flight by ſword, moued the Pope to excommunicate all their oppugners (which touched the King neere) yea; cauſed him to be accuſed to the Pope for a Tyrant: yet on their ſubmiſſion, hee forgaue them their offence; gaue them that patronage, with ſundry other great gifts and immunities, and ſo became their chiefe Patrone and Protector.

(12) By what degrees, men not onely of ſuch reputed-religious habit, but alſo of the Secular-Clergy, fell afterward more and more from ſuch fauours of the King, and hee from theirs, a man that will not purpoſely winke, may eaſily behold, both ſorts ſtanding ſo ſtiffe on their perſons, and their poſſeſſions Exemption from Regall commaund, that whiles the a Pope could haue all for any ſuperfluous imployment, the King could get nothing, though his Kingdome were in hazard, as you heard by the diſloyall obſtinacies both of the Archbiſhop of Yorke, who denied the King his perſonall attendance, and thoſe Ciſteaux Monkes, whoſe Coffers were thus lockt againſt him. The like pretended Exemptions of their Clergie Prelacies (as well as of their Perſons and Purſes) wrought alſo like offences, both with former Kings, and now with King Iohn, who on the death of Biſhop Hugh, reſoluing to conferre by gift, (as his b Auncestors did, and c himſelfe elſe-where lately had) that See, on ſome whom eyther merite or affection had endeared to him, (the rather, becauſe d men of thoſe places, in thoſe daies were vſually their Soueraignes boſome-Counſellours) e hee was with peremptory affronts withſtood by the Canons there, who very bolde on the Popes vp-bearing, reckt very ſlenderly their Princes diſpleaſing. It is not vnlikely that Archbiſhop Hubert (leſt Canterbury might be thought inferiour to Yorke in daring boldneſſe,) as being Papall Legate, in ſecret bolſtring them had a hand, though cloſely carried in a gloue: for that the man, who lately f gloried, the King was wholly his, now finding hee had not the ſway hee expected, and thought hee deſerued (by obligement of his firſt Agency about the Crowne,) not onely ſtudied to make vp that by his Legatine Glory which hee wanted by his Princes countenance, but further, (as g one who thinkes hee extolles his vertue, paints forth his diſloyalty,) hee repented now, more then any thing in all his life, that hee had ſo aduanced King Iohn to the Crowne. Certes, about this time hee ſhewed ſlender reſpect to his Soueraigne, (for as God is in his, ſo are Kings diſhonoured in their Miniſters diſgraces) when being prohibited by Fitz-Peter, the Kings great Iuſtitiar and Miniſter (in the Kings abſence) of Regall commaund, h from holding a Generall Councell of his Prouince, (neuer vſed to be held, but by Soueraigne permittance) his pleaſure ſcorn'd to take any counter-maund, but from him eſpeciallie, who, in i calling his inferiour, by * joynt deſerts towards the King, but his Equall, was now, in neereneſſe and faſtneſſe to the King, become farre his Superiour. But what ſpeake I of confronting a ſubordinate power? did hee ſpare to out-beard his Soueraigne himſelfe? It ſeemes no. For hauing notice, the Feaſt of the Natiuity now approaching, that the King intended, with his Queene, at Guilford to keepe that feaſtiuity with great magnificence; hee whoſe Pallace ordinarily, for ſplendour, multitude of Attendants, and ſumptuous intertainments did ſtriue with the kings (as one of his own k Succeſſors auows) thought this a fitting time, to ſhew, both his great ſtate, and little regard of his Princes diſcountenance, by l paraleling to the Kings, his owne ſumptuous preparations, m with rich attires, and coſtly gifts for his Attendants at Canterbury. The king (as kings brooke not to be brawed by Subjects, nor is it wiſedome for

The firſt breaches betwixt the King and the Lay Peeres.

(13) Such being the firſt ouertures of heart-burnings betwixt the King and his Clergy, which after by additament of daily fuelling, braſt forth into a more fearefull flame; the Lay-Peeres were ſo farre from labouring to quench it, that they made it the fiercer: for theſe Bellowes of Rebellion, which before their Homages did condition for their Rights & Liberties, were not all this while ſparing of their breath, to inflame other Nobles with the like heat of fury. Hell it ſelfe (whence all Rebellions ſpring, and thither fall againe) could not wiſh a fitter occaſion to broach and actuate ſuch a miſchiefe. For the r Poyctouins with King Philips conniuence, (taking aduantage of King Iohns abſence, and Springs approach) were vp in Armes, diſlodged his Garriſons, beleagured his Caſtles; tidings whereof recalled King Iohns thoughts from his Domeſticke Pompes, to his Tranſmarine Affaires; for the preſent, he gaue commaund to his * Seneſchall of Normandie, to attempt on them ſome Counter-ſeruices, to withdraw the Seigers, (whom alſo King Philip, ſ hearing King Iohn was in perſon comming ouer with an Army, forthwith recalled,) and publiſhed his generall t ſummons, that his Earles, Barons, and all that held by Knights-ſeruice, ſhould be ready at Portſmouth with Horſe and Armes, on Whitſonday then inſtant, to croſſe the ſeas with him. The tumultuous Earles, knowing that the King then needed their preſent helpes, and therefore might bee forced to any Capitulations, in a conuenticle held at Leyceſter, by a u ioynt-conſpiring, ſent an audacious meſſage to the King, that they would not attend him, vnleſſe hee would firſt reſtore their rights; with which diſloyall refuſall, the King iuſtly incenſed; * by ſome mens too præcipitate aduice, (conſidering the hazardous time, which needed a ſalue rather then a coraſiue) ſeized into his hands ſome of their Caſtles, to preuent their further attempts, of ſome hee tooke their children for pledges, and others, whoſe Purſes were likely to doe him truer ſeruice then their owners, he x releaſed vpon payments. At which prefixed time, hee diſpatched before him William Earle of Pembrooke, and Lord Roger Lacie with y two Regiments to ioyne with Normandies Seneſhall. What a * graue Author iudged of thoſe bold Barons heere, and other turbulent Great-ones then abroad, may be gathered by this; that as ſoone as mention fell in of thoſe refractary Lords, hee ſtreight fell off, to ſhew how in that very yeere, Pope Innocent then raigning in Rome, Saffadine the Turke in Ieruſalem, * Alexander the z Fatricide in Conſtantinople, (for ſo he yoketh theſe three together, with ſome others following them;) the great Doctors preached, that then was the time (a propheſied by Saint Iohn) when after a thouſand yeeres reſtraint, the Diuell was let looſe, to ſeduce the Nations like a b Serpent, and trouble the world like a c Dragon: which how true it proued in this our Nation and little-World (in whoſe Tragedy the Diuell alſo, amongſt the d firſt named Actors, comes now to play his part,) the Diabolicall enſuing practiſes, both of fraud and fury, will heereafter demonſtrate.

Vpon whoſe arriuall, the French King l perceiuing the power of his aduerſary, preſently condiſcended to another perſonall (but very m priuate) Parley; wherein each gaue and receiued ſuch reciprocall ſatisfaction in their deſires, that thereupon not onely the former bonds of Amity ſeemed to continue ſtrong, but were alſo more ſtrengthened with a new knot of n Aſſociation, wherein ſundry great Lords of eyther ſide were by indentment of Writing, made ſureties to the counter-part, with condition, that whither of the two Kings did firſt violate the Couenants; all his cautionary Lords ſhould be releaſed of their alleagiance to him, and become Leege-men and Aſſiſtants to the Prince offended. And that the world might take more notice of their combined loues, they o both agreed to contribute to the Holie-Warres, (which now began to bee on foot) the fortieth part of the whole Reuenewes of their Crownes; ſending their p letters abroad into their Dominions, to encourage all their Nobles and people, by their examples to doe the like. After ſome dayes there beſtowed in princely delights and entertainements, King Iohn conducted forth of the City by King Philip, & parting with mutuall atteſtations of loue neuer to bee parted, tooke his iourney towards Normandy, in full hope to enioy thence forward the contentment of quiet to himſelfe, and peace to his Dominions: but thoſe windy hopes ſoone changed with his change of the aire.

the ancient Great Arthur was risen again in him, and that the Translation of the English Kingdome was now by him to be effected. Neither was the [k] French King, for all his late painted pretensions of loue, deafe to their suggestions, who laboured to incense his hatred against Iohn; whereto hee had these further inducements; that King Iohn might quickely waxe too potent a Neighbour in that Continent, if his quiet and power were not timely rebated; that now the meanes to worke it, were more then before, the [l] English Peeres being alienated in affection from him, for denying their claimed Liberties; but chiefely that the [m] profite (such base ends can some propose of so Noble a Band) which hee hoped for by his amity (being the [n] enioying of those Signiories in the Continent, if he dyed sans Issue) was now in a manner cut off, Queene Isabel beginning to giue apparant hopes of some faire fruite from so faire a stemme. Thus whiles Earle Hugh out of his loue, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Auarice, (ah that the Noblest person should haue the basest end,) but all out of Hatred, were contriuing King Iohns ruine; hee was fartheſt from suspition, when neerest his danger, and yet they, who thus were forwardest to vndermine his Greatnesse, were themselues formost to be crusht with the weight thereof.

(16) But these slie Serpents shrowed in secret their inuenomed heads, till the warmth of the [o] Spring (a time suiting for Martiall mischiefes) called them forth; when King Philip (hauing newly cast his skinne, and as most able, so was [p] most willing to breake the way) desired another enteruiew with King Iohn: who comming thither (the [q] place was twixt Vernon and Liste Dandale) with expectation of some fruits of those louely courtesies which their last meeting seemed to haue engrafted; he there found that this last Winter had nipt all those faire blossoms. For Philip [r] forgetfull of all former Compacts, and [s] pretending some imaginary wrongs, in outragious manner [t] required him without delay to re-deliuer into Arthurs hands, all his Transmarine dominions, Normandy, Turaine, Aniou, Poictou; or otherwise as Lord Paramount of those Countries, which Iohn held by Homage, he peremptorily [v] cited him personally to appeare in * Easter Terme at Paris, there to [x] answere what should be laide to his charge, and to abide the Arrest of his Court of Iustice. The colour on which he thus did cite him, was (say [y] some) King Iohns sharpe repressing of some rebellious attempts of Hugh le Brun the former yeer, whereof the Earle complained to King Philip, as to the chiefe Lord. King Iohn much amazed to see, not onely hony so soone distempred into gall, but the French King also turned into an Apparatour, [z] disdained both his Citation and Commands, as very vnnoble for Englands King to accept, or the French to offer; neither indeed did Philip thus put the matter to daying, as intending any such legitimate proceeding, but onely to make his aduersary secure of any other assaults, then by Petty-foggers. For whether it be true or no, [a] that King Iohn for his non-appearance, was by sentence of the French Peeres adiudged to loose all his Territories in the Continent: certaine it is, that * no sooner was the Conference with indignation broken off, but Philip (hee had before prepared to effect what hee had proiected) with Power and Fury assailes Butauant Castle, whose Turrets (high reared by * King Richard) hee [b] leuelled with the Foundations, and thence suddenly like a flash of lightening, beganne to inuolue the [c] neighbouring parts with ransacking and ruines, till giuing an assault, (which had held him eight dayes) to the Castle of Radapont, King Iohn comming to the rescue, forced him with shame to speed away. To repaire which dishonour, and to impaire the English forces by distraction of imployments, returning to Paris, hee there [e] appoints for Arthur (to * whom he had now affianced his yonger daughter) both certaine selected Nobles

(17) Queene Eleanor Regent of those Prouinces, attended with a [k] very slender guard, yet strong enough for dayes of quiet, (which both her [l] Age did now desire, and her [m] Homage done to Philip, and Philips faire shewes to her did promise;) hauing no speedier notice of those incursions, then the vnpleasing effects thereof, (for on Arthurs good successes, [n] K. Philip proclaimed him Lord of those Dominions) betooke her selfe into Mirabeau, one of the most tenable Townes in [o] Poictou, sending to King Iohn, (whose forces were then in [p] Normandy and [q] Maine, repressing or preuenting Philips attempts) for present aids. Which yet could not so speedily come, but Arthur (who knew that vpon seisure of such a prize as Eleanor, hee might draw her sonne to any conditions) had preuented them, besieged her, and [r] possessed himselfe of her towne, though not of her person, as [s] some by mis-vnderstanding haue mis-related. For she [t] retiring into the Castle, made it good against her Grand-childs incessant battery; about which, whiles he, with his [x] continuall supplies of Poitouine and [y] Aniouine princes, was [z] indefatigably busied, King Iohns Army neere at hand (for his expedition both by day and night to his mothers rescue, is recorded as [a] admirable) brought the newes of their owne approach; which caused [b] the great Army of the Leagers so industrious before to impeach others, no lesse sollicitours now to defend themselues. Both Armies [c] martially ranged, and Arthurs Battalions not onely [d] vndaunted ly, but also very [e] pompously comming on to the shocke, the fight proued [f] most fierce and terrible, each side resoluing, by reason of both the Competitors presence in the field, that the End and vpshot of all their designes, depended on that dayes successe: which in the end by the fortunate [g] prowesse of King Iohn and his English, fell disastrously on Arthur, his French, and other Assistants, who after a [h] great slaughter made amongst them, [i] turning their backes to him, from whom they had before turned their Faithes, tooke their flight [k] towards the Towne to shelter their liues within those walles, which so late the Seate of their triumphes, became now the cage of their captiuation, and the Toombe of all Arthurs ambitious hopes, though himself so vnhappy as to suruiue them: for [l] together with the tumultuary flyers, the victorious King and his Army entred, renued a [m] most bloudy fight, repossessed the Towne, freed his Mother, enthralled his Enemies, and recouered all the Prouinces which had reuolted.

Merlin to haue beene ment of him, y that he ſhould be crowned with the head of a Lyon, ſhould cut out the tongues of Buls, and lay yron chaines on the backes of roaring Beaſts (and indeed hee z chained them hand and foote, and ſo conuayed them away in Carts, a kind of riding till then vnuſuall with them,) ſo King Iohn himſelfe, a duely acknowledging the greatneſſe of Gods goodneſſe therein, ſent his Letters to all his Barons whereſoeuer (thereby to encourage the loyall, and hold in awe the tumultuous) inciting them to render all praiſe vnto God for ſo admirable a worke, and ſo gracious aſſiſtance: and ſoone after b he diſperſed his Nobleſt Captiues into ſundry Caſtles in Normandy and England; Arthurs ſiſter Eleanor, called the Damoſell of Britaine, being c committed to Briſtow Caſtle, where ſhe d long liued with e very honourable vſage. And though the Kings diſpleaſure was iuſtly incenſed againſt her brother Arthur, for ſo frequent wauering in his faith, yet meaning to trie all meanes of winning him who had thus loſt himſelfe, f hee ſent for him (being then at Falaiſe in the cuſtodie of g Hubert L. Chamberlaine) and entreated him very gently, promiſing him all honourable reſpects, if (as yet) he would reſolue to forſake the French Kings amity, and frame both his minde for hearty loue, and his actions for peaceable obſeruance towards him, his Vncle and Liege-Lord. Which exceeding clemency, the ill-aduiſed yong Gentleman (for what wiſedome is it to ſhew pride where wee need mercy, and to giue threats beyond poſſibility of performance?) h requited onely with arrogant and vndutifull language, furiouſly vpbraiding the King with violent and fraudulent detention of the Engliſh Crowne, which menacingly hee there required of him, and all other King Richards Countries, as his lawfull inheritance, affirming with an Oath, that vnleſſe he did forthwith reſtore them, he ſhould not long liue in peace. With which incorrigible pertinacy the king prouoked, as ſeeing no place left to better hopes, i committed him to ſtricter cuſtody k vnder Robert de Veypont, in the Caſtle of Roan.

(19) The Britaines fury and conſpiracies, which King Iohn hoped to abate by this their Princes durance, l were thereby much more augmented; like Serpents, moſt ſtrugling with their traines, when they feele their head in preſſure. Which moued the King, who was now returned into England, (and in triumph of his late victory, m wore his Crowne againe at Canterbury, at the coſt of his former hoſte) to take aduiſe of his Councell touching his troubled affaires, whoſe ſentence was (if wee will credite the o reporter) that Arthur ſhould looſe his eyes. But the eſcaping of ſuch tortures, is by p ſome aſcribed to the commiſeration of Lord Hubert; by q others, to the mediation of Queene Eleanor, who interceded with her Sonne, for her Grand-child, as long as ſhe liued, which was not long; Deathes vnpartiall hand (and r griefe of heart, ſome ſay) laying that great and prudent Queene, (the wife of * two mighty Kings, and mother of * three) where Princes and Peſants are all equals. Her Nephew much behind her in age, ſoon ouer-tooke her (if not t out-went her) in deſtiny; whoſe death diuulged on King Iohns returne from England, u gaue his maligners freſh coloured occaſion, both to moleſt his quiet, and to diſtaine his eſtimation, as if he had not onely beene the Cauſer, but alſo the executor of it with his owne hands.

(20) As the Tongues of Paraſites are no true ſcales to weigh the worth and vertues of Great men; ſo neither ought we to iudge of their (or any mans) blemiſhes, by the deforming pencils of Enuy or Rancor; with one of which, no eminency, either of place or of vertue, was euer vnattended. And that this bloody aſperſion on the King, came from no other fountaine but malignity; ſuch as then liued, and might therefore beſt know the truth, and were alſo (as Monkes generally were) his moſt bitter Taxers, and therefore farre from ſaluing his infamy with partiall falſehood, can beſt witneſſe. It was (ſaith v one) by certaine perſons auowed, that Arthur attempting to eſcape ſecretly out of hold, was by caſualty drowned in the Riuer Seyne (on which the Caſtle of Roan is ſeated;) and yet the Frenchmen, the Kings mortall enemies (and therefore plenary credit not to bee giuen them) giue it out, that he was murthered by the kings command, yea, and by his owne hands: thus by the malice of ſlanderers, Englands King became not a little defamed. With whom other the approuedſt Authors accord (though differing in the * manner of his death) that this imputation ſprang only from the x French emulation; as ſince it hath beene kept on foot, onely by y French, or Italianate ſpirits, z one of which hath not bluſhed to charge King Iohn with murthering of his owne Brother King Richard, and a another with killing Arthurs ſiſter, who yet outliued him 24. yeeres; ſo ſhameleſly will the Penne blurre the truth of Actions, where its once dipped in gall againſt the perſon. But ſharper ſhowers then of Tongues (which being vndeſerued, are to be vnregarded) were ſequels of Arthurs death: it ſeeming to giue new life to King Iohns troubles, and King Philips hatred, which yet once againe muſt goe masked vnder the roabe of Iuſtice. For Philip cites Iohn, as Duke of Normandy, to appeare at a ſet day, to be tried vpon point of c Treaſon by his Peeres; Conſtance Arthurs mother (well brookiug her name for her immutable hatred to King Iohn) is made the d plaintiffe, requiring iuſtice of Philip, as both their Soueraigne; King Iohn not appearing, is condemned e of a traiterous outrage, for that careleſſe of his Oath made to the French, he though an Vncle, had murthered his elder brothers ſon, being an Homager to the French, and that within the French Territories; without any legall courſe, nor by cognizance of thoſe to whom it appertained; whereupon he is adiudged to be held an enemy to the French State, to forfeit all his Signiories which by Homage he held of the French, and thoſe to reuert to the Crowne of France, and a re-entry to be made by force of Armes, if any deny poſſeſſion. Thus now the ſecond time, by a ſolemne, but moſt vniuſt ſentence, (as the * Pope himſelfe did ſtrongly and truly plead againſt Philips vnprincely and vniuſt proceedings,) the King & Peeres of France diſherited & condemned K. Iohn, though abſent, vnheard, neither confeſſing, nor conuicted of the Action; albeit at that time f he ſent them his royall promiſe to come, (if they would giue him publike faith and ſafe conduct for his comming and * returning) and anſwere at Paris touching the death of Arthur, though he was his Liegeman, had ſworne him fealty, had violated the ſame, had raiſed a rebellion, and was taken in battle. Vpon which grounds, if King Iohn had cauſed the pretended execution on ſo capitall a Complotter both againſt his Life and Crowne; and one, who had cauſed ſo much bloud-ſhed of his people, and more would if he had eſcaped; in which caſes Princes are and ought to be very iealous; what vnderſtanding Statiſt can iuſtly condemne him, or iuſtifie the French iniuſtice? Eſpecially it being queſtionable, and euen then h much debated, Whether the Peeres of France were competent Iudges on a King annoynted, and ſo their ſuperiour, the King of England and Duke of Normandy being but one perſon, & maior dignitas abſorbet minorem, the greater dignity was to ſwallow vp the leſſe. But when the will of a Ruler, is a rule, or ruled-caſe to his Iudges, no other could be expected then by theſe Peeres was performed: eſpecially themſelues being ſharers in the booty of his Lands.

(21) Neither did they here ſtay; but (as in moſt States, the Actes and Decrees aduantageous to the Princes, are carefully purſued, though others ſeldome or coldly executed) that heady ſentence was i ſeconded with as haſty force, on Philips part, and on Iohns (if ſome Authors ſay true) as much neglected. It is no rare thing to ſee Princes (becauſe on their ſafety depends the State of their Kingdomes) often ſuſpitious of dangers where there is no cauſe; but it is is vnexcuſable in them, vnder a ſhew of reſolution to be ſecure, where they ſee their Perſon or State may be neere vnto hazard. An intelligent man would thinke, that whiles ſo vaſte indignities were in hatching (yea and now on wing) by ſo inſatiate enemies, King Iohn had been whetting his reuenge, leuying his forces, ſtrengthening his confines, combining his friends and Allies, ſo to regret their pride and malice, who thus proceeded to vnſtate him of that [k] goodlieſt portion of France, [l] part whereof for aboue three hundred yeeres had beene the inheritance of his Anceſtors. But whether it were the * bewitching dalliances of his faire Iſabel, with whom he was in armes, when he ſhould haue bin in Armes, as [m] ſome Authors taxe him; or his deceiued expectation of Aides from his Barons, [n] as himſelfe alleaged; or promiſed redreſſe by the Pope, as the [o] ſequele ſhewed: too true it ſeemeth, that beginning his Chriſtmas at Cane in Normandy with feſtiuall pleaſures not vnfitting the ſeaſon, hee continued them ſo vnſeaſonably and vnreaſonably too, that hee gaue both to the [p] French leaſure to execute their Peeres ſentence, and [q] to the Brittons and Poyctouins, an edge to proſecute their old rebellions, now newly quickned with the loſſe of their yong maſter: whereby his ſtrongeſt Townes and Caſtles daily fell away, either by force of Aſſailants, or treachery in defendants, or on diſpaire of needfull aides.

(22) Treachery as it was formoſt (for it gaue beginning and meanes to the reſt) ſo did it moſt in vndermining King Iohns poſſeſſions, which ſtirred him to take ſharpe reuenge [r] by hanging vp all his Hoſtages of Poyctou for their Countrimens treaſons. But ſuch a death (though of all other moſt diſgracefull) is not ſo hatefull to a Spirit truely enobled, as is the ſtaine of diſhonour, eſpecially for Treachery or Cowardize: from either of which I wiſh I could with truth acquite [s] thoſe two great Barons (whoſe names wee will here forget) to whom King Iohn entruſted the defence of the [t] famous Caſtle called Vall-de Ruill; who no ſooner ſaw King Philip [v] engirding it with his great hoaſt, and mounting his Engines of battery againſt it, but eſtſoones, before one ſtone of the wals was ſhaken, or any one of their men had loſt the leaſt haire of their heads, they diſhonourably ſurrendred the Fort (a matter of very great conſequence) to K. Philips pleaſure: who though abundantly pleaſed with the deed, yet ſo [x] contumeliouſly (but moſt iuſtly, and prince-like, recompenced the Doers, for Traitors alwayes become odious, though the Treaſon be commodious,) that, for ſo baſe a part, hee commanded them to be fettered in chaines, and baſely intreated in cloſe priſon, till they had deerely redeemed their liberty, though they could hardly their reputation. Another noble Baron, * Captaine of Caſtile Galliard (which being built on a very high Rock ouer Seyne, [y] King Richard had made impregnable) by his vndaunted proweſſe, and [z] great ſlaughter made vpon Philips hoaſt, lying [a] 6. moneths in ſiege about him, was farre from any ſuſpition of daſtardy; but yet [b] eſcaped not the blemiſh both of ingratitude and infidelity, in that at length hee not onely yeelded vp that Caſtle to the enemies, but alſo [c] ſecretly by night brought them into the Caſtle of Montfort, which hee betrayed vnto them, not weighing his faith to his Leige Lord, who had beſtowed on him that Caſtle, with all the honour and demaines therto belonging. Otherwiſe for his firſt ſurrender, his caſe had beene more excuſable, the famine (an vnreſiſtable enemy) in the Caſtle being ſo great, that, as the [d] French Recorders themſelues confeſſe, when the Women and others of the vnſeruiceable ſort were put forth for ſparing of prouant, and being betwixt the Caſtle & the Enemies, found pitty and releeſe of neither, in the ſight of them all a Woman great with child was deliuered, and her infant preſently eaten vp. Amongſt thoſe, and other of King Iohns reuolting Barons, like ſo many falling Starres, if we ſhould pretermit that fixed and bright Starre of vnmoueable fidelity & reſolution, the Lord * Robert de Lacy, wee ſhould be guilty of high offence againſt true honour, who hauing receiued of his Prince the cuſtody of the goodly Caſtle Rocke-Andely ([e] which was builded alſo by King Richard) [f] did brauely beare off the ſiege and power of King Philip and his hoaſt almoſt a whole yeere; in which ſpace, though by their continuall batteries and vnderminings [g] a great part of the walles were flatted, yet they could neuer make entry vpon him, but were repulſed with ſlaughter, till his prouiſion of his victuals being now ſpent to the laſt howre, he called his Souldiers together, encouraging them, after ſo long proofe of their Manhood, not to faint now in the laſt Act; but to conſider, that though it were better for thē to die by famine, then to liue with reproch of falſe or faint-heartedneſſe, yet it is more noble for ſouldiers to die fighting, then famiſhing, and together with their owne liues, to ſacrifice to their Countries honor the blood of their ſlaughtred enemies. Wherupon fiercely * ſallying forth with his Reſolutes, after a bloody ſhambles made in the middeſt of his beleaguers, he was by multitude ouer-borne and taken, but [h] in regard of his exemplary faith and proweſſe, in maintaining his charge, by King Philips expreſſe command, (a ſecond princely and prudent fact, to diſcipline his Subiects by thus entreating his foes,) he was honourably vſed, and * without reſtraint of a priſoner.

(23) But as the fact of this Peere was peereleſſe, ſo was this [i] Clemency in that King, but rare and vnaccuſtomed towards ſuch Chieftaines as ſtifly out ſtood his aſſaults; [i] ſome of whom formerly hee had cauſed to bee diſpiteouſly dragged at horſe-heeles, for the terrour of others. Of which indignities, and other irkeſome extremities, (the inſeparable companions of warre) indured by his people, when King Iohn had notice by Meſſengers ſent vnto him for reliefe and aides, no maruell is it, if [k] his griefe were aboue beleefe or meaſure, finding himſelfe vtterly deſtitute of meanes to relieue their wants, or his owne loſſes; albeit for the time hee bare it out with a manly ſhew, ſaying, [l] that theſe were but the French pilferings, of which he meant in due time to exact an account with intereſt. For what elſe could hee doe? The Normans (to omit thoſe others in open Rebellion) [m] either wholly fallen away from him, or but diſſemblingly adhering to him; his [n] Barons from home, failing him at his need; his [o] Nobles there about him, being vnder pretext of a ſpeedy comming again, returned into England: by which meanes the King [p] was left very diſpeopled, hauing onely a ſmall traine, which could in ſo great a need do him but very ſmall ſeruice: but that theſe important and vnportable matters [q] did no whit moue him, nor could retriue him [r] from the boſome of his too-deare Enchantreſſe, (which occaſioned ſome to thinke him infatuated with * ſorcery) is a thing paſt capability of beleefe.

(24) The King thus diſfurniſhed of all helpes, Innocentius, the ſtirring Biſhop of Rome, made fayre ſhew to ſalue theſe temporall wounds with a ſpirituall playſter; which doubtleſſe made King Iohn more ſecure then ſtood with his good: for, as in ſo great diſtreſſes, there was no forraine Prince fitter for the King to combine with, then Otho the Emperour, his owne Nephew, and Philips profeſſed enemy: ſo the Pope on the one ſide beginning to bee iealous of Othoes greatneſſe, miſtruſted the concurrence of two ſuch great friends, and therefore vndertooke to vmpeere the debates betwixt thoſe two great Enemies: and King Iohn on the other ſide, willing to make vſe of the Popes fauour, durſt not yet comply with any, whom his Sanctitude any whit diſfauoured. His Legates for this buſineſſe, were the Abbots [t] of Caſmer and Troiſfons: his motiue, that [v] theſe diſſentions of Chriſtendome weakned the wars againſt Turky: his colour, [x] that this contention being a matter of faith-breach (as of Leagues, Oath and Couenants) the cognizance thereof did properly appertaine to his ſacred iudicature; whereof he made ſo little doubt, as that they y very letter then ſent to the French Peeres, is to this day regiſtred for z a pontificall decree: and this audacious Law then by Innocentius firſt brought to the world for current, That whenſoeuer one Prince is delinquent againſt another, the correction thereof appertaines to the Pope.* Their Commiſſion was, [a] to call the Biſhops and Princes of both Kingdomes, for ſetling a Peace; to inhibite all hoſtility; to reſerue the further triall of the Right to the Pope, as [b] Soueraigne Iudge; [c] to enjoyne that all Religious places by the warres deſtroyed, or impoueriſhed, ſhould be reſtored to their due State; [d] if eyther of the Kings ſhould be refractary, his whole Kingdome preſently to be put vnder Interdict. Philip, albeit the Pope was then offended with him vpon other termes, (for that hee [e] impoſed towards his warres a taxe of certaine Tenthes vpon his Clergie, (againſt the Popes will) alleadging it was neceſſary that out of their priuate abundance, they ſhould beare a charge in the common preſeruation,) yet knowing the Pope had neede of his friendſhip about ſetling the Empire, hee meant ſo long to ſide with the Popes authority, as the Pope would ſtand with his commodity, and repining to haue ſo faire a prey taken out of his talents, made bold [f] to deſpiſe both the commands & the curſes: yet this he did in ſmoother faſhion then hee had done once before, when he rigorouſly puniſhed all the g Biſhops and Prelates, whom, for conſenting to ſuch a Papall cenſure, he turned out of their Sees and dignities; for now, hee [h] appealed from the ſentence for a faſhions ſake, [i] but yet violently proceeded with his warres, and [k] did ſwim with the full current of his victories. The waues whereof ſo faſt ſurrounded King Iohn, that * fearing alſo further treaſon of his owne men, he thought good, till ſome better daies would ſhine vpon him, (eſpecially winter ſeaſon enforcing ſurceaſſe of warres) to abandon the place of his injurious foes, to expoſtulate in England with his perfidious friends.

(25) For that was the firſt worke hee did, after his arriuall, ([l] which was at Portſmouth on Saint Nicholas day in December) when [m] laying to the charge of his Earles and Barons, that in his warres they ſuffered him to be deſtitute of requiſite aids, and [n] had left him in the middeſt of his enemies, by which their defaults, hee was thus deſpoyled of his Caſtles and Countries; thereupon, by [o] aduiſe of Hubert Lord Archbiſhop, and Lord Fitz-Peter Chiefe Iuſtitiar, (who knew theſe were no [p] forged cauillations) he put them and other delinquents to their Fines, (for his warres made him deſire their money more then their liues) wherein theſe two great Counſellors were [q] ouerſeers for the receipts, the one for the Clergy, the other for the Laity, of both whom they receiued no leſſe ſums of curſes, then of Coyne. The like repining among the people, (who judge of the goodneſſe of a King onely by ſparing their purſes) enſued on the grant of a large Subſidie (two Marks and half of euery Knights Fee) in a Parliament * preſently after held at Oxford, where the King & Peeres conuening about redreſſe of thoſe remedileſſe miſchiefes, the iſſue ([r] as ſeemeth) was, that Ambaſſages ſhould bee addreſſed into France, two Prelates, Canterbury and Norwich, with two Earles Marſhall and Leiceſter, to treate from the Body of the Kingdome, touching thoſe Prouinces, which being incorporated with Englands Soueraignety, could not without apparant injuſtice be abſtracted from a Nations common intereſt, vpon coloured pretences againſt any particular. Philip, hauing [s] vpon King Iohns departure thence vſed his whole Forces and wits, to weary, or to win diuers other Cities and Forts; which had till then ſtood faithfull (for which purpoſe hee alſo imployed ſundry [t] inſtruments, themſelues firſt corrupted, that they might corrupt others to defection, with great rewards and greater promiſes,) hee meant not now to re-commence Queſtions of Right, hauing already neere decided that poynt by the poynt of his ſword: yet becauſe hee was to deale with a mightie Nation, hee would not abrupty refuſe to capitulate, and yet againe by propoſall of [v] conditions exceeding eyther Reaſon or Poſſibility, hee dammed vp all paſſages to peaceable agreement: [x] his demaunds were, to haue eyther Arthur, whom hee knew to be dead, re-deliuered into his hands aliue, or elſe, his Siſter Eleanor in marriage, with all thoſe Countries in that Continent: but thoſe Stateſmen eaſily perceiued that Philips heart, aimed farther then his tongue, and that with Eleanor he hoped to purchaſe a higher dowry, euen the Engliſh Diadem, whoſe claime glided downe from her brother to her; which perchance was the ſecret ground of his [y] Oth, that he would neuer linne to purſue that quarrell, till hee had depriued King Iohn of his Kingdome.

(26) This Ambaſſage was not onely thus iſſueleſſe, but produced alſo effects tending to further irritation: for this ſeemeth to be the time when [a] Philip ſent a brauing Champion, to juſtifie by Duel before the States here in England, what his Maſter had done in France againſt their King in open war; and [b] though it was not deemed expedient to jeopard a Title of ſuch weight on the Armes and Fortune of one man; yet it was reſolued the Challenger ſhould not paſſe vnanſwered, whereto none was held fitter then Iohn Curcy Earle of Vlſter, (for [c] rebellion and denying his homage to the King, condemned to perpetual impriſonment in the Towre,) a man of Giant-like limme and ſtrength, and of ſome diſpoſitions not deſpicable, if they had not beene ſauaged with a too careleſſe rudeneſſe: which appeared not onely in his [d] wilde ſpeeches, touching the Kings miſ-uſage of his nephew Arthur (which [e] ſome by errour alledge as cauſe of his indurant durance,) but euen now, when the king demaunding him, whether hee would combate in his quarrell? [f] No, (quoth he) not in thy quarrell, nor for thy ſake, but for the Kingdomes right I will fight to the death. Againſt which day, whiles he repaired with large diet his impayred lims and ſinewes, the French-man hearing of his exceſſiue feeding, and ſtrength anſwerable thereto, thereby fearing he had beene ſome Monſter of Nature, rather then a man, hee ſecretly ſneaked away [g] into Spaine, aſhamed to ſhew his face in France againe. Curcy finding the King gracious, was hereupon releaſed, and [h] is ſaid (if this bee not to digreſſe) to haue croſſed the ſeas for Ireland fifteene times, and euermore beaten backe to the ſhore; [i] acknowledged himſelfe heerein juſtly puniſhed of God, neuer againe to ſee his owne ſeate, for diſplacing God out of his, when he conuerted the Church of Prebendaries in Doan, conſecrated to the bleſſed Trinity, into an Abbey of Monkes, to the honor and name of Saint Patrick, [k] whoſe Image was erected in a ſtately ſeat, wherein before the Trinity was deportracted, which was thence rejected into a priuate Chappell. The [l] Iriſh relate, that the two Kings being afterward together (belike when they made the next truce in France) King Philip hearing Curcy to bee in the Engliſh Campe, intreated to ſee ſome experience of his ſo much feared and reported ſtrength: where a Helmet of excellent proofe full farced with Mayle, being ſet vpon a great wodden-blocke, the Earle lifting his truſty Skeyne, firſt louring round about him with a dreadfull aſpect, cleft ſo deepe quite through the ſteely reſiſtance, into the knotty wood, that none there could draw it out but himſelfe, who did it with eaſe, and being aſked by the Kings, why he frowned ſo irefully before the ſtroke; he told them, that he then intended if he had failed of his blow, to haue kil'ed them all, both Kings and others the lookers on.

(27) But what Philip could not in England by one Champion, he accompliſhed in Normandy by many; where hauing a [m] mighty power attending him from city to city, yet he thought faire wordes would be for himſelfe both cheaper and ſafer, and with the Prouincials more forceable then force it ſelfe; eſpecially, where where such troupes of armed Orators were at hand, and where golden preparatiues had made way with the chiefest. Philip tolde them, [n] their late Lord had "quite forsaken them, and that therefore himselfe, "as their supreame Liege came to prouide that his "owne Countries might be indemnified, desiring "them louingly to admit and embrace him as their "Lord, sith now they had no other to protect "them from skathe; but menacing withall, that "if they forced him to vse force, they should die "no other death then hanging, or to bee flead a-"liue: with which fawnings and feares, though many well munified places were fetched off without any resistance, [o] their Captaines violating their faith to curry-fauour with the French; yet Roan, the [p] place euer honoured for fidelity to the English Crowne (and [q] therefore worthily selected by King Richard to be the Shrine of his Leonine Heart,) was better fortified both in affection and munition, then to waue vpon parties. Which neglect incensed Philip to turne his Oratory into Battery, (it being the chiefest Citie, and therefore of greatest consequence for consummating his victories,) which he continued in a most fierce & [r] horrid manner of siege, the space of two monethes; but finding it to be with small aduauntage, hee fell againe to [*] golden Eloquence, attracting some in speciall with present pay, and all in generall with [s] promises of future inioying all their wonted laws, and liberties, without impairement of any their commodities whatsoeuer: aduising them [t] not to reject those profered conditions, which ere long they would gladly get, when they should not be granted. The Roanists, seeing their dangers, feeling their wants, fearing their ruines, yet desired respite till King Iohn might know their State: who finding himselfe at home as ill-be sted as theirs abroad, his Barons [v] refusing to follow the warres, returned them answere, hee could not presently releeue them. Whereupon the [x] Great men, who could sway the multitude with cheaper reasons, then Philips open hand had swayed with them, perswaded them to weigh, that in truth they were all originally French-men, though now called Normans, of that noblest and richest part of all France, and the French King being Supreame Lord thereof, there was no cause at all of continuing this new hostility, but very many of renuing that antique amitie.

(28) The [y] Head, yea and Heart of all Normandy thus fainting; who can expect that those few inferiour members, yet vntainted, should so continue long? neither did they. So as eft soones all that Dukedome, one of the goodliest gemmes in the Englishe Diademe, & disbranched from France [z] since the yeare eight hundred eighty fiue, was againe rent away, inglorioussly for them who lost it, injustly by them who got it, but perfidiously by such as should, and might haue kept it. For whatsoeuer necessitie then, or malice since hath laid on the King; this Eulogie, and memoriall thereof, written by [a] vnpartiall pennes, will stand indelible on his Subjects, A Rege Angliæ, Normannia fraudibus suorum alienata, Englands King lost Normandie by treacheric of his owne people. And no lesse treacherously dealt Philip with them, when he had caught them with the trap of his glosing proffers (as such Princes more vsually then princely, square their promises to others liking, their performances to their owne) causing without delay their cities goodly wals [b] to be vtterly demolished, and giuing strict charge that they should neuer be built vp againe. The other neighbouring Countries, Main, Turaine, Poictou, who were all fore-runners in the Rebellion, would not be now behinde in the finall reuolt; Angiers in this more happy, that she fell away by others falshood, not her owne, when standing on her guard, [c] William de Rupibus clad his choyse Souldiers vpon their Armour, in the habite and other furniture of marker men, who so getting accesse into the City-gates, made easie entrance for a greater hoast; which soone after became absolute Lords of all Anjou.

(29) Wofull experience had now taught King Iohn a Lesson fit to be learned of all Princes, whom the fawning World enstileth most Mighty, that this their might is not onely lyable to the checke and dispose of that Highest all-ruling power, who vnthrones them at his will; but euen depends of the wauing humours, and wils of those * inferiour Vassels, of whom they thinke themselues vn-resistable Commaunders. But King Iohn was not vnsensible eyther of his forraine dishonours, (though as [d] often as hee endeauoured to redeeme it, by leuying any Army, suteable to so great a designe; so often was hee crossed by his owne Nobles) or of those his Domesticke affronts; which notwithstanding, by counsell and assistance of his better affected, & truer hearted friends and subjects, at length [e] hee gathered a Royall Hoast and a mightie Naue, (therein 1400. Mariners [f] some say) with full resolue to reuenge his wrongs, and repaire his losses. Which great enterprize, managed with vnmoueable determination, (for now with full sayles, and fuller heartes at Portsmouth they were ready to embarke) brought to the Kings further knowledge, and to the worlds; who had beene all this while the secret vnderminers of his fortunes, and hinderers of his imployments. For Hubert [g] the Archbishop, and Papal Legate, with many others, (amongst whom, [h] some find William Marshall Earle of Pembroke numbred) thither comes vnto the King, and flatly [i] forbids him to proceede in the voyage. Some [k] Writers haue laboured to conject the true cause and reasons of this audacious Prohibition; but if wee consider on the one side the Popes vse of Philips Forces, to counter-ballance if neede were Othoes greatnesse; on the other, the interest which both the Pope * and Philip had in Huberts affection: we may without Huberts [l] diuining Spirit pry into the mystery of his secret workings, as an Archbishop, and now open commaund as a Legate, to hinder King Iohn, for feare of hindring King Philip.

(30) But whatsoeuer was the reason, Hubert was the Instrument that so resolute projects, so [m] inestimable charges, so necessary an action fell sodainely to the ground, whereby, besides the selfe-mischiefe which therewith fell on the King, many fresh grudgings accrewed vnto him, for suffering himselfe to be thus violently repulsed from so behouefull a purpose. The Archbishop and Marshall, as principals, were rewarded with the [n] curses of the dismissed multitudes, as the just fee for their vnjust counsell; and the King himselfe was so little pleased with so vnexpected a countermaund, that albeit at the present, either awed with the authority of the Papall Legate, or with the weight of his coloured motiues, or with hazard which hee might leaue behinde him) hee durst not withstand it; yet [o] the very next day, checking himselfe for ouer-prizing the commaund of any man, aboue the value of his kingly honour and state, hee [p] resolued to recollect his disparkeled troupes, and to * put forth to Sea. To which end, taking order for his Nobles to follow, they gaue him leaue [q] with a small company to waffe vp and downe two daies, in expectance of their attendance, till seeing them more obsequious to Huberts commaund then his, ([r] the Archbishop also sending his Inhibition after them on the Sea) hee was forced to come againe to land. How a King of any royall sparkle, could brooke such Sea and Land Tempests, without disgorging his Kingdome of the causers thereof, I cannot conceiue; and yet so vneuenly doth some mens judgement poyse, whose affection guides the Beame, that this defeating of the Kings weightiest affaires, is censured as [s] too light to deserue the punishment which insued, when the King put many of the Earles, Barons, Knights, yea and Clergy-men, to a grieuous pecuniary redemption for thus refusing to follow him for recouery of his Inheritance.

(31) The Archbishop, though their Ring-leader, might might well haue beene exempted from this iudgement, by his paſſage to a higher, dying (if [t] ſome erre not) the very ſame weeke, eyther of [v] griefe, or of a [x] feuer, which killed him in foure daies: but the [y] king forthwith in perſon at Canterbury ſeized vpon all his wealth and poſſeſſions, ſhewing himſelfe [z] right ioyfull, that now he was rid of him, whom men ſuſpected of too familiar practiſing with the French King, and ſaying, [a] he was neuer a King till now, by reaſon of Huberts too preſumptuous daring to croſſe his royall reſolutions as late he did. But this ioy and hope of happier daies, was ſoone choaked and buried in the ſame Tombe with Hubert; out of whoſe Aſhes ſprang vp a roote yeelding more, and more bitter fruites, then King Iohn had as yet taſted, by how much more lamentable are the wounds which are in the bowels and heart of a State, then thoſe which only light on the skirts or more remote members. The firſt ſeedes of which faſt-growing miſchiefes, were to the eye, (as are the beginnings of all Kingdomes ruine) very ſmall and contemptible, and the Sowers of little better regard, being but Cloiſtered monkes, who craftily factious to aduance a priuate friend, (which once mounted into Huberts Chaire, might be-friend them againe,) they gaue a deadly blow, both to themſelues, their Soueraigne, and the State in generall. The [*] yonger heads amongſt them (whoſe vnexperience makes them in acts of Societies more forward and daring) hauing ſecret notice of Huberts death, [c] meant by a ſlight (whereunto they doubted not to finde the Popes furtherance) to defeate their Soueraignes intereſt in that Election, (and perchance in all other, euer after) of a Primate for the See of Canterburie, the moſt important place of his Kingdome. [*] Reginold, the Sub-prior of their Couent, One (as you ſhall heare) fitter for their projects, then for that place, was the man they choſe, and that at [d] midnight, when ſinging Te Deum, they lifted him firſt vpon the High Altar, and after into the Metropolitan-Chaire. They ought to haue firſt obtained the Kings aſſent, and leaue to elect, and therefore to preuent both [e] his interpoſing and diſpleaſure, till it were too late for him to redreſſe the wrong; the ſame night they cauſed their Elect to enter [*] caution by oath, neuer to carry himſelfe as Archbiſhop, nor to make it knowne to any man liuing, till he had further eſpeciall warrant from them, vpon proofe of the ſucceſſe it might finde at Rome, whither forthwith they ſent him for his diſpatch.

(31) Reginald taking Flaunders in his way, was both ſo [f] proud, [g] periurious, and [h] impudent, (the vertues of their moſt choyſeman) that he could neuer conceale the purpoſe of his journey, and boaſt of his dignity from any mans Eares, nor from their Eyes the Conuentuall letters ratifying the ſame. Whereof when the Couent had notice, vehemently incenſed againſt him who had thus diuulged their ſecret, and prouidently caſting how to euade the Kings offence, [i] out of hand they deſpeeded certaine of their Crue, to craue both [k] pardon of their fact, and licence for choyſe of ſome worthier Primate. There was then in high grace and imployment about the King, Iohn Gray Biſhop of Norwich, a [l] man of great wiſdome, learning, and Integrity, (qualities truely befitting that high place) whom the King (very ſenſible ſtill of the contrary qualities, & turbulent affronts which he endured in Hubert,) much deſired to aduance, commending him, as one [m] moſt deare vnto him, and of his ſecreteſt Counſels (of [n] which, ſome ſay, hee was Preſident) moſt behouefull for the Common-wealth, for Himſelfe, and them: which meſſage from the King faithfully deliuered, [o] all of them glad thus to redeeme the fauour which they had hazarded, with vnanimous conſent elected him; and ſending for him from Yorke (where he was in the Kings affaires) the [p] King himſelfe graced his entrance into Canterbury with his preſence in great pompe; and the next day, the King with a multitude of People aſſembling in the Metropolitane Church, the Prior did there publiſh his Election ſolemnly, and in due forme performed; where the Monkes carrying him with Te Deum to the high Altar, did forthwith enthronize him in the Chaire of his Primacie; The King there in preſence of them all, giuing him actuall poſſeſſion of his Temporalities. This louing correſpondence betwixt the King and his Clergy, gaue great hope of more bliſſeful fortunes hence-forward vnto them both; but the Infernall Author of debate, and his chiefe Agent, tooke a hint heereby to intrude a Tyranny both vpon Clergie, King and all.

(32) Little thought falſe Reyner what was doing at Canterbury, whiles hee was trotting to Rome; whither when hee came, and ſhewed his letters of Ratification to his Holineſſe and his Cardinalls, [q] hee receiued this ſhort anſwere, that it was a buſineſſe which asked mature deliberation and better informations; the Pope ſoone finding, that the Sub-prior was too ſleight an inſtrument for him to worke with, and for King Iohn to be wrought with, and therefore bethought him of ſome fitter hammer for ſo hard an Anuile. But ſundry ſtops were in the way, which wiſely and by degrees were to be remoued. The firſt was, (which Reginold in likehood had imparted to haſten his owne diſpatch) that the Biſhops of the Prouince claimed a ioynt intereſt with the Monkes, in choyſe of their Primate: a poynt which could no way ſuite with the Popes aduantage, becauſe Biſhops were generally much obliged to their Soueraignes, and ſo likely ſtil to Elect a Royaliſt, whereas Cloyſtermen, profeſſing ignorance of worldly affaires, and obedience to one Superiour, might more facilly be ſwayed to bend as the Pope would bow them, in preferring his creatures. Which was the Motiue (we may ſuppoſe) of the Popes [*] Letters, ſoone after ſent to the Suffragane Biſhops, exhorting them by [r] ſacred example, and precept of filiall obedience, to deſiſt from vexing, like vndutifull ſonnes, their Mother-Church with ſuch vndue claimes. The Biſhops notwithſtanding, who knew themſelues in ſacred writ to be ſtyled Fathers, would not thus acknowledge the Monkes for their Mothers, till Innocentius to his light Reaſons added the weight of his Keyes, and by his power ſwept both that and other rubs out of his intended way. For the King keeping his Chriſtmas at Oxford, (attended as it ſeemeth by his Biſhoppes) meaning not to pretermit any faire meanes to worke the Popes inclination towards the new Elect, he ſent for [t] twelue of the Monkes, whom with ſome other of his owne Clerkes, (which carried his letters to the Pope) hee put in truſt for tranſ-acting this buſineſſe at Rome; allotting them very bountifull expences out of his Exchequer for their whole iourney. They to leaue with the King, (who knew well the traines of Rome, and the ouer-reaching fetches of Innocentius,) a pledge of their duety, and aſſurance of his hopes, [v] entred with him [x] a couenant by oath, that no man, nor meanes ſhould remoue them from him, whom the King & themſelues had already appointed: The Biſhops ſent [y] the ſame time their Procurators alſo, to plead their right of Co-election; ſo as, foure obſtacles ſtood at once in the Popes way, (the two elections of the Monks, and the two claims of the King and Prelates, hee for his Royall aſſent, they for their ioynt conſent, in the choyſe) which all muſt be daſht and voyded before the Pope can haue his full forth.

But becauſe theſe will aske long time for contriuing, (which moued his Holineſſe to adiourne the hearing to the very [z] end of the yeare, wee will ſee the while how the King and State of England is imployed.

(33) The dorre, which deceaſed Hubert, did put vpon K. Iohn & his late deſigne, gaue both K. Philip aduauntage, to take ſurer footing in his new poſſeſſions, and King Iohn greater ſtomacke and edge to recouer his olde. mistake him not in steed of [b]Hubert de Burgo) being redeemed from the French, resolued heere to giue Philip another taste of his prowesse, and King Iohn of his fidelitie; had not others faithlesse feare defeated his braue resolution. For the besieged hauing [c] no rest night or day, from a long and incessant batterie, their Commaunders inuinceable constancy against yeelding, which enheartned the better sort, dismayed the baser, as more prizing their ease, then their faith or fame; some of which by night slipping ouer the walles, so instructed the enemy of all secret aduauntages to possesse the towne, that by a sodaine assault, both it and Lacy (more worth then it,) was againe surprized. Heere seemed to haue beene the Garland of Philips conquest; had not newes beene thither brought vnto him of some new risings in Britaine, where Guido, the husband of Constantia, Arthurs Mother, (sensible belike of the false-grounded wrongs offered to King Iohn, vnder pretence of Arthur,) [d] returned gladly both into Amity & a strong league with the English: and with him also Sauary Malleon, and Almerick Lusignian, [e] two Peeres of heroicke valour and great commaund, whom King Iohn of his * prisoners, had made by prudent and louely vsage his trusty friends. The French King turning to see his vnjust intrusions thus prejudiced, (especially by Arthurs owne father in law) was hastning from Chinon into Britaine, to worke reuenge on them, whose exemplar equitie should haue beene his mirrour of amendment; Englands King on the other side, was no [f] lesse heartned with this new confederation, [g] leuying once again a puissant Army, which he * landed at Rochel, being the onely noted place, which in all these turmoiles and mutabilities of Fortunes, kept her selfe entire from entrance either of enemy, or of disloyall thought.

(34) The King hauing his Army much augmented [h] with great concourses of his best-affected Prouincials, marching confidently forward, subdued a great portion of that Country; till comming to Mount-Auban, a [i] Castle of much renowne, (as being reputed [k] inexpugnable, and now the Rende-uou of his most potent enemies, and all their flower of Chiualrie, he gaue a terrible assault thereto, for 15. dayes together; where at last his [l] Englishmens valour was so aduenturous in scaling the walls, and both giuing and taking blowes vnportable, that in those few dayes he entred Conquerour into that very place, [m] which Charles the Great, could not get with his seauen yeares siege. The [n] multitude of Nobles therein taken was so great, that he sent into England a bed-roll of their names, for a memoriall of so great a victory. Which auspicious beginnings, he seconded with no lesse expedition, prouidence, and prowesse, in the siege of Angiers, where on his first approach, hee [o] gaue present instructions to his maine Army, suddenly to enuiron the whole Citie, and by assault to seeke entrance at the walles on euery side, whiles himselfe and his selected band, with fire and Engines would assaile the Gates; where with great celerity, and no lesse hazard then hardnesse, breaking through, hee became Lord of his owne. But whatsoeuer were the Citizens demerites, pittious it was, that their offences, and the Conquerours wrath, lay so heauy on those stately walles, as [p] to throw them flat to the ground; which hasty doome, (it being the [q] cradle of his birth, and city of his chiefe delight,) he as hastily (and very deerely too) repented, when with excessiue expences hee encircled it againe with a beautie farre beyond the former. These faire successes, humbling all the Country before him, cleared his passage into Picardy, whither king Philip was now conuerting all his power, to oppose himselfe against the violence of this Torrent: which [r] now more facilly hee might stoppe, hauing in his way, by laying secret ambushments*, laid hands vpon Duke Guydo, Sauary, and Almericke, King Iohns principal hopes, as they were busily aduauncing his present affaires: by which surprize, though the English forces missing their Prouincial aids, were greatly impaired, yet their * great hearts were not much amated, as the French-men [s] found, when both the Armies neere approaching ouer night, the next morning alacriously they addressed to the fight, and with great spirits on each side expected the Signall. Notwithstanding, the day likely to proue dreadfull with expence of bloud, vpon earnest interceeding of [t] forraine Prelates, and religious persons, who vndertooke equally to compose all things; both Kings condescended to a two-yeares * Truce, King Iohn chiefly out of affection to his Captiue friends, whose liberty was formost in the conditions.

(35) Hauing thus setled those Countries in farre better termes then last hee found them, hee embarked for England; where hee laid not aside a carefull (though distastfull) prouidence, for still bettering those his successes: for which ends, whiles from his Subjects (both Lay and Clergy) he [v] gathered money, the Sinewes of war, he lost their affections, the ioynts of Peace; whereof Geffry Archbishop of Yorke (his Naturall and vnnaturall brother) was a principall incentiue; who [x] solemnly cursing all the Kings Receiuers within his Prouince, fled secretly out of the land. Which peruicacie, *a bitter enemie of K. Iohn, yet bitterly taxeth, saying, [y] the English Bishops were farre from that dutifull obseruance towards their Soueraigne, which the French Bishops performed to theirs, at whose commaund they maintained Souldiers in his warres against King Iohn, acknowledging they were so bound to doe, as often as the King pursued the warres in person; though now also they did it, where he was not in person. And indeed how hollow-hearted to the State, those money-murmurers were, their * owne friend bewrayeth, shewing, how with curses they wished, and prayed to GOD, that these exactions might neuer haue any good successe, though they knew it was purposely for preseruing a maine part of the Kingdome. A disloyalty the more vnvnsufferable by the King, knowing that but a [z] very little before, the Popes Legate, Io. Florentinus*, nick-named Ferentinus*, for bearing away so much money,) had [a] gathered of the Clergy a huge masse of money, which in full chests hee conuayed to Rome. Yet all these domestick grudges abated not the Kings due care, nor yet his good hopes, which were soone-after much augmented by the encouragements of Othoes Imperiall presence, [b] who in person arriuing here in England, to project for his owne and his Vncles warres, was with great joyes met by the King, and conducted through London by night, where all the City was seene in her glory, and all the streetes adorned with richest hangings, beautified all along with the lustre of pendant Crownes, and burning Lampes: who after some dayes of royall entertainements hence departed, not vnfurnished with helpes to defray his warres.

(36) Whiles King Iohn is thus busied about his open Hostilities, Pope Innocentius is plotting his secret Stratagems against him at Rome: where, like vnto that * other old Roman, who being chosen vmpere touching some march-lands betwixt two neighbour-Nations, vnpartiall to either, [c] adjudged it from them both to the Romane State; so hee now, being Arbiter betwixt the King, Bishops, and Monkes, concerning their choyse, hee meanes to defeat them all, and * adjudge the right of disposing thereof to his Romish See. Therfore, at the * fore-limited day of hearing, his first care was, that the [d] Bishops lippes for euer should be sealed vp, (notwithstanding their [e] allegations of Law, Reason, Decrees, and Practise,) from intermedling in choyse of their owne Primate. Will you heare the maine reason? becauſe himselfe, and some other Popes would haue it so. Which definitiue sentence, being [f] sent to the Prelates into England, it was thought a point of prudence also, to [g] prepare the King, and worke him pliable before-hand, to entertaine that which was to follow: which must be done by amiable (37) The Monkes freed from the Biſhops impugning, were hote now in the ſtrife amongſt themſelues; the g one ſide againſt Reyners election vrged, it wanted Royall aſſent, the greater and ſounder part of Electors, due ſolemnities, due * time: the other, againſt Norwich, that no ſecond election could be validous, vnleſſe the former were firſt annulled. Both their Reaſons pleaſed well the Pope; who, (as pre-poſſeſſed Iudges often vſe) made ſhew of h great diligence in pondering the Pleadings, whereas himſelfe long before had reſolued on his Sentence; which was, that by Apoſtolicall definitiue doome, neyther of the Elects ſhould euer be capable of that See. So great rubbes hath the Pope with ſo little breath blowne out of his way. The man whoſe aduauncement all this while hee had aymed at, was now commended to them, who muſt be there preſently choſen for their Primate, Stephen de Langton, a Cardinall, Engliſh by birth, i French by education and affection, one of ſo k tranſcendent power in the Romaine Court, that the Pope was thought not for loue, but for enuy, (as being himſelfe eclypſed by his neereneſſe) to haue wiſhed his ſeruice in ſome remoter dignity. But the Monkes ill-apaide with what was done already, and very tremulous to enter matter of new intrications, alledged againſt all further courſes, that l no Canonicall Election could be there made, they hauing conſent neither of King nor Couent; at which word the Pope ſnapping them vp, bad them know, that * he had there plenitude of power ouer the Church of Canterbury; and beſides, that no conſent of Princes vſed to be expected in Elections celebrated where the Pope was: he therefore charged them vnder paine of his high curſe, (a terrible bug-bear in thoſe daies) there preſently to chooſe him for their Primate, whom himſelfe thought good to nominate vnto them. Thus trembling vnder the cracke of his Thunder-bolt, they (all m excepting one Helias de Brantfield (whoſe conſtancy ſhall here perpetuate his memory,) durſt not for feare but elect him, though very vnwillingly, and with murmurations: whoſe * Conſecration followed by the Popes owne hands at Viturbium, and his earneſt recommendation by the Popes n flattering Letters, to the Kings fauourable acceptance. And this was the vnbleſſed beginning of thoſe new miſeries which brought the King to his ending, and his Kingdome to vn-reportable calamities; all which, little did his Holineſſe or his Charity reckon of, ſo his deſperate Policie might take effect. Yet not vnduely fell thoſe judgements on many Princes of thoſe times, who neglecting the domeſticke execution of Supreme juſtice, ſuffered their Subjects, at ſo high a rate both of expence and trauels, to buy ſuch arbitrary and dangerous formes of a forraine, and falſly-named Iuſtice.

(38) Two very preſumptuous Lawes hath o one obſerued to haue beene firſt hatched by this lawleſſe Pope, the one occaſioned by King Iohns and Philips former ſtrife, that Princes delinquent muſt be lyable to correction from the Pope; the other, vpon the choyce of the Emperour, that where in elections voyces are equall, or concord wanting, the Pope may gratifie whom hee pleaſe: vnto which wee now may adde a third no leſſe arduous and inſolent, that the Pope may ſtrike vp Elections, both where, and of whom, and with, and without what conſent him liſteth. Which lewd obtruſion, that it galled the King to the quicke, we need not maruaile, if we ballance in one ſcale, the Popes meere will and pleaſure; in the other, the diſhonour to the King, (thus to be triced out of that, which ſo vehemently, and with his owne preſence he tooke care to ſee effected;) the prejudice to his Crowne, to be defeated of Soueraigne aſſent; the hazard to the State, to haue his * Enemy (a Phillippine, and French fauourite) the * chiefe man ouer his Engliſh: beſides wrongs more particular; as both the diſgrace to his beſt-deſeruing Counſellor, and the diſloyalty of the Monkes, firſt, to chooſe without his licence, then to mocke him with a ſecond choyce, next, to beguile him with oaths, after, to trauaile vpon his exceſſiue charge, and laſtly to doe, and vndoe all, with their perjurie. With all which ſo farre the Kings patience ſurfetted, that he began on them to diſ-gorge his wrath, who with him began theſe affronts; proſcribing firſt all thoſe Monkes as p Traytors, and afterward writing his "q Letters to the Pope, with relation of thoſe great "wrongs to Himſelfe, and exceptions to Langton; "vowing immutably to ſtand for his owne Elect, and "to die in defence of the Liberties of his Crowne; "putting the Pope in minde, that Rome reapt more "gaine from England, then from all the Tranſ-alpine "Regions; threatning alſo, if he were now croſſed in "this, he would ſtoppe all from croſſing the Seas to "Rome, nor would any longer emendicate their for-"raine Iuſtice, ſith his owne Kingdomes, ſo aboun-"ded with Biſhops and learned men of moſt accom-"pliſhed perfection in all profeſſions.

Nay, the effects bewray it: when in his ſublimed t Reply, hee ſnebs the King for comminatory "obraydings, and contumacious male-partneſſe; and "threatens him, that if he do not, by referring him-"ſelfe wholly to his good pleaſure, ſeeke to deſerue his "Grace, hee ſhould plunge into thoſe difficulties, "whence hee ſhould hardly euer get forth; intima-"ting, that himſelfe (being vnworthy Vice-gerent to "him, vnto whom euery knee in Heauen, Earth, and "Hell muſt bow,) muſt in the end needes haue the "vpper-hand; and that to reſiſt him is to oppugne "God himſelfe and his Church, for which glorious "Becket ſpilt his bloud. Theſe were indeede bloudy words; to affright the King with expectance of more ſuch blowes, and bloudy ſtripes from Rome, as had lighted on his Father. And he threatned no no more then hee acted; for thereupon, hee v ſent his doubled Apoſtolicall commaund, the one generall to all the Prelates, for ſubmitting and adhering reſolutely to Langton, the other, to ſome * particular Biſhops, for x conuenting the King, and Interdicting his whole Kingdome, if him they found ſtill contumaciouſly rebelling. (40) But this High-Priest had forgotten what another * taught him, and [z] hee himselfe sometimes thought, about interdicting France for their Kings offence; that better it was one should suffer then a whole Nation perish: whereas now, for the Kings only crossing the Popes good pleasure, God is censured to loose his worshippe, and all the People to hazard their soules, [a] liuing almost like Infidels, without Gods seruice and blessed Sacrament, yea and dying * like dogges tumbled into euery ditch. But what? did such wofull effects fasten onely on the Laity? The Clergy bare their part too; whom the flames of the Kings justly incensed wrath did so scorch, that his Dominions were too hote for their abode: for, their [b] persons hee proscribed and sent packing to the Pope, their reuenewes hee confiscated, their Bishoprickes, Abbeyes, and Priories, he deputed to Laymens custody: their women (for such as had not wiues, had Lemmans) were dearely ransomed: and euery where they suffered wrongs without ordinary protection of Iustice. Whereof, though our * vulgar perfunctory Writers produce no other reason, but the onely ouer-flowing of the Kings gall, as if first stirred by some few delinquent Bishoppes, through furious reuenge it ouer-whelmed the whole Clergie; yet indeede these were but the due chastisements of their generally-disloyall hearts. As (to instance) when the King sent his [c] mandate to S. Albans, that not regarding the Popes command in the Inderdict, they should continue the celebration of Gods seruice; the Abbot calling his Monkes into the Chapter-house, perswaded them to obey God rather then Man, (meaning the Pope rather then the King) and to beare resolutely the kings anger, * whom God in due time would bring to an end. What maruaile then, if the Clergy carried so generally with this streame of a forraine vsurped power, against Gods seruice, & their Soueraignes godly desire, and due authority, were likewise generally inuolued in that reward of their disloyalty. And yet, euen in the Clergy, many of eminency detested these cruell and irreligious courses of the Pope; [d] Philip the Bishop of Dureme, and his Successour, with the Bishops of Norwich and Winchester, heartned the King to contemne the Papall curse; the [e] Cistertian Abbots (neglecting the Interdict) continued their diuine celebrations, till the Pope suspended them for their contempt; Alexander * Abbot of the Benedictines, a Diuine of * exquisite learning, [f] published in his Sermons, that their present calamities were no reproach to their Soueraignes proceedings, but due rewards of the Subjects hainous trespasses, because Kings ought to gouerne, yea and strongly bridle all disobedient Subjects whomsoeuer; but as for Popes they ought not to intermeddle in the ciuill affaires, and regiment of any Princes ouer their vassals, seeing Peter himselfe receyued no power, but onely in matters appertayning to the Church. And though the * Pope were reuenged on him for his plaine truth, and some Monkish humours haue asperséd other such men with bitter reproaches, yet what may be thought both of these the Popes courses, and of such his opposers, a late Iesuite, no partiall man to Princes) sheweth, saying, [g] that many, and godly wise men at that time did wish, that Pope Innocentius had not stood so hard with King Iohn in such a poynt as this was, for contenting him with a person gratefull vnto him in that See. And no maruaile they so wished, seeing that was the graund cause of such infinite confusions, factions, and wrongs, hurrying so indignely the Prince, Peeres, Clergy, & Commons; the very contemplation whereof to all godly wise men must needes be gastly and rufull: yet wel-fare those Anathematizing Bishops, the Instruments of all these euils, who patiently endured vnder the name of exile, [h] to liue the while abroad in all variety of delights.

(41) Such perplexities in the People could not but breed as great hatred and hazards to the King; who therefore to preuent the issue of such discontents, (which though causelesse, yet kindling in the multitude proue often vnquenchable,) hee [i] required of his Nobles new Oathes of allegiance, pledges of such as hee most suspected, and homage of all Freeholders, [k] euen of twelue yeers old, whom he dismissed with a kisse of peace. Misdoubting also the Popes further intent to absolue his subjects from their due allegiance, he gathered about him (by * example of his Father Henry on the like ground) a mightie Armie for all occurrents. The terrour whereof hee first displayed in the North, offended (saith [l] one) with * William King of Scotland, for marrying his daughter to the Earle of Bulloigne; for receiuing (saith [m] another) fugitiues, and enemies of his State: for throwing downe (saith a [n] third) a castle built by King Iohn against Barwicke: but whatsoeuer were the breach, the cloze was amiable, each accompanying other to Yorke, where King Williams [o] two daughters were promised to King Iohns two sonnes, and [p] deliuered as pledges of vnited loue, with a [q] gift of nine thousand markes. The dread of this his power so glyded out of the North into the West, that vpon his returne, the [r] Princes of Wales, & others rich & poore came to him at Woodstocke (the like thing neuer heard of before) to doe him homage. But all these linkes of allegiance were soone crackt by another thunder-clap (from Rome) of Anathema on the king by Name, with strict injunction for all men to abandon his presence: [s] which sentence being sent to be diuulged by the Bishoppes and Prelates in England, all of them for feare or fauour of the King, were content to neglect the Popes commaund, and let the Apostolike processe escape without execution. The fame yet thereof was in all mens mouthes, but came first (as seemeth) to the Kings Eares, [t] by a seruant of his owne Exchequer, Geffry Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who secretly perswading his fellow-officers, that they were bound in conscience to relinquish the Kings seruice, gaue them example himselfe by leauing his dutie and charge; for which hot-braine tricke, hee was put in a * Coole of leade, the weight whereof, (as a punishment of his leuitie) soone hastned his end in prison: but the greater and wiser sort, both of [v] Nobles and others, continued their due attendance on their Soueraignes Court and person, without * regard of the censure.

(44) The Bankes of King Iohns eſtate, were not vnlike to thoſe in Grounds ill-neighboured with an encroaching Sea, where before one breach is well made vp, another no leſſe dangerous is laide open: which endles turmoiles kept his body ſtill in Action, his Minde in paſſions, and his Proweſſe in vre. The vaſte expenſes of his Iriſh expedition were no ſooner repayred, (by a * great taxe charged on all the Conuentuall houſes) but Lewylin Prince of North-Wales, with his great ſpoyles on the Engliſh Marches, made new matter of charge and exploit for the King; d hauing, to preuent due reuenge, cauſed his Wallians to conuey all their cattell and better ſubſtance to the ſcarce-acceſſible refuges of Snowdowne Hill. Theſe difficulties much more whetted and excited the Kings reſolution; neither had the vertuall power of the Popes fulmination as yet ſo blaſted his good fortunes, but that hence alſo hee e returned in great triumph, as Conqueror of all Wales, where, with wonderful celerity and valour, he f ſubdued all their Princes & Cheefes, whom he receiued vpon Oath, homage, and hoſtages, with an abſolute g graunt of all their Inland vnto the King for euer. Notwithſtanding, perceiuing that h very many ſlipt away for dread (at leaſt for colour) of the Popes curſe, from thoſe his martiall and other ciuill ſeruices, (though i hee puniſhed by fine all ſuch Reuolters,) whereby his perſon could neuer bee free from daunger, nor his State from trouble; hee reſolues (ſeeing the Pope vnflexible, and vnſenſible of ſo many Chriſtians calamitie,) at length to relent from his vowed ſtiffeneſſe againſt the Popes Elect, in hope ſo to ſettle his owne and his Subjects tranquility, though with vnſufferable indignity to himſelfe. In his k returne from Wales, two Nunces from the Pope, Randulph a Subdeacon, and Durand a Knight-Templar, meete him at Northampton to make the attonement · l whereto he was ſo propenſe, that hee accorded to aſſure vnder his Seale, that Archbiſhop Langton, with the Biſhops, Monkes, and others, ſhould be reſtored both to his fauour, and to their poſſeſſions; that, holy Church ſhould haue all the Franchiſes, as in Edward the Confeſſors time: that hee would neuer take any thing of holy Church againſt the owners will: but, becauſe hee m would not alſo make full ſatisfaction for all confiſcations, and other emoluments receiued of the Clergy, (nay, he could not, hauing expended all his treaſure in his continuall warres,) the Clergy and their Factors, (the Legates) more prizing their priuate gaine, then the weale publike of their Natiue Countrie, contemned the ſweete proffer of peace; and expoſed all to the bane of a reuengefull contention. For hereupon they did not onely n denounce the curſe vpon the King by Name, (which the Prelates before durſt not doe) and vpon all other who conuerſed with him; but, as if he had moſt o contumaciouſly contemned quietneſſe, by their relations they incenſed the Pope, (too procliue of himſelfe to ſet forth his owne greatneſſe,) to put on him a farre more indignous wrong and contumely then Interdiction, by p abſoluing all Kings and People, poore and rich, hauing dependance on him, from all Fealty and Subjection to him.

with an Army no leſſe faithfull then powerfull, and alſo with the loue of his Neighbour-Princes. King William of Scotland, [q] at this time infeſted with a dangerous rebellion, (ſtirred vp within his kingdome by one Gothred, [r] laying claime, vnder colour of ſome antiquated title, to his Crowne) being himſelfe infirme with age, ſent his ſonne Prince Alexander into England, to craue aſſiſtance of King Iohn, who (by his owne princely loue and readineſſe to demerite theirs,) reſoluing with his Army in perſon to chaſtice the diſturbers of his truſty Confederate, before his ſetting forth, did [ſ] on the table in a ſolemne feaſt, (which hee kept in the Hoſpitall of Clerken-well) adorne Prince Alexander with the Belt and Order of Knight-hood; and [t] afterward with his Hoaſt vanquiſhing the Rebels, aduaunced their Chiefe-leader farre higher then his owne Ambition expected, and left that Kingdome in a ſetled peace. But whiles he is thus kindly carefull in ſuppreſſion of anothers rebels, his owne at home are as vnkindly vigilant to vndermine his State; the Popes Abſolution, like magicke-ſpelles, hauing let looſe many tumultuating Spirits, which wil not eaſily be laid againe. For the * Chiefes among the Wallians, whom neither breach of their Oathes, nor loſſe of their noble hoſtages, (* which ſoone after periſhed for their parents ſinnes) could deterre, ſuddenly fell off from the King, and fell on his Subjects with [v] much ſlaughter of men, burning of Townes, and ſurprizall of Caſtles: whereof, whiles the King meaning to take ſharpe reuenge, was on his way at Nottingham with an vn-reſiſtable Armie, letters of great ſpeede and ſecrecie were deliuered to him, (as hee ſat at meate) from his faithfull and gratefull friend the Scotiſh King, and inſtantly others from his Daughter Ioan, Prince Lewylins, Lady, both giuing him intelligence of imminent Treaſons *plotted by ſundry of his Peeres, who meant eyther to murther him, or betray him to the butchery of his foes. Which dreadfull notices from ſo true-harted Informers, could not yet affright his manly heart, till comming to Cheſter, he there vnderſtood by ſundry other Intelligencers, that his Nobles held themſelues quite diſcharged from his Allegiance; and knowing that they wanting fidelity, he himſelfe could not but want ſecurity, hee diſmiſſed his Hoaſt, tooke hoſtages of his Barons, purſued the detected Conſpirators, and * the three principall of them flying the Land, he proſecuted their perſons, demoliſhed their Caſtles, and confiſcated their poſſeſſions. But many of as vile and virulent affections they left behinde them, as that * trayterous Act of thoſe Nobles bewrayed, who ſent to Philip of France their ſealed Charter, promiſing to ſettle on his head the Crowne of England, if hee would come to receiue it. And that the mindes of the vulgar ſhould not be vn-poſſeſſed with like expectation of Iohns vn-crowning, the propheſies of an * Heremiticall wizard (fore-telling, that on the day of the Aſcention, King Iohn ſhould be no King) were buzzed into their eares. Whether by Gods inſpiring, or the Diuels, theſe were reuealed, * ſome doe doubt; but hee that conſiders the quotidian impoſtures of theſe times, and the ſecret machinations of the Pope, the French King, and the Engliſh Barons, all for diuers ends, complotting againſt King Iohn, will eaſily perceiue both what vſe there was of ſuborning ſuch a Prophet, to deterre the popular meynie, from ſticking to the King, and to begule their credulity, as if the thing were to be done, by Gods fore-appointment, and ordinance, and alſo * that his puniſhment by death, as a trayterous Impoſtor, was no other then he deſerued.

(46) Neither is the Popes reuenge thus appeaſed, ſome higher greeces yet remaine, on which his Greatneſſe, and greatneſſe of his holy rage muſt diſplay it ſelfe: the vnder-props whereof, (a thing almoſt incredible) were not onely Engliſh-men, but Engliſh Biſhops alſo. For Stephen Langton with the BB. of London and Ely, (thirſting after reuenge, though with the deſtruction of their Country, and bloud-ſhed of innumerable their Compatriots) going to Rome with complaints on the King, [y] made humble ſupplications to the Lord Pope, that he would vouchſafe in a touch of pious compaſſion, to ſupport the Engliſh Church, being at the point of ruine. At whoſe earneſt ſollicitation, the tender-hearted Pope (grieuouſly lamenting the deſolation of the Kingdome of England,) decreed by ſolemne ſentence: That King Iohn ſhould be depoſed from his Kingdome, and that the Pope ſhould prouide ſome other, who ſhould be deemed worthier to ſucceede. To effectuate the former clauſe, Innocentius eagerly purſued the latter, ſending ſpeedy Letters to (whom but King Iohns moſt mortall enemy?) Philip King of France; [z] requiring him to vndertake the labour of the dethroning King Iohn, with no leſſe reward then pardon for all his ſinnes, and enjoying of the Engliſh Crowne to him, and his heires for euer. A goodly large patent both for a Spirituall and Temporall Kingdome, which, (more like Mars his Prieſt, then Chriſts Vicar) he meanes to ſeale, with a deluge of Chriſtians bloud. For not thus yet ſatiated, he tranſ-mits his Letters generall; [a] To all Potentates, Souldiers, men of warre of all Nations, to ſigne themſelues with the Croſſe, and to follow their Captaine, Philip, for the dejection of King Iohn, aſſuring all, that their aſſiſtance (whether in Perſon or Contribution) ſhall be no leſſe meritorious, then if they viſited our Sauiours Sepulchre. That this Pope vnder colour of ſuch Cruſadoes, did formerly cloake his owne Auarice, his [b] owne Monkes auerre; but here he cloakes therewith both his Pride, and a farre more ſauage vice, the thirſt, not of mens Gold, but of their Bloud. In which ſeruice with King Philip, he vſed the ſame Engliſh Prelates for his Negotiators, which were before his Solicitors thereunto; with whom alſo he ſent his Factour Randulph; [c] giuing him in priuate, ſecret inſtructions how to manage euery particular of the whole deſigne, to the moſt behoofe of the holy See.

(47) The French King likewiſe receiuing * from the Archbiſhop and his Aſſociates, (in a [d] Councel) the Apoſtolike ſentence; was very apprehenſiue of that imployment, whereto not ſo much the Papall commaund, as his [e] owne ancient malignity, and the Engliſh Barons trayterous requeſts, had prepared him; both which he was now [f] willing to maske with the ſpecious pretext of juſtice and deuotion. Vnder which colours he had * ſpeedily marſhalled an immenſe army at Roan, and drew a mighty Nauy richly furniſhed to the mouth of Seyn, * all his Dukes, Earles, Barons, Knights, and Souldiers being ſummoned to the exploit vnder paine of high Treaſon, and diſherizing, who therefore both in feare and hope of ſpoyle, came flocking without number.

(48) A preparation of ſo great importance, that all Chriſtendome tooke notice of, could not long be hidden from King Iohn; whoſe care, by reaſon of his now doubled oppoſition (forraine & domeſticke) could be no leſſe for his owne and his kingdomes ſafety, then was his Enemies for impugning both. Wherfore his Summons being * ſent to all his officers both for Sea and Land, for ſpeedy furniſhing both of a Nauy, and an Army, equiualent to encounter ſo powerfull an Inuaſion, ſuch [g] innumerable multitudes ſwarmed to Douer, and other harbours for landing, that the Chiefe-leaders for want of prouiſion, diſmiſſing the reſt, [h] encamped at Barham-Downes, onely with 60000. choyſe, valiant, and wel-appointed men, who, if they had carried all one mind, & true affection towards their king, & ſafegard of their Country, there breathed not any Prince vnder heauen, whoſe aſſault England had not beene able to repell. And being no worſe appointed for a Sea-fight, his intent was to grapple firſt with the French fleet, * making no doubt of ſinking them all: ſo ſecure and confident was hee in expectation of all Inuaders. In which braue addreſſe, whiles both ſhores of the Sea are thus be-laide with both thoſe Kings puiſſant armies, the one waiting for the

the Enemy, the other for faire winds, and more forces, behold Pandulphus (the Popes Pragmaticke) hauing firſt deſired ſafe conduct of King Iohn, arriues at Douer, to put in execution thoſe [i] ſecret Inſtructions which his Lord, (who made his aduauntage of the Foxe-ſkin, as well as of the Lyons) [*] had expreſly preſcribed. He there vnfolds to the King, the innumera- "ble multitude both of King Philips ſhips, and of his "ſouldiers Horſe and Foote, (all in readineſſe to paſſe, "and yet more expected to follow) to bereaue him of "his kingdome by Apoſtolicall authority, and to en-"joy it himſelfe with his heires for euer. That with "him were alſo comming all the Engliſh Exiles, both "Clergy and Lay, they, by his forces to re-poſſeſſe "their eſtates, (maugre the King) and he from them "to receiue Allegiance, as from his ſworne Subjects. "That hee had the fealty of almoſt all the Engliſh "Peeres obliged to him by their owne Charters; "which made him diſtruſtleſſe of attaining eaſily his "wiſhed ſucceſſe: which calamities (the more vnſuf-"ferable, becauſe impoſed by his inſulting enemy, and "his owne ſubjects) he might yet euade and retaine "his Crowne, which by ſentence he had already loſt, "if penitently he would ſubmit himſelfe to the Chur-"ches judgement. Doubtleſſe the ſtraites whereinto the King ſaw himſelfe plunged, were very dreadfull; ſo many deadly enemies abroad to aſſault him, ſo few truſty friends at hom to guard him: which droue him into this ſad cogitation, [k] that theſe his perfidious Peeres would now with their followers abandon him in the field, or betray him ouer to the Sword of his Enemies. Yet not vnlikely other motiues alſo might forcibly perſwade him to relent: the remembrance of the Emperour Otho, whom this very Pope (not without foule blot of [l] Injuſtice and [m] Leuity) had both eagerly aduanced, & furiouſly diſ-empyred; the boundleſſe furies of the Cruſado promulged againſt him, wherewith this Pope [n] vſed to ouer-flow, as with a mercileſſe Ocean, all ſuch Princes as withſtood his will, which once broken-in would neuer end, but with the end and ruine of all. Thus thinking it better to yeelde to the time, with aſſurance both [o] of his Crowne, and of the [p] Popes fauour, then deſperately to hazard Life, Crowne and all, to his mortall foes; hee redeemes his ſafety on ſuch conditions, as Neceſsity, and the Pope (both which haue no law) liſted to impoſe; and ſo preſently ſwore to ſubmit in all things [*] to the judgement of the Church. By vertue of which farre-ſtretching Oath, Pandulphus afterwards exacteth his ſubſcription to a [*] Forme of Peace preſcribed by the Pope, wherein King Iohn, though [q] with an vnwilling, yea a bleeding hart, and weeping eies, yet will he, nill he, muſt acknowledge [r] that touching all things for which he was excommunicated, he had abſolutely ſworne [*] to ſtand to whatſoeuer the Pope ſhould commaund. Secondly, that the Archbiſhop, Biſhops and Monkes, with all the reſt of that liſt, ſhould (with ſatisfaction alſo for all dammages) be reſtored both to their poſſeſſions and the Kings fauour, ſo that they alſo would ſweare not to attempt any thing againſt the Kings Perſon and Crowne. Wherein we ſee that King Iohn in ſwearing to obey the judgement of the Church, was concluded to haue ſworne performance of whatſoeuer the Pope commanded; and how great matters the Pope can command, King Iohn, with much more [*] bleeding amaritude of ſpirit, ſhall quickly ſee and feele. For two daies after, (being the period of the Hermits propheſie) the King at the houſe of the Knights Templars, in Douer, [t] by the Popes commaund in his [u] pre-ordination at Rome, taking off his Crowne from his head, ſurrendred it into the Popes hands by his Atturney Pandulphus, (at whoſe feete he [v] alſo laide his Scepter, Robe, Sword, and Ring, the Royall Enſignes;) ſubſcribed alſo to another [x] Charter, whereby hee reſigned his Kingdomes to the Pope, profeſſing he did it [*] neither for feare, nor force, but of his owne free will, and in the Common Councell of his Barons, as hauing no other way to make ſatisfaction to God and the Church for his offence, and that thence-forward he would hold his Crowne as Feodary to the Pope, paying a penſion annuall of 1000. markes for both the Kingdomes of England and Ireland: whereupon doing homage and ſwearing fealty to the Pope, he did withall deliuer ſome money, (as the earneſt of his ſubjection) vnto Pandulph, [y] who throwing it to the ground, did thereon trample with his feete, to manifeſt his Maſters greatneſſe. That theſe things were done in preſence of ſome Peeres, who gaue no conſent thereto, appeares by Henry Archbiſhop of Dublin, (the very principall man in that Aſſembly) who [z] both inwardly grieued thereat, and openly diſclaymed and gaine-ſayed it.

(49) The Pope formerly pretended hee ſought [a] nothing more then Iohns repentance, and [b] grieued at nothing ſo much as Englands deſolation: but theſe his circumuentions bewray he ſought ſomewhat elſe, which bred both repentance and deſolation to King Iohn and his Succeſſors long after. Which fact cannot be liuelier paralelled, then by another dolefull accident of the former yeare, [c] when a dreadfull fire in Southwarke, conſuming the Church and buildings neere London-Bridge, ſuddenly (whiles numberleſſe people flockt on the Bridge, either to bring ſuccour or ſeeke ſafetie) the fire by a winde ſeized alſo on the hither-end of the Bridge; wherewith [*] multitudes thus encompaſſed on both ſides, miſerably periſhed; where at length ſome bringing their Barges to ſaue the reſt, their crowde was ſo great, that the veſſels ſinking, more periſhed in the Water, then by Fire. King Iohn, like thoſe, was in the middeſt of two ineuitable flames, on this ſide, his faithleſſe Nobles, on that, his mercileſſe foes; when the Pope thus proffering him S[t]. Peters Boat, for a ſafegard from both, drencht him into as great miſery, certainly greater Ignominy then both the other. Wherein yet the Pope doth not want his ſhare and ſhame; amongſt his owne fauourites, ſome accurſing that his preſcribed Charter, as [d] lamentable and deteſtable; [e] ſome, denying it was of the Popes procuring, but that King Iohn had long before made a vow of deuotion, that if God ſetled him in thoſe Kingdomes hee would dedicate them both, and make them tributary to the See Apoſtolicke. But ſome other, (great pillars of the Papacy) ſtepping further, [f] auow it to be vtterly vntrue, that King Iohn did make his Realmes thus tributary to the Pope; or [g] that euer ſuch penſions were paide to Rome; or [h] if hee ſo did, or any other Engliſh King ſhould ſo doe, ſuch an Act to be of no validitie at all; or if it were of any force, [i] it ought onely to lie on King Iohn, who ſo offended, and not on any his Succeſſors. Doubtleſſe, if the Papal Sword had power to cut off King Iohns regality for any offence, his Crowne was to haue deſcended to the next Heire, (whether Henry his ſonne, or Eleanor Arthurs ſiſter, then aliue) who, as they were not guilty of the fault, ſo neither conſenting to the reſignement. Some therefore haue imagined, that [k] ſuch Inſtruments might happily then be motioned and drawne, and yet dye vnratified, though the copies ſtand recorded; but whatſoeuer were then done, that the Pope himſelfe (not onely thoſe his friends) were thereof aſhamed will hereafter appeare.

(50) Whiles Pandulphus is thus chaffering about the Crowne for his Maſter the Pope, Philip is fitting his head to weare it, and was now ſetting forth his Nauy to winne it, for himſelfe; which made the Legate (hauing after [l] fiue dayes ſeyſin re-deliuered the Crowne, but [m] not yet releaſed the Cenſures, till conditions were performed) to haſten into France, carrying with him eight thouſand pound, as part of reſtitution to the exiled Biſhops; where, comming to King Philip, he aduiſed him to diſmiſſe his hoaſt, and enterprize againſt King Iohn, as being now an obedient and reconciled Son to the Church. But Philip who was of the Popes minde, not caring for Iohns repentance, but for his Kingdome, which now hee left before he had gotten it, [n] fretting exceedingly to ſee himſelfe not onely ſet vp for a ſtale, and made to the World an obiect of scoffe, by the Nunces guilefull colluſions, but alſo by the ° Popes own inticements, plunged into ſo exceſſiue a dammage, (hauing ſpent, beſide his great trauaile in this preparation, 60000. Crownes, wherewith he purchaſed nought but ſcoffes; reſolued and profeſſed, that ſith the Pope himſelfe, had ſo farre thruſt him on, his Legates ſuggeſtions (P no nor his threats of excommunication,) ſhould not draw him backe from his intendment. In which reſolution q calling his Peeres and Nobles into a conſultation at Sueſſouns, all the reſt approuing the courſe, Ferdinand Earle of Flaunders (part of whoſe Country Philip by force detained) told him tartly, that r as the attempt was both vniuſt & impoſsible, ſo s it was fitter, euery mans right ſhould at home be reſtored, and iuſtice imbraced, before they attempted to teach duties of piety to others abroad. And, that he t ought rather to thinke of making reſtitution to King Iohn of thoſe tranſmarine Countries, which he with-held vniuſtly, then of inuading his Realme, whereto he had no right at all. With which vnexpected reclamation, v the chiefe Peeres began to wauer, & Philip enraged, bidding him defiance, forbad him his Court. The like rough vſage (not long before) found x Reginald the moſt valorous Earle of Bulloigne (though his daughter was married to Philips younger ſon,) whom the French King perceiuing to wiſh well to King Iohn, y droue him vniuſtly out of his Earledome; but King Iohn, receiuing him with honourable compenſation of z faire reuenewes in England, held both with him and Earle Ferdinand, a ſure (though ſecret) confederacy. So that now Philips rage, and feare to hazard his owne Crowne, if ſeeking anothers, hee ſhould leaue ſo neere an Enemy at his backe, diuerts the courſe of his Ambition into the ſtreame of his Reuenge, and reſoluing firſt to ſubdue the Earle, (after which ſucceſſe hee might more ſafely paſſe into England,) he commands his mighty prepared Nauy to ſet forth from the mouth of Seyne towards Flaunders, where himſelfe with his forces (meaning to ſubdue the countrey in their way) would meet them by land. Whereof King Iohn hauing ſpeedy intelligence from the Earle (who, knowing his meanes too ſlender to beare off the Kings ſo long prepared power, deſired his preſent aide) without delay diſpatched his * Fleet, to purſue them who intended to purſue him; vnder the conduct of a three braue Generals, his brother William Earle of Sarisbury, William Duke of Holland, and Reginald Earle of Bulloigne; b who with happy gales ſurprizing the French Nauy at the port of Damme, (whiles moſt of the French Souldiers were on land, diſpoiling the Earles Country,) ſeized on them all; c three hundred of which Ships, laden with prouiſion, Armes, and other coſtly fraught (for whatſoeuer the King & all his Nobles held deareſt was therein,) they ſent for England (whither at firſt they were bound) and aboue one hundreth other they burnt, or ſunke, for France.

(51) This Nauall victorie produced effects in the two Kings ſo oppoſite as were their affections; the d one with anguiſh of his irreparable loſſe and ignominy, haſting back into France, to preuent further danger; and e the other (ioyfull of his owne ſucceſſe and his confederates) diſmiſſing his power, as ſecure of any French attempts in haſte. Wherefore now, with full purpoſe to finde him worke at home, who ſo buſily ſought it abroad, hee forthwith ſent (with large rewards to his Flaunders Army) f inſtructions alſo to the Earles, how to infeſt Philip on that ſide of France, whiles himſelf entring Poictou, would do the like on the contrary ſide, & Otho the Emperor on a third part. A dangerous plot and league, if the iſſue had beene anſwerable to the deſignes. For proſecution whereof, g King Iohn attending at Portſmouth with a noble Army, in hope now that all true Engliſh, would gladly embrace ſo faire an opportunity, to recouer their hereditary Prouinces from the falſe French; his Barons reſtleſſe themſelues in procuring his vnreſt, and enuying that his forraine vexations being thus paſſed, hee ſhould want domeſticke, flatly oppoſe themſelues both to his commaund and their Countries good, h denying him (vntil he were aſſoyled of his excommunication,) their attendance in ſo behouefull a ſeruice. Thoſe men in the heate of his former troubles with the Pope, thinking ſuch troubled waters moſt aduantageous for their fiſhing, i re-commenced their contention with the King for their long-deſired Liberties, wherin becauſe they found him ſtill as immooueable as themſelues were immoderate, it ſeemeth, though the cloake of their now refuſall were Religion, yet their ſpurre was Reuenge, hauing withall an eye to the good of the King of France, whom ſo well they had before loued, as to wiſh him King of England. But King Iohn, being no leſſe earneſt to further the preſent generall cauſe, then they their particular ends, delayed not their deſires; and k deſpeeding his Charters and ſafe-conducts to the Archbiſhop and his fellow-Exiles, hee as ſpeedily * arriued: l at whoſe preſence the earth is ſaid to haue trembled; but (doubtleſſe) King Iohn did; who hearing of his comming towards him (then at Wincheſter) went to meet him and thoſe other Biſhops; at whoſe ſight m he fell down at their feet, with flouds of teares intreating them to commiſerate His, and his Kingdomes, miſeries. Vpon which n great humility in a King (mouing them likewiſe to bedew their eyes,) they lifted him from the ground, and leading him by each Arme to the doore of the Cathedrall Church (where, at rehearſall of the 50. Pſalme, all his Nobles and others wept for ioy,) after in the Chapter-houſe they did abſolue him; but with ſuch guilefull Appendices of Oathes impoſed on him, that this aſſoilement was not ſo much the Epilogue of his olde, as the Prologue of his new Tragicall vexations.

(52) For the Prelates, whoſe beſt abettors the diſloyall Barons had formerly beene, meaning now to bee the like to them, amongſt other Oathes then taken of the king (to ° defend holy Church & Churchmen; to make due reſtitutions to the Clergy; to beare fealty to the See of Rome,) cunningly alſo inſerted this, P to eſtabliſh the good Lawes of his Predeceſſors, & to aboliſh all bad, proceeding with all his Subiects according to the iuſt iudgements of his Courts: out of which generalities, what good ſtuffe the Prelates and Barons can picke, ſequels will ſhew. Now all exceptions ſeeming to bee taken away, which might hinder the Kings deſigne for Fraunce, hee once againe at Portſmouth haſtens to embarke his hoaſt; where, at the point of paſſage new impediments are pretended, q that the people hauing ſpent their money with long attendance, could not be fitted for the ſeruice; except the King would doe it out of his Treaſure; which moued the King in anger, with a ſmall traine of his owne attendants, to ſet forth to Sea, and his Barons (Philips true friends) to depart home, leauing the king (who at Gerſey expected their comming) deſtitute of their ſeruice. With theſe ſo often trecherous deluſions, what maruaile, or blame, if a King, and in ſo important an Action, thus defeated, were enflamed to take due reuenge? On which purpoſe the King thus r enforced to returne, reſoluing to chaſtiſe thoſe rebellious ſpirits (the cauſes thereof) and to reclaime them to due obedience by force of Armes, the Archbiſhop (reſolute to be as tough a Bridle to the Regall power, as euer Hubert his predeceſſor was;) came vnto him, to diuert him with Argument, that it was a breach of his Oath, for him to take Armes againſt any man whatſoeuer, without the iudgement of his Court. But the s next day, ſeeing hee could not thus preuaile with reaſons (the King forbidding him to intermeddle in matters of lay-judgements, & t ſwearing that he would not forbeare for one * Clerkes pleaſure to tame his owne vaſſals) he followed the King (who was on his way earneſtly following his intendment) deterring him with threates, and vowing, v if out of hand he did not deſiſt from his purpoſe, hee would excommunicate all, (except the King himſelfe) who durſt take

So quickly did this Prelate on his comming into England, shew himselfe not onely a faithfull Philippine, (as the King fore-saw,) and a faithlesse Baronist (as these his darings proue) but euen another Pope, to threaten and persecute the King, sith Innocentius had left to doe it.

The Archbishops conspiring against the King.

(53) But these threates of sacred Censure, though they dash the whole course of Regall gouernment, may seeme the more excusable, hee hauing some colour (though but a colour) thereof by reason of his vocation and place: the courses which soone after he pursued, will not admit the like plea or pardon with the King. This English Pope, hauing in a [x] promiscuous Synode of Clergy men and Barons, granted by Indulgence, that in this time of Interdict, both Conuentuals and Seculars, might in their Churches celebrate diuine seruice, so it were with a very low voyce; singled out the Barons into a[y] very priuate conference (more cordiall perhaps to them then seruing of God,) relating with much ostentation, what an Oath at his assoiling the King, he [*] compelled him to take, for restoring good lawes, and antiquating bad; to which end, a Charter of King Henry the first being lately found (which there he shewed and caused to be read) by it, they might, if themselues would, reduce to the pristine estate, those Liberties which long they had lost. Both Charter and Counsell being receiued with [*] great applause and ioy, a [z] Confederacy was stricken betwixt them, they all swearing to him to striue for those liberties to the spending of their liues, & he promising them his most faithfull and vttermost assistance. Amongst so many false to the State, probable it is, that some were false among themselues, by whom these secrecies might come to the kings eares; who finding himselfe by both Clergy and Lay-Peeres combining against him, vnable to reuenge his forraine, or represse such domesticke indignities, knew no surer way to ouer-top them all, then by that high Hand, by which himselfe was first subiected to them all. How this must be fetcht about, because it concernes his Holinesse, a learned Monke shall relate in his owne Language. [a] The King knew and had learned by manifold experience, that as the Pope, both for Ambition, and Pride, went beyond all other mortall men: So likewise, he was in his greedy desire of riches so vnsatiable, that with money, either paid or promised, he might be wrought like waxe, and made plyable to all wicked actions. Thus hauing the true length of the Popes foot, hee fits him accordingly with rich presents, and golden promises, crauing (by such mouing Rhetoricke) not his aide onely, but his Curse also against the Archbishop and Barons, who so vncessantly distressed him. But Innocentius (forward of himselfe without any Motiues, to put in vre those his Papall vertues, and the execution of his late vsurped power,) vpon the first gladsome newes of Englands Vassallage to his See, had presently dispatched for England an Agent of greater port then Randulph a Subdeacon, Nicholas Bishop of Tusculum, with no meaner credence and instructions for preseruing what the Pope had guilefully gotten, then Randulph had to purchase what hee ambitiously gaped for: by whose [b] arriuall the King seemed to bee possessed of those his desires, before his golden letters arriued at Rome to craue them.

The Popes Legate commeth into England.

(54) For this Legate was infected with the like itches ([c] Ambition and Auarice) as his Master, and therefore King Iohn knew how to demerite his fastnesse and loue, by suppling him with like [d] oyntments; whereby the Archbishop and Barons soone perceiued, that the Legate was [e] wholly Regall, and the King Papall; which iealousie made both their Actions more distastfull. The Ouert and professed end of his comming, being to release the Interdict, hee first tampered a little to accord the King and Prelates vpon couenants of Restitution; towards which, though the king offered ten thousand markes, yet the Prelates ([f] repining at the Legates [*] partiality to the King in approuing that offer,) [g] chose rather to suffer the whole land to grone vnder that vnchristian, and truely-styled Curse, [*] then to defalcate any iot of their couetous demaunds. Vnder which colour, the Popes Agent, (a fit helue for such a hatchet,) brake his mind to the King of a more secret & principall cause of his Legacie, which was [h] for the contriuing of a more validous and vnexceptionable conueyance of his Kingdomes to the yoake of Romish Soueraignety; pretending doubtlesse, (as Randulph had done) that [i] he could neuer be safe or quiet, but vnder the powerful protection of the Popes wings. What iust exceptions the World might take to the former Graunt, his Holinesse was not ignorant; it being an Act in the King, both of manifest [*] Periury against his oath at his Coronation, and also of [*] Constraint, [*] Circumuention, and [*] Feare; he being driuen thereto by the Pope himselfe, who had set vp both the French power, and his owne Barons against him; an Act of one [*] actually excommunicate, as also were the [*] Witnesses conuersing with him in that action, whereto, as neither the [*] next Heyres, nor the [*] Clergie, nor [*] Body of the Kingdome, gaue any consent, so an [*] open disclaime thereof was made by the very [k] Principall man there present, in the name (as is likely) of all the rest: and that all was ingrossed with so many grosse [*] vntruths, as if done most voluntarily; without any feare or force; in a general Assembly of the Barons, onely by a diuine inspiration, & because the King had nothing fit to pacifie God for his sins, but the giuing away of his Kingdomes: Well might the Pope blush at these shamelesse abusions; and therefore if now the King, standing on calmer termes, can be wrought to ratifie his former Graunt, though the dealing bee more fraudulent, yet the Act will seeme more colourable, because sauouring of lesse constraint, and more free deuotion. But if we looke with an vnpartiall Eye, wee shall see both the plight of King Iohn, and the action of Innocentius, still like it selfe: the Interdiction still burthening his land; his Barons more molestious to him then forraine foes; his Prelates greedily grating on him to empouerish his meanes; his Archbishop stopping all proceedings against forraine or home-bred enemies; and if hee had thwarted the Popes commaund herein, hee fore-saw farre greater stormes at hand, then hee had hitherto escaped. Thus in desire to settle his Kingdomes quiet for his owne time, and in hope, perchance, that his Successors would (as since by diuine blessing they haue) vindicate it againe from such an enforced slauery, hee condescended to renue his [*] Charter of Subiection, knowing belike that his expresse [*] reseruation to himselfe & his Heires, of all due administration of Iustice, all Liberties and Regalties, (as being excepted out of the Graunt,) was forcible of it selfe to make it vnforcible. For how hath hee his wonted power of Iustice, who was supreme, and is made subordinate? how his wonted liberties, who was absolute, and is made Homager and Pensioner? how his fore-used Regalties, whom another may name and command as his vassall? Yet this Charter, adorned with a Golden Bull, (fit for the Roman [*] Phalaris, whereas the former was but sealed with wax) was at a meeting in Saint Pauls Cathedrall Church ([l] pretended for other businesses about the Interdict) presented for more authenticke solemnity at the High-Altar, where, in the King and Legates presence, the Archbishop of Canterbury, himselfe also both a Cardinall & a Legate (in this, acting the office of a stout Patriote, & noble Prelate, as the Archbishop of Dublein had done at the first Graunt,) stept forth, and in the [*] name of the whole Clergy and Kingdome, [m] boldly and earnestly presented [n] at the same Altar in solemne manner, his Appeales against that Charter, so execrable to the whole world, as likewise formerly [o] he had vsed all possible endeuor to diuert the kings heart from that subiection to the Pope and Court of Rome. That the Peeres of the land accorded with the Archbishop in the Appeale, (and

(and more then in Appeales) both the Kings owne p letters to the Pope saying, they openly professed, that they forcibly made head against him, because hee had so enslaued his land, and their owne bitter exclamations against it, so frequently in q Authors reiterated, doe demonstrate: and yet both the Archbishop and other Barons, are so cunningly named in the Popes r Transcript, as if they had not onely beene present and witnesses at the doing, but also approuers of the deed. What comfort then had Innocentius of renouncing his olde Charter, and thus shuffling for a new? Surely but little, it seemeth; especially when he saw both his owne Creatures in England thus oppugne it, and Christian Princes abroad; yea King Iohns * mortall enemies, who not onely denied, that England (notwithstanding this Transaction) s was any patrimony of S. Peter, and condemned the Pope for holding an errour so pernicious to all Kingdomes; but also vowed to die before they would yeeld, that any king can of his owne will, make his Kingdome Tributary, and his Nobles slaues to others. By which vniuersall detestation of this the Popes vsurping, it is not improbable (though for the present hee flourished the Transcript thereof, which he sent into England, with the t Preface of Christ and Melchisedech, being Kings and Priests, and that therefore in one person of Christs Vicar, as the Soule and the Body, so both Kingdome and Priesthood did now concurre,) that yet ere long hee was no lesse ashamed of this latter, then of his former Charter. Whereto well suteth his testimony, who writes, that a v Parliament was held at London the yeare 1214. Where the Archbishop sate as President with all the Clergy and Laity: wherein by commandement of the Pope, the Charter, Fealty, and homage by which the King was obliged to the Pope, was absolutely released on the 7. day of Iuly: which if bee true, no maruaile if the Court of Rome cannot produce, though often challenged thereto, this Charter, whereof so much they vaunt. Notwithstanding some vnquiet Spirits, aspiring long after to the Papacy, though pretending (perhaps) the x Originall Charter was consumed at Lyons (where the y Pope causing, some say, his owne Conclaue to be set on fire, to haue a pretence to extort a contribution from the Prelates there in councell, the fire went farther then * he meant it should) they made some flourish to z renew their claime of homage and pension, till in a Generall Parliament, the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, seuerally and ioyntly a enacted, that for so much as neither King Iohn, nor any other King, could bring his Realme and people to such thraldome, but by common assent of Parliament, (the which was neuer done,) and that in so doing he did against his Oath at his Coronation; besides many other causes of iust exception; if therefore the Pope thence forward should attempt any thing therein, the King with all his Subiects should with all their Forces and powers resist the same, and rather hazard all their liues and liuelyhood, then endure that vsurpation. If Pope Pascall (in the b time of King Iohns grandfather) hauing with much solemnity made some graunts to the Emperour Henry, and confirmed them with an c Anathema, with the d oaths of thirteene Cardinals, and with e religious receiuing of the blessed Sacrament; yet, because such graunts were thought preiudiciall to his See, f solemnly disclaimed his owne Act, and such his doing was approued by a Clergy Councell, as pretended to be done g by feare: how much more iustly might King Iohns Successors and his State, by such approbation of their grand Councell, free themselues of those seruitudes wherewith by anothers vniust, forced, vnwarrantable Act, they were supposed to be enfettered?

(55) Though the Archbishop were so vnkinde against the Pope (the Aduancer of his Fortunes,) as to giue by his appeale so fatall a blow to his desired Crowne, yet the Pope was not so ingrate as to die in his debt; as quickely hee found in h another Appeale which hee made to the Pope against his Legate, for that he, relying on i Apostolicall indulgence, not onely disposed of all Spirituall dignities to k such as best liked the King, but also to his owne l Italians, and Kinsmen, though absent, vnknowne, vnsufficient, vnworthy, yea, and some m vnborne. Which Legatine * Tyranny vnsufferable in a Christian State, though Simon Langton (the Archbishops brother and Proctor) vrged earnestly before the Pope, yet the Legates Agent Randulphus, so displayed both the Archbishops feruentnes in vsing such * eager perswasions and appellation against the Kings subiection, and the Prelates * auarice, in their vnreasonable exactions for restitution from the King; being the most benigne, modest, and humble Prince that his eyes euer beheld; that his Holines not onely conceiued n exceeding hatred against the Archbishop and his cause, but sent also his Authenticke Letters for repealing the Interdict, vpon restitution onely of 13000. Markes * more to the Prelates (the King before had voluntarily offered them 100000) and that but by equall portions of o fiue yeeres payment. But the King, who knew the Popes pleasure before these Letters came to impart it, hauing found that his French affaires had sustained vnreparable impeachments by his hitherto enforced delayes, p entrusting his Kingdome to the Legate and Earle Marshals custody, was with his Forces passed into Poictu, (whiles in his absence, the relaxation of the Interdict, after q more then sixe yeeres continuance, was by the Legate in a Parliament solemnly promulged) where his Successes were so fortunate, that r it being powerfully subdued, great hope was conceiued the other Prouinces would follow. Whence breaking with s like victories into Britaine, being there at the point to giue t battle to Lewis the Dolphine, his euerfaithlesse Poictouins sodainely v forsooke him, and made him forsake his purpose. But a greater impayrement of those his hopes, was the x defeature of his Confederate Otho the Emperour, at the renowned Battle of * Bouines, where King y Philip, stricken from his horse by the hand of Reginald Earle of Bulloigne, had there with his life ended the quarrell, if a faithfull Souldier had not couered him with his own Body, and brauely sacrificed his life, to saue his Soueraignes; who thereupon recouered both his footing, and the victory. The heauy newes whereof, concurring with his Barons outrages at home, droue King Iohn on z deare conditions, to capitulate on a fiue yeeres Truce, and returne to bridle them at home, whose attempts hee euer found most dangerous, when he was most busied abroad. For vnder a * pretext of Deuotion (the vsuall maske for Treachery) the Barons assembling at Saint Edmunds, a did euery man on the high Altar seuerally sweare, to renounce their sworne fealty to the King, & pursue him by Armes, till they had enforced his consent to the Charter of liberties formerly by the Archbishop recommended to them. Which when b afterward they came in person to challenge of the King, as a part of his Oath taken at his Absolution; he c seeing both their forces and affections addressed for violence, was enforced with gentle language & promised satisfactions, to desire, till after Easter, mature deliberation on so important a matter; in which breathing time, both in pollicie, he tooke new oath of loyalty throughout all the land, & d in deuotion, vndertooke the Vow and Signe of the holy Warres, choosing belike to dye against faithlesse Turks, rather then to liue amongst such vnfaithfull Subiects. But neither Oaths, nor holy vowes e (then esteemed the supreame priuiledge of protection) could be sufficient Bucklers to protect against such desperate attempters; who at the prefixed weeke of Easter, preparing themselues not for a Conference, as with their Prince, but for a Battle, as against some hostile power, trouped together at Stanford, with f an Army inestimable for number, whose * very principall Abetter and conspirer was Stephen the Archbishop, the more pernicious person, because (to hide his false entendements) most assiduous in attendance about the King. And g him the King selecting to send to the Barons Barons Army (who were come on as far as Brackley, not farre from the King, residing now in Oxford) to know the contents of their desires; hee brought a [h] Scedule of their claimed liberties, with a message of their resolutions, if presently hee sealed not a Charter thereof vnto them, they would compell him thereto by forcible entrance on all his possessions. Whereat his great heart [*] highly disdaining, hee demanded, why they also demanded not his Kingdome? those their exactions being grounded on no colour of reason, and swearing neuer to enslaue himselfe to them by such a concession, he dismissed his Archbishop to return them his peremptory answere.

The Barons in open rebellion.

(56) Neither were the Barons lesse resolute in performance of their vow and message, appointing for Head vnto that huge and heady rout, Robert Fitzwalter, whom they enstyled [i] The Marshall of Gods Armie and holy Church: who first assailing Northhampton Castle, after fifteene dayes fruitlesse fury, departed to Bedford, whose [*] Castelan being a Confederate, gaue them easie entrance; but the Londoners (displeased with the King for burthening them with taxes) not onely admitted them, but [l] inuited them by request, to enter their Citie by night: where hauing that Key (as it were) of the Land, in their dispose, they by their [m] threatfull letters, not onely drew most of the Nobles from the King, but also had almost lockt him out of his Regall Seat. To preuent which outrage, by gentle messages intreating of the Barons a place and day of meeting, who thereto designed [*] Runingmead ([n] since called Counsell-mead, for such consultations of State,) they thither came [o] with armed multitudes out of all the Kingdome beyond all number, that the King, [p] seeing his power far inferiour vnto theirs, was constrained to [*] grant them their vttermost desires, not onely for Liberties, (specified in [*] Magna Charta, and Charta foreſtæ) but also for a kind of sway in the Gouernment, by twenty fiue selected Peeres, to whose commaunds all the other Barons also were bound by oath to bee obsequious. Thus one of the greatest Soueraignes of Christendome, was now become the [q] twenty sixt petty King in his owne Dominions; as appeared that very night, when all the rest following the pompous streame of the new vp-start Kings, left their Soueraigne [*] onely with seauen Gentlemen to attend him. What maruaile if high disdain hereof pierced his swelling heart, and filled his minde with reuoluing thoughts, how to vnwind himselfe out of those seruile fetters? And so hee did: [r] sending his letters ouer night vnto certaine his trustiest Castellans, strongly to fortifie and victuall their Castles; and the [s] next morning before breake of day, very secretly retyring into the Isle of Wight: (whence seeking redresse both by the [t] spirituall and temporall sword) hee sent Messengers, both to the Pope, and other his forraine friends, to craue the Censures of the one, and succours of the other, against such outragious Rebels. In both which, his Agents were so sedulous, and his Friends so compassionate, that at [v] Rome by definitiue sentence, the Barons Charters were speedily cancelled, the King and Barons [z] accursed, if either of them obserued the composition, (which Excommunication was soone after vpon their continued rebellion put in execution, for that [y] the Pope, Fortunes wheele being turned, did mortally persecute them whom himselfe had first whetted and incensed against the King,) [z] and from Flaunders, Gascoyne, Brabant, and other parts, such competent aids came in, as encouraged the King (after [a] three moneths secrecy and retyring,) to shew himselfe in the face of his enemies. His suddaine comming, with so vnexpected attendance, to the siege of Rochester Castle, so amated both the [*] Captaine thereof, and all the Barons ([b] who had sworne to assist him against any siege,) that the one not daring to approach to his rescue, the other was enforced to yeeld vp his charge; and all his company had receiued, [*] what they deserued, had not Sauary de Malleon entreated for their liues. The Gales of King Iohns fortunes seemed from this time, to blow from some happier Angle; and [c] diuiding his great hoast into two parts, with the one, conducted by himselfe Northward, he [*] euery where from the Southerne to the Scotish Sea, victoriously subdued his Rebels, as likewise did the Earle of Salisbury with the other forrainers Southward. In which most deplored state of this land, all things were in confusion, and all men set on mischiefe, [d] Fathers against their Sons, Brother against Brother, Kinsmen and Allies, against their neerest friends, by assayling, surprising, pursuing, burning, spoyling, disherizing, tormenting, murthering; all the Kingdome, by the combustion of so vniuersall a Rebellion, becomming like a generall shambles, or place of Infernall torture. And yet, as witnesseth one who then liued, [e] the Fathers and aged men (likely to be the wiser, and better affected,) stood on the Kings part, but the younger on the contrary; though some againe forsooke the King for loue of their kindred, and other like respects.

The Popes Censures contemned.

(57) Which certaine miseries, and vncertaine sydings in ciuill warres, are not so strange, as is the sauage madnesse of disloyall dispositions, who to attaine a shadow of seeming Liberties, immerge themselues and their abetters into bottomlesse seruitudes and distresses. Yet more strange it is, that those Barons, and their adhering impugners of the King, whose pretext formerly was, that they durst not obey the King because of the Papall Curse, being now themselues by vertue of the same [f] commanded to obey and assist him, could without any scruple contemne both it, and him, [g] pretending it concerned them not, because particularly they were not named. Yea, the Archbishop himselfe, who with his rufflings had made the World beleeue, that the Popes censure, (yea and his [h] owne too,) were of vertue to depriue the King of all Soueraigne command ouer his Subiects, now being [i] by name, and vnder that fearefull penalty, required by the Pope to denounce the same, against those perturbers of the Kings peace; he esteeming thereof, but as a visard to affright children, told the Popes messengers, [k] he would not doe it for any cause whatsoeuer, till himselfe had in person conferred with the Pope; for which enormious contempt, the Bishop of Winton and Pandulph, [l] solemnly denouncing the curse themselues against the Barons, did likewise suspend him from all Episcopall authority. Stephen thus comming to Rome (for Innocentius had then called a Generall [m] Councell, and therein [n] excommunicated all either French or English who impugned King Iohn) was in that great assembly ([o] of 61. Archbishops, 412. Bishops, 800. Abbots and Priors,) accused and conuict of [p] treason against the King, and contempt against the Pope and Churches censures; for which the Pope [q] fully resoluing to depose him from his See and Dignity, by the Cardinals earnest intercession for him (as being their Brother-Cardinall) was intreated to deale somewhat milder; but yet there by [*] publike sentence confirmed his suspension, commanding by his [r] letters all his Suffragane Bishops to with-draw their obedience from him. And for a farther reuenge, whereas Simon Langton (his Brother,) by his procurement had been elected to the See of Yorke, (a strange example to [s] haue a whole Kingdome ruled by two Brethren of so turbulent humors) the Pope not onely did [t] cassate his Election, and made him incapable of any Episcopall Dignity, but also placed in that See, Walter Gray [v] (a trusty friend to the King, and a professed enemy to the Langtons) whose [x] Pall cost him no lesse then a thousand pound. By the like couetous grating at the breaking vp of the Counsell, the Pope [y] extorted of euery Prelate there, an infinite masse of Money [z] before he would giue them leaue to depart home; amongst whom William Abbot of S[t]. Albans was one, [a] who "comming to take his leaue of the Pope without any "present; what? (saith he) Art thou the Abbot of "Saint Albans, to which place so often fauours haue "beene done by our See; and doth it become thee, to "goe hence without respect to me who am Pope? where-"upon he offering fifty Marks, was checkt and enforced before ted by the Pope, then to falſifie his promiſe to the Engliſh Barons. With which * ſlender reſpect and ſcorne to his Holineſſe, the Legate, [t] ſeeing ſuch ſterne looks, and fearing alſo they would preſently haue done him ſome miſchiefe, got thence in haſt; and Lewis as ſpeedily ſet forth for England, with his Fleete of ſix hundred Ships, and foureſcore * Boats, (Euſtachius an [t] Apoſtatate Monke, thereof being chiefe,) wherewith * arriuing firſt in the Iſle of * Thanet, and afterward at [v] Sandwich, thither came the Barons and ioyned with him; whereupon thinking it wiſedome, firſt to arme himſelfe againſt ſpirituall weapons, (the Excommunication denounced againſt him by the Popes owne mouth) hee preſently * writes his ſmooth Letters to the learned and conſtant Abbot Alexander; laying before him his Title to the Crowne, which Iohn had forfeited: Firſt, by treaſon in king Richards time. Secondly, becauſe his attaining the Crowne, was but Electiue. Thirdly, becauſe he loſt all his eſtate, by the ſentence of the French Peeres, for Arthurs death. Fourthly, for violating his oath in enthralling the Kingdome to the Pope, in wronging the Clergy, in oppreſſing the Laity; that therefore the right deuolued to Lewis. Firſt, by inheritance of his wife, the Neece of king Iohn. Secondly, by Election of the Nobles. The faithfull Abbot could well diſcerne clouds from Caſtles, and colours from truth, and (as a Monke doth rightly commend him for it,) as another inuincible Alexander Macedo, hee thunders the Churches great Curſe, againſt Lewis and his mighty Army, and ſtucke cloſe to his Soueraigne to his laſt gaſpe, notwithſtanding either feares or fawnings, which Lewis vſed to winne him to his ſide. King Iohn (whoſe great Nauy, [x] wherewith he meant to encounter him, was driuen downe Southward by a ſodaine tempeſt,) lying then at Douer, [y] with an Army conſiſting moſt of ſtipendary Forrainers, better affected (as afterwards appeared) to Lewis a forrain Prince, then vnto him, he deemed it a poynt as of neceſſity, ſo of greater wiſedome, to diuert towards Wincheſter, and [z] for a time to forbeare battle, rather then commit his whole fortunes to the hazard of their ſodaine defection. Lewis hereby had free ſcope to take in all thoſe parts (Douer Caſtle onely excepted, which King Iohn committed to the moſt valiant Hubert de Burgo,) till he came to London, where * entring with ſolemne Proceßion, & * incredible applauſe of all, he took in Pauls Church (whither he went to pray) oaths of the Citizens, and after at Weſtminſter, of the Barons, himſelfe [a] ſwearing to reſtore all men their right, and to recouer to the Crowne, whatſoeuer had been loſt by King Iohn. There hee [b] choſe for his Lord Chancellour, Simon Langton (ſo lately diſgraced by the Pope,) by [c] whoſe preaching, the Citizens of London and Barons, though being all excommunicated, did celebrate diuine ſeruice, and drew on Lewis to doe the like; all which, (Lewis and his Chancellour eſpecially, and by name,) Gualo the Legate (being now with King Iohn) did ſolemnly [d] accurſe, and cauſed to be ſo denounced throughout the whole land; making great aduantage thereof, by [e] conuerting the profits of all their Church-liuings to his own, and his Chaplens vſes. But both French and Engliſh had now experimentally learned, that the Popes Curſe was no ſuch deadly and dreadfull Hagge, as in former times they deemed it; nor could it ſo faſcinate the Lewyſians, & their ſucceſſes, but that all theſe parts were ſoone humbled before him; though ſome where not without reſiſtance, as at Odiam Caſtle, [f] wherein 13. Engliſh men alone, not onely braued Lewis and his whole Army fifteene dayes, but alſo ſallying forth vpon them, euery one tooke an enemy, and ſo carried them to the Caſtle, and after with great admiration of the French, and honourable conditions ſurrendred the Caſtle. Douer, with * few other Caſtles onely now ſtood out; where [g] whiles Lewis imployes incredible coſt and toyle in a furious but bootleſſe ſiege, ([h] whither Alexander King of Scots in amity repaired to him, but ſoone returned,) and his Confederates doe the like at Windſor Caſtle; King Iohn and his mighty hoaſt, breaking forth with a ſuddaine violence, like a furious tempeſt, ouer-runneth the Countrey all about, [i] to the ruining of the Barons Caſtles, and poſſeſſions euery where. Thus ſetting forth from Linne in Norfolke, (where, for their faithfull ſeruices he [k] beſtowed large Franchiſes, and his owne Sword, and a Guilt Bole, for teſtification of his affection,) with a full [l] reſolution to addreſſe his mighty Army for to giue Lewis battle, as he was paſſing the Waſhes with his Army and rich carriages toward Lincolnſhire, in thoſe ſands (by reaſon of the often-changeable channell, euer dangerous,) all his [m] Carriages, treaſure, and prouiſion, (himſelfe and his Army hardly eſcaping) were irrecouerably loſt.

(60) Many likewiſe were the grieuances into which the Barons, the meane while were plunged; to ſee their Natiue Country by their owne wilfulneſſe thus horribly maſſacred, their owne Caſtles and poſſeſſions ruined and rifled by the King, & which bred in them moſt anxietie, [n] their faithfull ſeruices (in this their faithleſſe adherence) not ſo reſpected by Lewis, as he, and their owne fore-running hopes had promiſed them, whiles hee conferred onely on his French, all ſuch Territories and Caſtles, as the hand of Victory had lent vnto him. But their diſtreſſes were yet farre greater, then thoſe their iealouſies could comprehend, [o] till a Noble Frenchman (Vicount de Melun) a man of great eſteeme with Lewis, hauing his ſoule in his ſickneſſe deadly wounded with the ſins of his health, deſired priuate conference on his death-bed in London, with thoſe Engliſh Barons, to whom Lewis had committed the cuſtody of that City. To them he imparted, what lamentable deſolations and vnſuſpected ruines hung ouer their heads, for that Lewis with ſixteene other his chiefe Earles and Barons, whereof himſelfe was one, (auerring it on the Saluation of his now departing ſoule,) had taken an Oath, if euer Englands Crowne were ſetled on his head, to condemne vnto perpetuall exile all ſuch as now adhered to him againſt King Iohn, as Traitors to their Soueraigne, and all their kindred in the land vtterly to extirpate. So counſelling them timely to preuent their miſeries, and to locke vp his words vnder the Seale of Secreſie, preſently his penitent Soule being thus in peace with men, went to reſt with God. What ſtrange amazements ſo rufull a relation might worke in the hearers, we may imagine, but onely men in like perplexed eſtate can fully and ſenſibly conceiue. The operatiue power whereof was ſuch, that though many of the Barons then doubted, [p] whether, if they returned to their Soueraignes due allegiance, he (whoſe hatred againſt them with ſo many indignities they had prouoked) would accept them vpon their repentance, [q] yet preſently fortie of them addreſſed their Letters of ſubmiſſiue ſuite vnto the King, in hope that true [r] kingly bloud is euer ready to yeeld mercy, to ſuch as are ready to yeeld themſelues proſtrate.

(61) But theſe Sollicitors for mercy came too late, either to receiue, or yeeld any contentment, by their ſubmiſſion to the King, himſelfe (now at Newarke) lying at the mercy of a higher Soueraigne, and by the ſtroke of death neere to ſome reſt, which in his life he had ſeldome attained: vexations being commonly the attendants of Crownes, but quiet and content the Priuiledges of more priuate States. On deaths approach, with penitent [ſ] confeſſion of his ſinnes, and great deuotion, he receiued the bleſſed Euchariſt, hauing the Abbot of * Croxton for his Phyſitian both bodily and ghoſtly: and not onely forgaue gladly all his mortall perſecutors (holding that a matter though very difficult to fleſh and bloud, yet ſalutary to the Soule) but alſo ſent command to Henry his ſonne to doe the ſame: to whom he cauſed all preſent, to [t] ſweare fealty, as to the Heire of his Crowne, and ſent his letters to all his Officers abroad, exhorting them to aſſiſt him. And [v] thus he commended his ſoule to God, and his Body to be buried in Worceſter Church, where the Biſhop ſolemnly interred it, by the kings appointment, neere the Body of Wolſtan, a ſainted Biſhop, renowned for conſtant fidelity to his Prince againſt the rebellious Nobles of * his time: with which kind of men, King Iohns gouernment had beene miſerably encumbred.

(62) This, being the Cataſtrophe of his Tragicall Raigne, might alſo haue beene the cloſe of his Story, had not the ſuddenty of his death exacted ſome ſearch into the cauſe of his ſickneſſe. Such Authors as touch the matter but in generall, content themſelues with ſaying, hee dyed of a [a] griefe, or a [b] feauer, or a [c] flux, or a [d] ſurfet; but thoſe who haue entred into the particulars, inſiſt on ſuch a ſurfet, as whereof both griefe, feauer, and flux were moſt probable effects and Symptomes. For comming (ſay [e] they) from the Waſhes, to Swinſhed Abbey, (being of the Ciſteaux Order, which of olde hee had much incenſed) he added new matter of offence, as hee ſate at meat, when, in ſpeech [f] of his enemies too large prouiſion, he ſware, if he liued but halfe a yeare longer, he would make one halfe-peny loafe as deare as *twelue: which to preuent, a Monke of that holy habit, whither in loue to Lewis, or hate to the King, or pitty on the Land, preſenting him with an enuenomed Cup, (whereof the King commanded him to be his Taſter) became the Diabolicall Inſtrument of his owne and his Soueraignes deſtruction. This relation deliuered by Monkes, and men of Monkiſh humour, as a thing ſo vndeniable, that they auow (at what time they wrote this) [g] fiue Monkes in that Abbey did ſing for this their Brothers ſoule ſpecially, and ſo ſhould whiles the Abbey ſtood, which, if it had beene forged, euery Child might eaſily haue refuted; & the rehearſall of all circumſtances thereof, (of the Kings ſpeeches, of the Monkes conference with his Abbot, of his preparing the drink with the Toade in the garden, of his dying in the Firmary) might deſerue credit with the greateſt Patrones of Monkery; yet [h] one of them (as if by acquiting Simon of Swinſhed, all * other of ſuch Orders were cleared from aſſaſinating of Princes) ſtriueth eagerly, to aſperſe ſome late * Relaters hereof, with the blots both of malice and forgery. Wherein is the malice? in adding to the narration, Pictures alſo of the fact, ſo to moue hatred to Monkes and their Religion; whereas of truth, either Monkes, or men of that Religion, were the very firſt, who not onely ſo depictured, but alſo liuely and richly depainted it in their [i] goodlieſt Manuſcripts. Wherein then the Forgery? in adding to Caxton, that [k] his Abbot gaue him abſolution for the ſame before hand, there being no ſuch matter at all, nor any mention thereof in the Story? No! let the very Story ſpeake, [l] The Monke went to the Abbot, and was ſhriuen of him, and told the Abbot all the King had ſaid; and prayd his Abbot to aſſoile him, for he would giue the king ſuch a drinke that all England ſhould be glad thereof, and ioyfull: tho yode the Monke into the Garden, &c. Yea farther, [n] one Monke alleadgeth, an inducement for the Abbots aſſent thereto, for that the King had ſent for the Abbots Siſter (a faire Prioreſſe) with purpoſe to haue defloured her. Yea, but the Story it ſelfe is charged with [o] nouelty, the firſt authour thereof being but An. 1483. and all other former Writers making no mention of it. This if true, were ſomewhat, & doubtleſſe, it is as true as the former: for how could he be the firſt Author, ſith the Latine Hiſtory entitled * Eulogium, (whoſe Author dyed about 1366.) hath all particulars more exactly ſet downe, then that Engliſh hath, and expreſly, that the Monke conferred with his Abbot, of his whole purpoſe, and ſhriued himſelfe, how hee would ſuffer this voluntary martyrdome, as Caiphas ſaid of Chriſt, better one periſh then a Nation. At which conſtancy of the Martyr, the Abbot wept for ioy, and praiſed God: So the Monke being abſolued by the Abbot, was vndaunted, and tooke the Cup, &c. And not only [p] Ranulph the Monke of Cheſter, [q] Iohn of Tynmouth, and [r] Thomas Otterbourne the Franciſcan Fryer, recorded it as * a fame generally receiued, but ſundry other, auncient Stories; as Iohn

Iohn

Iohn of Lichfield, the Monke of Leiceſter, and Scala Mundi (to omit other [f] nameleſſe Authours before Ann. 1483.) ſo confidently auouch his poiſoning at Swinſhed, that vnpartiall [t] after-Writers, though friends to Monkery, made no ſcruple to beleiue it. And why ſhould they not, ſith an * Author, more ancient and vnexceptionable then all the reſt, (euen King Iohns Sonne and Succeſſor in his Kingdome) auerred it, [v] when, the Prior of Clerken-well ſaucily telling him (being then in that houſe) that as ſoone as he ceaſt to doe Iuſtice towards his Prelates, hee ſhould ceaſe to bee a King; the King enraged with his traiterous threat, replyed; What? meane you to turne me out of my Kingdome, and afterward to murder me, as my Father was dealt with?

(63) But not to trouble our ſelues with refuting a Gooſes gagling againſt Foxes true relation; eaſie it is to obſerue the hatred of Monkes againſt that King, both in thus procuring his death then, and his diſhonour (a ſecond death) in their ſlanderous inuentions euer ſince. For, whereas he [x] writ by ſome of his Biſhops to certaine forraine Princes, for aides againſt his faithleſſe Rebels; the Monkes charge him, that he counterfeited his Biſhops Seales, and writ abroad, that all Engliſhmen were become Infidels and Apoſtates from Chriſts faith, and therefore ſuch ſhould come to ſubdue them, and take their poſſeſſions: [y] when hee ſaid, a Stag which hee kild, had neuer the leſſe fat, though he neuer heard a Maſſe; they charged him he doubted of the Reſurrection of the dead; [z] and in ſaying, hee neuer ſped well after his yeelding to the Pope, that he ſaid he was vnfortunate ſince he was reconciled vnto God: that, [a] when hee gaue leaue to a ſeruant of his owne, to enter any religious Order, hee gaue him leaue to be of what Religion and Faith hee liſt. That moreouer, [b] he offered his Kingdome to a Sarazen, & would embrace the Turkiſh faith, though this tale were told by one Robert of London (a [c] wicked Maſſe-Prieſt, or rather a Monſter, [d] hauing a face like a Iew, with one arme long, and another ſhort, his fingers deformedly growing together two and two,) with ſuch ſenceles improbabilities, as [e] that he found that Mooriſh King reading of Saint Pauls Epiſtles, and that he refuſed the Kingdome of England being offered him, with the like. That laſtly [f] it was reuealed to a Monke, King Iohn was in Hell; though a Poet for ſo ſaying, is by [g] M. P. (a who made no doubt of King Iohns ſaluation) cenſured for a * Reprobate. Theſe all are demonſtrations of ſo incredible hatred, as ſhould rather alleuiate their Authors credit, then the kings; whoſe Raigne had it not fallen in the time of ſo turbulent a Pope, ſo ambitious Neighbour-Princes, ſo diſloyall Subiects, nor his Story into the hands of exaſperated Writers, he had appeared a King of as great renowne, as misfortunes. His workes of deuotion inferiour to none; as his Foundations declare at [h] Beauley, [i] Farrington, [k] Malmesbury, and [l] Dublin, and that other for Nunnes at Godſtow by Oxford, [m] for which ſome haue interpreted that Propheſie of Merlin, as meant of him;

Sith Virgin-gifts to Maids hee gaue,
'Mongſt bleſſed Saints God will him ſaue.

His Acts and Orders for the Weale-publike were beyond moſt: he being either the firſt, or the chiefeſt, who appointed thoſe noble Formes of Ciuill gouernment in [o] London, and [p] moſt Citties, and Incorporate Townes of England, endowing them alſo with their greateſt Franchiſes; The [q] firſt who cauſed Sterling-money to be here coyned; The [r] firſt, who ordained the Honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earles; The firſt, who [s] ſetled the Rates and Meaſures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, & ſuch like Neceſſaries of Commerce; The [t] firſt, who planted Engliſh Lawes and Officers in Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdome, and faſtned Wales to the Crowne of England, thereby making amends for his loſſes in France; and thence, amongſt all the Engliſh Monarchs, he was the firſt who enlarged the Royall Style, with Lord of Ireland: a matter of greater import for Englands Peace, then all the French Titles euer yet haue prooued. His Wiues.

(64) Alice, the firſt wife of King Iohn, was the eldeſt of the two daughters, and heires apparant at that time, of Humbert the ſecond, Earle of Maurien, now called Sauoy: her Mother was Clemence, daughter of Berthold, the fourth Duke of Leringen, who had beene the diuorced wife of Henry the Lyon, Duke of Saxonie. This marriage was in their childhoode concluded by their Parents at Mountſerrant in Auerne, in February, Anno 1173; he ſhould haue had with her, her Fathers Earledome, but all altered by her vntimely death; and after enſued the death of her Mother, the new marriage of her Father, and iſſue male of the ſame, whereof the Dukes of Saxony are deſcended.

(65) Iſabel, his ſecond Wife (by * ſome called Hawiſia, or Auis) though the youngeſt of the three Siſters, yet was in regard of this marriage, the ſole Heire of William Earle of Glouceſter, Sonne of Earle Robert, the Naturall Sonne of King Henry the firſt; her Mother was Hawis the daughter of Robert Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter. She was married vnto him when hee was Earle of Mortaine, in the firſt yeare of his brother Richards Raigne: and after ten yeares hauing no iſſue by him, was (the firſt yeare of his Raigne) diuorced from him, vnder pretence of Conſanguinity, and married to Geffrey Mandeuill Earle of Eſſex, and laſtly, to Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, but dyed without any Iſſue by them.

(66) Iſabel alſo his laſt Wife, was Daughter and Heire of Aimer Earle of Angoleſme; her Mother was Alice daughter of Peter, Lord of Courteney, fifth Son of Lewis the Groſſe, King of France. She was married vnto him in the firſt yeare of his raigne, & crowned by Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, 8. Id. Octob. Anno 1200. and ſuruiuing him, was married to Hugh Brun Earle of March, and Lord of Luſignian and Valence in Poyctou, to whom firſt ſhe ſhould haue beene married, but yet (as ſeemeth) continued her affection to him till now. By him ſhe had diuers Children, (greatly aduanced by the King, Henry 3. their halfe-Brother, and as greatly maligned by his Subiects) Hugh Earle of March and Angoleſme, Guy of Luſignian, ſlaine in the battle at Lewiſe, William of Valence Earle of Pembroke, Aymer of Valence Biſhop of Wincheſter, Geffrey of Luſignian Lord of Haſtings.

His Iſſue.

(67) Henry, the eldeſt Sonne of King Iohn, and Iſabel his laſt Wife, was borne at Wincheſter, 1. October, 10. of his Fathers Raigne, Anno 1208. King Iohn dying at Newarke, (* whither hee was brought in a Horſe-litter from Swinſhed,) the Barons malice was ended, their offence amended, Lewis of France reiected, and the yong Prince ſeated on his Fathers throne.

(68) Richard, his ſecond ſon by the ſame Queene, was borne the next yeare after Henry; by whom afterward he was made Knight, created Earle of Cornwall, and appointed Earle of Poyctou. After the death of William Earle of Holland, Emperour of the Weſt, he was by the Electors choſen to ſucceede him in the Empire, and crowned King of Romanes, and of Almayn at the Citty of Acon in Germany, by Conrade Archbiſhop of Coleyne, Maij 27. being the Aſcention day, Anno 1257. deceaſing at the Caſtle of Berkhamſted, *April 20. (69) Ioane, the eldeſt Daughter and Childe of K. Iohn, & Queene Iſabel his laſt wife; was the firſt wife of Alexander the ſecond, King of Scots, married vnto him in Yorke, Iunij 25. Anno 1221. who returning into England to viſite her Brother, deceaſed at London, and was buried in the Nunnery at Tarent in Dorſetſhire, 4. Martij, in the 21. yeare of her Brother King Henries raigne in England, and the 23. of king Alexander her husbands in Scotland, Anno 1236.

(70) Eleanor their ſecond daughter was firſt married to William Marſhall the younger, Earle of Pembroke: and after his deceaſe without iſſue, and ſeauen yeares Widow-hood, remarried to Simon Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, Sonne of Simon Earle Montfort in France, by Amice Daughter of Robert Blanchmane Earle of Leiceſter) who maintaining the Barons warres againſt King Henry her brother, was ſlaine at the battaile of Eueſham, in the 19. yeare of her brothers raigne, 1265; after whoſe death, ſhe, and her Children were forced to forſake England; ſhe dyed in the Nunnery at Montarges in France. Henry her eldeſt Sonne, was ſlaine with his Father at Eueſham: Simon, the ſecond, was Earle of Bigorre, and anceſtor to a Family of Mountforts in thoſe parts of France. Almaricke, her third Sonne was firſt, a Prieſt, and Treaſurer of the Cathedrall Church in Yorke, and after a Knight, and a valiant ſeruitour in ſundry warres beyond the Seas. Guy the fourth Sonne was Earle of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitour of the Mountforts in Tuſcaine, and of the Earles of Campobachi, in the Kingdome of Naples. Richard the fift Sonne, remained priuily in England, and changing his name from Mountfort to Wellesborne, was anceſtor of the family of Wellesbornes in England. She had alſo a daughter named Eleanor, borne in England, brought vp in France, and married into Wales to Prince Lewellen ap Griffith.

(71) Iſabel, their yongeſt daughter was born, An. 1214; when ſhe was 21. yeares of age, ſhe was married (being the ſixt and laſt wife) to the Emperour Frederick the ſecond, at the Citty of Wormes in Germany, 20. of Iuly, 1235. Shee had iſſue by him, Henry appointed to be King of Scicily, and Margaret wife of Albert, Landgraue, Thurin: ſhe was Empreſſe ſix yeares, and died in Child-bed, Demb. 1. of her huſbands Empire 31. of her brothers raign 38. An. 1241.

(72) Iane, or Ione, the daughter naturall of King Iohn (by Agatha Daughter of Robert Ferrers, Earle of Darby) married to Lewin Prince of Wales. Anno 1204. her Father gaue with her the Caſtle & Lordſhip of Elinſmore in the Marches of Southwales; ſhe (like a moſt louing Child) gaue her Father ſecret intelligence of the Treaſons intended againſt him by the Welſh and Engliſh.

(73) Geoffrey Fitz-Roy, a baſe Son, who tranſported ſome Souldiers into France, when Archbiſhop Hubert forbad the King his Father to goe thither.

(74) Richard, who married the Daughter and heire of Fulbert de Douer, who built Chilham Caſtle in Kent, which Caſtle he had with her, and had Iſſue by her, of which ſome families of good eſteeme are deſcended.

CHAPTER IX.

An.D.1216.

HENRIE, the eldeſt ſonne of King Iohn, was, when his Father dyed, about * ten yeeres of age: which ſtate of Child-hoode, being moſt vnfit to ſucceede in ſo troublous a State, (the furious waues whereof ſeemed far from being appeaſed) God Almightie, in fauour and pitty of his Innocency, ſtrengthned with the ſeruice of great and worthy men, whereby the free and noble Realme of England was gratiouſly preſerued from French ſeruilitie; from whoſe Continent as it was naturally diſparted with a Sea, ſo could it as badly haue endured to be joyned thereto by ſubjectiue gouernement. Howbeit the difficulties were not few nor ſleight, which did at firſt empeach this happy preſeruation, though they did not hinder it long; for, * he diſpoſing the matter, who ordaineth all things wiſely, and moderates them ſweetely, faire weather was reſtored after ſtormes, and quiet being eſtabliſhed through the Kingdome, the peaceable ſeruants of GOD had ſpace to breath in.

(2) To effect ſo great a benefit, Wallo the Popes Legate ſtood wholly for aduancement of Henry, and expulſion of the French; the authority of whoſe perſwaſions, joyned with his other power and example, drew many of the Prelates ſo farre; that (although their lands and goods were therefore ſpoyled) they would not doe any homage to Lewis; as likewiſe the loyall care of William Marſhall Earle of Pembrooke, did gaine (in time) and ſettle the hearts of the ſecular Lords. Great was the wiſdome, courage and diligence of that Noble Gentleman in ſo broken and jeopardous eſtate; for he, knowing that the maine hopes of his Countrey reſted in the ſafetie of their perſons, in whom the right of Succeſſion was was, he first of all secured them within the Citie of Glouceſter, which was at Henries ſeruice: There were with the young King, his mother Queene Iſabel, his brother Richard, (afterward King of Romans,) his ſiſters, the ſaid Earle, and many others in great numbers of the chiefe and principall men of all ſorts, who vpon perfect notice of King Iohns death, repaired thither to their young Prince, with a purpoſe to conſult and concur in one, for the re-vnion of minds and bodies to the obedience of the true borne King. The Earle of Pembroke therefore bringing forth his precious charge, and placing him with all due honour and ceremony in view of the aſſembled States, is reported for the pleaſing of all ſides, to haue vſed words to this effect. *Albeit the father of this Prince, whom here you ſee before you, for his euill demeanours hath worthily vndergone our perſecution, yet this young Childe, as he is in yeares tender, ſo is he pure and innocent from thoſe his Fathers doings: Wherefore, ſith euery man is to be charged with the burthen of his owne tranſgreſſions, neither ſhall the Childe (as Scriptures teach vs,) beare the iniquitie of his Father: we ought of duetie and conſcience, beare our ſelues milder towards this tender Prince, and take compaſſion of his age. And foraſmuch as he is the Kings * lawfull and eldeſt Sonne, and ought to be our Soueraigne, & his Succeſſor, let vs with one ioynt aſſiſtance appoynt him our King and Gouernour; let vs remoue from vs this Lewis the French Kings ſonne, and ſuppreſſe his people, which are a confuſion and ſhame to our Nation, and the yoakes of their ſeruitude let vs caſt off from our ſhoulders.*

* They haue it his naturall ſonne, a word of olde bearing no ſtaine of Baſtardie, as ſince it hath.

(3) The entertaining of perſwaſions among the wiſe, is an effect of Truth, not of painted Phraſes; and theſe plaine words of the Earle, (the yong Kings Brother in Law) were receiued with generall applauſe of all that were preſent, ſo that Henry was immediately proclaimed, and ſpeedily crowned (vpon the day of S S. Simon and Iude) in the preſence both of Wallo the Popes Legate, (who impoſed on his vnexperienced yeeres ſome vndue Oathes of ſeruice to the Romane See,) and of Queene Iſabel, with many of the Lords Spirituall and Secular, and ſtore of all other ſorts of people. The ſpeede of which royall Ceremony (for it was the ninth day after King Iohns death) was not greater then the neceſſity of the State required: for his Enemy (nor onely his, but the enemy of the Engliſh name, Prince Lewis) had (as yet) London, the chiefe ſeat of the Empire, at his deuotion, many potent Earles, Barons, and martial male-contents, ſubject to his commaund, and an Army in the field with which he ſought to conſtraine that mirrour of conſtant loyalty, Hubert de Burgo, to render him the moſt important Caſtle in England, that of Douer, committed to his much-approued truſt: The young King on the other ſide was enuironed with many difficulties, want of money not the leaſt, the moſt part of his Fathers treaſures being drowned. To encounter al which miſchiefes, the ſaid Earle of Pembrooke was by common aſſent of Prelates and Peeres conſtituted Guardian of the young Kings perſon, and Vice-Gouernour of the Kingdome.

The Kings Coronation.

(4) Letters heereupon iſſuing in the new Kings name, and for his affaires, to all ſuch as had charge in the Common-weale, (with many promiſes of reward and fauour,) were accordingly in moſt places obeyed: for the euil-will borne to King Iohn, ſeeming to die with him, and to be buried in the ſame graue, the loyall bloud waxt warme about the coldeſt hearts, re-kindling in them the honeſt deſire of ſhewing themſelues true Engliſhmen. It was alſo a great helpe to the Kings party, that Prince Lewis his followers and abettours, were, on euery Sonday and Holiday, pronounced to ſtand accurſt, and excommunicated. Lewis perceiuing, (contrary to his expectation) that King Iohns death was to him nothing auaileable, but rather detrimentall, dwels no longer about Douer-Caſtle, but raiſing his ſiege, enters London, and prouides the beſt he can for his tottering eſtate, which he ſought to ſupport, by putting French Garriſons into Caſties; The * Tower of London being rendred to him; hee beſiegeth Hertford Caſtle, which after the ſlaughter of many French, being deliuered vpon faire compoſition, the cuſtody of that Peice was demaunded by Richard Fitz-Walter, as by ancient right belonging to him; but Lewis put him off with this anſwere, that hee ſhould haue patience, till he had conquered the Realme, at which time hee would reſtore their rights to euerie one. The ſecret reaſon which moued Lewis to giue this anſwere, was: for that, conſulting with his French vpon Fitz-Walters demaund, they gaue it for their common opinion: That the Engliſh were not worthy to haue ſuch places entruſted to their charge, who were betrayers of their naturall Lord. A juſt reaſon to moue Lewis ſo to anſwere, but a farre better to teach others to continue loyall. The Caſtle of Berkhamſted, (whoſe Captaine was one Waleran a valiant Dutch Knight) hopeleſſe of ſuccours, was likewiſe rendred, which as the reſt, he ſtuffed with French Garriſons; wherein, howſoeuer he prouided for his owne Nation during that preſent, hee tooke no wiſe courſe for the maine of his enterpriſe: for ſo apparant jealouſies, (ſeconding and confirming the Vicount Melunes predictions) could not but vtterly vnſettle the affections of ſuch great ones as had called him in. His next March being to Saint Albans, where he would haue conſtrayned the Abbot to doe him homage, he was encountred with this honeſt anſwer: That he would doe him no homage, vnleſſe he were abſolued from the homage which he had made to the King of England:* yet to purchaſe reſpite of homage, or rather his, and the Townes peace till Candlemas, hee was forced to vſe the mediation both of his * purſe, and of his noble friends.

(5) But thoſe inteſtine cauſes for which the Barons had called Lewis in, falling now to the ground by the death of King Iohn, and the French by their naturall inſolence, ſuſpitions and vanity, miniſtring new reaſons of auerſion, were all of them ſtrong motiues to diſpoſe the mindes of the Engliſh Lewyſians to returne to due obedience; yet finding themſelues bound in honour, not ſo to leaue him ſodainely deſtitute, (who vpon affiance of their oathes and hoſtages had put himſelfe among them) that hee ſhould thereby fall into Henries hands; they deſire therefore his abſence, but not his deſtruction. The more handſomely to compaſſe the reſt, an abſtinence from warre was (for a time) concluded betweene the King and Lewis; the rather, for that Lewis had intelligence from Rome, that the curſe which Wallo had denounced againſt him, ſhould ſhortly be confirmed by the Pope, vnleſſe he left England. As this Truce gaue Lewis libertie to ſayle backe to France for new ſupplies from his Father, (who greatly deſired to conferre with him;) ſo his abſence gaue opportunity to his Engliſh, to conſult more freely of their beſt way; that from thenceforth Lewis was neuer potent in their affections, but * preſently loſt many chiefe Lords and others, who againe became true Engliſh.

(6) Lewis vpon his ſpeedy returne out of France, minding to make a ſpeedie diſpatch, ſets out of London his Army of more then twentie thouſand Souldiers, with a purpoſe not onely to free * Mont-Sorrel, (then beſieged by his enemies) but to ſubdue the whole countrey adjoyning. Odious and grieuous to the Countries was this paſſage of the French, which reach as farre as Lincolne, there were among them ſo many ragged Raſcals, the * very ſcumme and filthy froth of that Nation, whoſe beggery was ſo baſe, that they had not Cloathes to hang on their backes, to ſupply the which they made many goe naked in all the places where they marched. The Earle of Pembrooke, Gouernour of the King,* by the Counſell of Wallo, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter reſoluing to ſet the cauſe vpon God, and the fortune of a Field, is now with the young King and his Aſſiſtant

Assistant Lords, at Newarke, where the Generall Assembly for that seruice was appointed. The whole Army after the Musters, rested there some dayes, which they spent not in vanities, but in deuotions & receit of the Sacrament, humbling themselues before the offended Majestie of God; and so all of them (saith Paris) being prepared, resolue eyther to returne victorious, or to die in defence of their country, their Soueraignes right, and their owne Liberties, and possessions, all which seemed now to lie at stake. To giue them the greater edge and spirit, Wallo with great solemnity accurseth Lewis and his Coadjutors, and thus the Army marcheth towards Lincolne, and the Lewysians there in siege of the Castle: the king himselfe being left with a strong guard at Stow, (about eight miles short of Lincolne) accompanied with Wallo and others, there without perill of his person to attend Gods pleasure, in the euent of the enterprise.

Lewis and his followers accursed.

Hollinsh.

(7) Vpon their approach, if the Counsell of * some English Lords had beene followed, the Lewysian Army had issued forth of the City, & giuen them battle in the open field; but the Earle of Perch, (the French Generall) thinking the Kings party to be greater then it was, for that the Noblemen and Bannerets thereof had each of them two Ensignes; the one borne with themselues, the other aduaunced among the carriages, which doubled the shew of their numbers; they did thereupon change that course, closed the gates of the City, and plyed their endeauours against the castle more fiercely then before. The Earle of Pembroke therefore lets Falcasius slip in at the Castle-posterne with his Arbalasters, whiles others breake vp the South-gate of the City, at which the Kings Army most couragiously entring, and they of the Castle sallying out in Flancke of the Enemy, scattered, and vtterly defeated the Lewysians. The Earle of Perch, their Generall, being enuironed with the Royalists, and willed to render himselfe, sware that hee would neuer become Prisoner to any English: vpon which refusall he was runne through the sight of his helmet into the braines, and so died without speaking any word. In this conflict, (being on Saturday in Whitson-weeke) the force of naturall propension was apparent; for notwithstanding the fierie resolutions of the Kings people, yet when they saw the faces of their kinsmen, friends, and countrimen on the other side, their fury relented so strongly, that the most part of the reuenge fell vpon the Horses, and not vpon the Horsemen, whom onely they laboured to make their Captiues. The whole riches of the Lewysian campe, and of the Citie of Lincolne, became the booty and spoyle of the Kings Army, whereupon this discomfiture was called Lewis Fair. Neither did the Clergy of the place escape, for the Popes Legate had commanded that they also should be rifled to a penny, as persons excommunicated in partaking with Lewis. The Chase was but coldly and fainedly followed vpon the flying Barons, otherwise not a man could haue escaped; wherein yet the chiefest Barons were taken, with about * 400. Knights, besides Esquiers, and of other sorts without note or number, though * some say that this number of Knights were slaine, and matrons and women of the Towne flying by boat, which they had no skill to gouerne, were drowned. Such as escaped the fight were not therefore past the danger; for the Country people fell vpon them as they fled, killing great numbers, so that almost all the foot-men tooke vp their last lodgings before they could reach to London, where Lewis was. The Marshal of France, the Castellan of Arras, and about two hundreth Knights came safely thither, but were not otherwise then sowerly welcome of the Prince, who laid vpon their cowardise the losse of all the rest. His feare of being taken Prisoner justly encreasing, he fortifies London by the best meanes hee can, and dispatcheth Posts into France for more reliefe. This great victory was much the stranger, if (as * some write the same went) that onely there were slaine vpon both sides, the Earle of Perch, one of Du-Brents Knights, and an obscure fellow belonging to some, or other of the Barons.

The fearefull end of the Earle of Perch.

(8) The Kings Gouernour after the victory rode presently with the gladsome tidings in the height of speede to the King and Legate, who with teares of joy gaue God thankes. But the noble Earle not leauing his worke imperfect, seekes to embarre Lewis from forraging about London. Meane while by the diligence of Lady Blanch the wife of Lewis, Eustace the ruffianly Apostata, (who of a Monke becomming a * Demoniacke) was now vpon the Sea with a fresh supply of men and munition bound for London; But God was no better pleased with these, then with the other scatterlings at Lincolne. For the English Nauie, hauing the winde of the French, sunke diuers of their Ships by tilting at them with the yron Prowes or Beakes of their Gallies; vsing also vnslaked lime in dust or powder, which they threw into the faces of their enemies, and blinded their sight: so were the hopes of Lewis for any present succours absolutely frustrated. Eustace himselfe, found after long search, and drawne out from the bottome of the Pumpe in a French Ship, at Douer had his head cut off, though * some say hee was slaine by Richard, a base-sonne of King Iohn. The newes of which successe being brought to the king, did not more reioyce him, then they wounded Lewis, for the losse was not onely great in men, but in all sorts of riches and prouisions. To giue now no rest to Lewis his declining fortunes, the Earle of Pembroke with a mightie Army besieged London, and Lewis therein, as well by Water as by Land; seeking to driue him by penurie to render the City. It came to capitulation, and in an Ilet in the Riuer of Thames, not farre from Stanes, the King, Wallo the Legate, and William Marshall, the Kings Gouernour, met with Lewis and the Barons to finish the Peace: for Lewis had promised to doe as Wallo and the Earle would deuise, so that it might not tend to his dishonour or scandall: Heades or Articles of the agreement which Lewis sware vpon the Gospell to performe, were, 1. That Lewis, the Barons, and other his partakers should stand to the iudgement of the Church, (whose censures they had now some yeares contemned) and from thenceforth be and remaine true to the same. 2. That he and his should forthwith depart the Land, neuer to returne againe with a purpose to doe harme. 3. That hee should doe his best to draw his Father to make restitution of all such things in France as belonged to the King of England, and that Lewis when himselfe was King should quietly part with them. 4. That Lewis should immediately render to King Henrie all holds and places taken in the warre. On the other part, the King, the Legate, and the Earle sware; 1. That the King should restore to the Barons, and others, all their rights and inheritances, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father. 2. That none (of the Laity) should suffer dammage or reproch for taking part on either side. 3. That Prisoners should be released, &c. Wherupon Lewis with his adherents was formally by Wallo absolued from the sentence of Excommunication, and so they ranne on all sides into embracements, and parted in the kisse of Peace. The * Welsh, who had held with the Barons, were left out of this Conclusion, being thereby laide open to spoyle. (10) The Realme of England purged of thoſe forraine dregges, was not therefore preſently freed from other manifold encumbrances, ſuch as after ſo great a toſſing of all lawes and things diuine, and humane, doe ordinarily flote vp and downe, like the froth and working of a troubled Sea. For diuers men preſuming vpon their former ſeruices to the State, or thinking the olde bad World would either continue ſtill, or ſoone returne, if juſtice grew confident againſt Treſpaſſors, or for what other corrupt motiues ſoeuer, did dare intollerable things. The * principall Lords of this miſ-rule, were William Earle of Aumarl, Falcaſius de Brent with his Garriſon ſouldiers, Robert de Veipont, with others, who hauing had the Caſtles and poſſeſſions of certaine Biſhops and Great men, either to keepe in truſt, or otherwiſe by iniquity of the times conuerted violently to their vſes; did ſtill with-hold the ſame, both againſt the mindes of their lawfull owners, and the Kings expreſſe Prohibition. Among others, Robert de Gaugi defended the Caſtle of Newarke, (being the Fee of the Biſhop of Lincolne, as was alſo the towne it ſelfe) againſt the Kings Armie, conducted by the * Great Marſhall Earle of Pembroke, for eight daies, and did not firſt yeeld the place, before (by mediation of friends) the Biſhop paide to Gaugi one hundreth pounds. There was in that great Earle, a perpetuall care to conclude things without bloud-ſhedde, wherein ſhined his Chriſtian piety and morall wiſdome, there being no other ſo ſafe way to ſettle diſordered humours. The greater was his loſſe both to the King and State, by his death, * ſoone after enſuing, whoſe * monument yet remaining, doth not ſo much eternize his memory, as that well-deſerued * Epitaph, the Epitome of his noble vertues;

(11) The King, (gouerned after Marſhals death, by Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſuch * other, whom the Biſhop had procured to joyne in adminiſtration of publique affaires) ſeeming now to haue a ſetled and calme eſtate, reſolues (for good hopes ſake) to be crowned againe; which was performed by Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterburie at Weſtminſter, with the attendance and confluence of all the Prelates, Peeres, and People. Vpon the * Saturday before his Coronation, the * new worke of the Abbey Church at Weſtminſter, (Paris calls it the Chappell of our Lady,) was begunne, whereof the King himſelfe in perſon laid the firſt ſtone, as if hee meant the World ſhould know, his intention was to conſecrate his future actions to raiſe the glory of God. This calme but new beginning, was almoſt as ſpeedily diſtempered and diſturbed by ſodaine ſtormes; by reaſon that, while the King kept his Chriſtmas with great royalty at Oxford, in the company of the Prelates and Peeres of England, William de Fortibus, Earle of Aumarl, incited by Falcaſius de Brent, and the like riotous Gentlemen, ſodainely departed from the Court without leaue, and (whither it were vpon diſcontentment, becauſe the King had againſt the Earles will the laſt yeere taken * ſome Caſtles into his hands, or out of an euill ignorance how to liue in quiet) he mannes the Caſtle of Biham, victuals it with the Corne of the Chanons of Bridlington, ſpoyles the Towne of Deeping, and vnder ſhew of repayring to the Parliament, ſeiſeth on the Caſtle of Fotheringhay, committing many other furious riots in contempt of the King, and breach of his peace; many * others in other places following his lewd example. Yet at length the Earle comming in vnder the conduct of Walter Archbiſhop of Yorke, was at the ſuite of Pandulph (who ſucceeded Wallo in the place of Legate) pardoned; and the like hurtfull clemency was extended toward his Complices and Retinue, whom the King (in regard belike of ſome former better deſerts) ſet free without puniſhment or ranſome. And to preuent any further diſturbances of that nature, Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, for his rare integrity and fidelity (approued in all King Iohns troubles) was alſo made gouernor of the Kings perſons, and Chiefe Iuſtitiar of England, with the general allowance of all the States. What neede the Land then had of a ſeuere proceeding, wee may judge by this, that Fouke de Brent held the Earledomes of Northampton, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, with the Caſtles and Holds; Philip de Marc, the caſtles of Peke and Nottingham, Nottinghamſhire and Darbiſhire; and others detained other portions, without any other right, then that which the iniquity of the late tumults gaue.

Oxford, about reformation of the Clergie; where also was conuented before him an execrable Impostor, who seeing how current all grosseſt deluſions paſſed in thoſe daies of blindneſſe, was emboldned to ſuffer himſelfe to be wounded in his hands, feete, and * ſide, (an horrour to thinke) that by the reſemblance of thoſe bloudy impreſſions, he might perſwade the people (apt to beleeue any thing) that he was their very Sauiour: whoſe deſerued puniſhment was by immuring betweene two walls, as a monſter too impious and vnworthy to die by any humane hand. There was immured with him a curſed olde Beaſt, who pretended to be Mary the mother of this Chriſt, and well might be, if their manners be compared; * ſome adde a third alſo, who named her ſelfe Mary Magdalen. The puniſhment by Crucifixion which * ſome thinke was executed vpon the man at Arbor-bery, is neither ſo credible nor tollerable, as in which Chriſtianity it ſelfe might ſeeme to ſuſtaine reproach; it being alſo againſt the * ancient law of Conſtantine, the firſt famous Chriſtian Emperour, that any ſhould from thence-forth die by crucifixion; but it may be, that it was firſt ſo judged (which might cauſe the relators errours,) though afterward vpon ſounder deliberation changed into a more fitting cenſure. But ſtrange it is, that this man deſeruing (as he did) ſo ſeuere a judgement at Oxford, S^t. Francis, whoſe fiction and impoſture was the very ſame, (for the * wounds, though not for the name, of Chriſt) * ſo ſoon after deſerued for it to be canonized at Rome, for a Chiefe of Saints; and perhaps if this Monſter had beene at Rome, he had beene likewiſe Sainted, or if Saint Francis had beene at Oxford, he had beene likewiſe immured.

(14) In the State of the Common-wealth incredible darings (though of inferiour quality to that former) were not wanting, againſt the maieſty of the King; as appeared by Conſtantine Fitz-Arnulf, a Citizen of London: who vpon colour of a popular tumult, by him purpoſely cheriſhed, (which roſe at paſtimes of wreſtling, and like maſteries betweene the Citizens of London, and others of the Suburbes,) attempted to ſet vp a Lewis againe, and in the heat of the ſedition, he trayterouſly cryed, * Mount-Ioy, Mount-Ioy, God for vs, and our Lord Lewis. Though the * Lord Maior, a diſcreet man, earneſtly perſwaded dutifull behauiours, yet Conſtantine had made the people incapable of good Counſell with his ſeditious Proclamations, which hee there cauſed to be * publiſhed. The ſecret of this conſpiracy was * reuealed by * another Citizen, and without queſtion was farther ſpred then the compaſſe of one Citie, euen as farre as into the hearts of all ſuch turbulent people, to whom warre was beneficiall, and Quiet banefull. The chiefe Iuſtitiar hearing of theſe matters, with forces aſſembled, entred * the Tower, whither he commaunded the principall men of the Citie to come, who eaſily put off the blame from themſelues vpon Fitz-Arnulf. But hee as reſolute in his anſwere, as deſperate in the ſedition, complayned of himſelfe in the hearing of all, that he had done leſſe therein then he ought; yet fifteene thouſand Markes ſterling hee offered for his life, when hee ſaw the halter about his necke, (for with his Crier, and his Nephew, the next day he was hanged,) but no price could redeeme him out of the hand of Iuſtice: It is ſaid, that he ſo confidently anſwered, vpon truſt of the Articles and Oath betweene the King and Lewis, that the partakers of Lewis ſhould not be troubled; and that, vpon this occaſion, Lewis denied reſtitution of ſuch things, as the Articles did mention, pretending that Henry had therein broken firſt his faith, and thereby made the whole contract fruſtrate. Execution thus done without noyſe, or the Londoners priuity, the Iuſtitiar accompanied with Falcaſius and his armed troupes, enters London, apprehends ſuch others as were culpable, and for a terrour to the reſt, cauſeth their * hands or feete to be cut off, and then ſet them at liberty. The King depoſed the Magiſtrates, though ſome write that the tumult was appeaſed by the Maior; but when the King found, that onely the * baſer ſort were intereſſed in the diſorder, hee was reconciled to the Citie, hauing firſt thus weeded this chiefe Garden of the Engliſh Empire, and pluckt vp the rootes of the maſter-bramble.

(15) This dangerous beginning might haue had farre worſe proceedings, if the King, though in yeeres tender, yet had not beene ſo prouident, as to haue fore-ſeene it, and ſo, with patient conniuence at ſome particular indignities, preuented a publique diſquiet. For the Barons, ſtill minding their long deſired Liberties, and requiring a confirmation of them by the King, who, at the concluded peace with Lewis, had ſworne thereto; William Briwere, one of the Kings Councell, anſwered; that the liberties which they demaund, ought not to be obſerued, becauſe they were violently extorted. But words growing heereupon, and Archbiſhop Stephen, (the Barons ancient Abettour) kindling thereat, the young King prudently ſhut vp the whole ſtrife with this ſpeech; All of vs haue ſworne to thoſe Liberties, and that which wee haue ſworne, all of vs are bound to obſerue. His Deed immediately ſealed his Word, (for he ſaw hee durſt doe no other,) and Writs were ſent forth, to enquire vpon Oathes, what Liberties or free cuſtomes were current, in, and from the time of King Henry his Grand-father: by which act, all mens hopes were raiſed to expect the full concluſion of all thoſe grieuous contentions, which had ſo long encombred the Kingdome. The like hope was conceiued of better ſucceſſes then before, in forraine affaires, vpon newes of the death of King Philip of France, the euer-deadly (and now dead) Enemie of Englands wel-fare; which mooued the King to ſend the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and three other Biſhops to Lewis, now crowned King of France, there to demand the Duchie of Normandy, and ſuch other lands on that ſide of the ſea, as before his departure out of England, he had ſworne to reſtore: but his anſwere was; 1. That he held thoſe poſſeſſions by a juſt title, as he was ready to ſhew King Henry, if he would come to his Court to make his demaund; 2. That the King of England had violated his Oath, for that ſuch as were taken at Lincolne were grieuouſly fined; 3. That ſuch Liberties of England, for which the war was firſt mooued, and had bin graunted at his departure, and ſince confirmed by oath, were not onely not obſerued, but the old wicked ones reduced, and generally farre worſe ordained in their place. With which ſolutions to their demand, the Ambaſſadors were faine to returne, and Henry left to come by his owne as he could.

(16) The King well perceiuing, how vnable he ſhould be eyther to recouer thoſe his Tranſ-marine Dominions, or almoſt to maintaine his owne royall eſtate at home, if ſuch, as by the vnrulynes of former times hauing gotten poſſeſſion of Crowne-Lands, might ſtill with-hold them, reſolued to reſume them; by aduiſe principally of Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, who therby drew vpon themſelues no ſmall loads of enuie. And whereas the message it selfe had beene scanned and sifted to the very bran, both heere and in * France, and judged to sauour of so vniuersall an oppression, as might cause a generall dissession from the Church of Rome; the King in presence of his Prelates and Peeres, turned off the Popes couetous demaund with this thrifty answere: The things which the Pope would perswade vnto, doe stretch themselues as farre as the Christian World is wide, and because England is but an Out-Angle thereof, therefore when we see other Kingdomes giue vs an example, he shall then finde vs the more forward to obey.

(21) That difficultie so auoyded; the King was earnestly bent to make a voyage in person to the ayde of his brother Earle Richard, who pursued the affaires of Gascoigne; which though by the late Earle of Sarisburies death it receiued some mayme; yet by the fortitude and counsell of other noble persons, it did still prosper. This intention and desire was staide by the receit of Letters out of France, which declared the Earle his brothers health, and the good successe of affaires. The King, (some say) among his Counsellors of State, had one William de Perepound, a great Astrologer, who fore-told that Lewis King of France should not preuaile; and this affirmation did the rather withhold him at that present. There is who * writes, that King Henry (vpon the Popes Letters) forbare to attempt any thing in France at that time, lest hee should hinder Lewis, who was then vpon an enterprise against the remaines of the Albigenses in Languedoc, Prouince, and the parts about. These men were traduced for Heretikes, and so condemned by the See of Rome; but what their Heresie was, a * Frier, (who writes against them) reports, saying, They were of all other the most pernicious Sect; for antiquity, some holding they were from the Apostles time; for generality, there scarse being any Nation where they are not; and lastly, for shew of piety, in that they liue justly before men, and beleeue all things touching God aright, and all the Articles of the Creede, * onely they blaspheme and hate the Church of Rome. No maruaile if this horrible heresie did trouble his Holinesse; and therefore, whereas his Predecessor, and himselfe had kept much adoe in Christendome, to excite men to take the signe of the Crosse, and warre against the Turke, (which the Friers did perswade men vnto, teaching, that * whosoeuer were polluted with any hainous offence, as Parricide, Incest, Sacriledge, he was presently acquited both from the sin, and the punishment of it, if he thus tooke the Crosse vpon him,) now, because the Earle of Tholous, and his people entertained the foresaid heresie, the Crosse, and holy warres were by the Pope denounced against them. Of which Earle yet let vs heare the judgement of another * Frier then liuing. Those (saith he) who thus tooke the warres and Crosse against him, did it more for feare of the French King, and the Popes Legate, then for zeale of Iustice; it seeming to many a wrong thus to infest a faithfull Christian man, and one who with many teares desired the Legate to examine the faith of euery one of his Cities, and if any one held against the Catholike faith, he would punish him, according to the judgement of the Church, and if any City should resist him, he would enforce it to make satisfaction. As for himselfe, he offered to be examined by the Legate touching his faith, and if he were faulty, hee would make satisfaction to God and the Church. But all these things the Legate scorned, nor could that Catholike Earle finde any fauour, vnlesse he would forsake his Inheritance, and abjure it both for himselfe, and his heires for euer. These were the Heretikes against which Lewis was now imployed by the Pope, and King Henry the while * commaunded to surcease from impeaching his holy enterprize. Wherein Lewis had spent a moneth in the siege of Auinion, and endured (for all his sacred Crossings) maruailous losses, by a terrible plague deuouring his Army, by a strange kinde of venemous Flies, dispatching many, by a sodaine drowning of a great part of his Army; and lastly, by being himselfe * poysoned by * one of his Earles (an vnchaste Riuall of his Bed,) though it was giuen forth of him, (as * of his late enemy King Iohn, whom some thinke that Lewis his friends did make away) that he died onely of a Flux.

(22) The newes of the French Kings death, seconded with sure relations of sundry discontentments, and open factions vnder the young King (who was but * about twelue yeares of age) bred an hope in King Henries minde, that now the time was come, wherein hee might recouer those ancient inheritances which his Fore-fathers held in France: and to aduance his hopes, he had his mother Queene Isabel, wife to the Earle of March in those parts,) an earnest sollicitor. Peter Duke of Britaine was the principall man who tooke offence that himselfe had not a chiefe hand in directing the young King Lewis; but his prudent mother Queene Blanch, * weakned his partie, by drawing his brother Robert Earle of Dreux from him; and albeit the Duke had repayred the breach, by affinitie with the Earle of Champain, (one of the twelue Peeres of that Realme, to whom the Duke married the Ladie Blanda his daughter and heire,) yet was the Earle driuen by a short warre to continue quiet. The Duke heereupon casts himselfe vpon King Henrie; Sed sera auxilia Anglica; the English aides come slowly saith Æmilius. These and the like inducements mooued the King to send Walter Archbishop of Yorke, with others, to the chiefe Men of Normandie, Anjou, and Poictou, that by large promises they might procure them to acknowledge Henrie for their King, or by partakings, facilitate their reduction to the English Soueraigntie; who accordingly prosecuted their employment.

(23) These opportunities for that designe, moued the King to be-thinke how to gather money, to furnish so chargefull an enterprize; whereby while he sought to prouide to recouer that which was lost, hee ministreth occasion to hazard that which he had. The onely great man in Court was now Hubert de Burgo: For the King protesting himselfe of age to gouerne without a Tutor or Protector, did principally conferre with him about all his most weightie affaires. Hence grew more enuy against Hubert, and perill to the King. From * the Londoners, (besides the graunted aydes of a fifteenth, which all degrees were subject vnto) hee wrung fiue thousand Markes, for that they had, (as was alleaged) to his prejudice, giuen Lewis the like summe. In the Parliament at Oxford, by aduice of Hubert his Lord Chiefe Iustice, he reuokes the Charters of Liberties, which now for about two yeeres had beene practised through the Realme: pretending, that at the time of their Grant the King was vnder age, and had then no liberty either of his person or Signature; though otherwise, the royall power of the English Monarchie neuer pleads pupillage or minoritie. It serued the turne for the time, and all men were faine to pay what Huberts * pleasure was to assesse, for obtaining the new Seale. The fortune of such Arts, whereby they were wont to fill Princes Treasuries, was not alwaies without repentance to the Authors, and Authorisers. The Clergy was compelled, (vnder paine of Papall Censures) to pay the Fifteenth, not only for their temporal goods, but also for their Ecclesiasticall; and yet in the end, (after so much tossing of the People,) the Kings Ambassadours returne out of France, without hauing effected that which they went about, so that the whole enterprize quailed. For Queene Blanch by sweete and prudent courses, so preuailed among the factious, that there was left no place for Henrie to take sure hold vpon. The Duke of Britaine, (who expected the English succours not till the Spring,) was so neerely prest, and almost oppreast, with a Winter warre, that he thought himselfe beholding to his brother

(24) The euill will which the other great Lords ſecretly harboured againſt Hubert, (whoſe Enuy the Kings fauour in * creating him Earle of Kent had lately encreaſed,) now openly diſcouered it ſelfe, vpon this occaſion. Richard Earle of Cornwall, the Kings brother, (lately returned with honour out of Gaſcoigne,) had ſeized into his hands a certaine Manour, then in the tenure of one Waleran a Dutch-Gentleman, (to whom King Iohn, for his good ſeruices had formerly giuen it,) which he alleaged was parcell of his Earledome of Cornwall. The King hereupon directs his letters to his brother, commanding him to come immediately, and ſhew a reaſon of his fact. He doth ſo, and without any pleaders helpe defended, as juſt, the ſeiſure which he had made, concluding, among other words, that hee was ready to ſtand to the judgement of the Kings Court, and Peeres of the realme. When the King, and the chiefe Iuſtitiar heard him name the Peeres of the Realme, they (ſuſpecting his bent that way) were exceedingly offended; and (ſaid the King) either reſtore the Manour to Waleran, or thou ſhalt depart out of the Kingdome, neuer to returne: at which peremptory ſentence, the Earle boldly (but too raſhly) anſwered; that he neither would giue his right to Waleran, nor without the judgement of the Peeres depart the realme. The * eatle in this heate returnes to his lodging; thence (vpon ſurmiſe that Hubert had perſwaded the King to lay hold on him) he poſts to Marlebourgh, where findeing William Marſhall the young Earle of Pembroke, hee enters into a faſt confederacy, ratified by oath; and Ranulf Earle of Cheſter is eaſily drawne to make another. Letters thence flying about to all their friends, at Stamford there aſſembled vnto them, the Earles of Glouceſter, of Warrenn, of Hereford, of Warwicke, Earle Ferrars, many Barons, and an huge multitude of armed men. Their ſtrengthes being in likelihood able to beare out their darings, they addreſſe a bold meſſage to the King, by which they require him in lofty Phraſe, to make preſent amends to his brother for the wrong hee had done; the fault whereof they imputed not to him, but to the chiefe Iuſtitiar: and that if he did not without delay reſtore the Charters of Liberties, which hee had cancelled at Oxford, they would driue him by dint of ſword to giue them therein competent ſatisfaction. The King ſeeing it no ſafe time to deny their requeſts, appoints to meet at Northampton in Auguſt next; where the Earle of Cornwall (vpon his Aſſociates reſolute demaund of the King) had large amends of any injury ſuſtained, his Patrimony being augmented with large acceſſions. The moderation and equanimity of the King, (terrified by his Fathers example) peaceably finiſhed this contention, (the matter of the Charters being for the time huſht, as ſeemeth) which might otherwiſe haue coſt many thouſand liues, and haue hazarded the ruine both of King and Kingdome.

(25) That daunger was not a little augmented by the inſurrections of the Welſh. The King had giuen the Caſtle of Mountgomery to his moſt truſty Counſellor Hubert de Burgo; the Garriſon of which place, iſſuing out, meant to ſtocke vp the Trees, and ſhrubbes, which grew neere vpon an high-way leading through a great wood of * fiue leagues long, that trauailers (ordinarily there ſpoyled) might paſſe more ſafely. The Welſh not ſuffering that waſte, violently aſſayled the worke-men, and not without ſlaughter on both ſides, draue them into the Caſtle; which drew the King (who euen in little matters vſed to make one,) to come thither in perſon, who, with a competent ſtrength, giues not ouer, till hee had with fire, and other force, conſumed the whole Forreſt. From whence hee pierceth farther into Wales, and conſumes with fire a place called * Cridia; where whiles the King is building a Caſtle to bridle them; * Lewelin drew thither his forces, where many were ſlaine on both ſides, and a man of ſpeciall worth William de * Brauſia, (or de Bruſe) by the Welſh intercepted, as he went to forrage in the Countrey; * many great perſons there in the Kings Armie being ſecretly confederated with Lewelin. By which treacherous practiſe, victuals grew ſo ſcarce, that the King was compelled to yeeld to a very diſhonourable peace, the conditions whereof were: that the King ſhould raze to the ground the new Fort now almoſt finiſhed; that * William de Bruce ſhould ſtill remaine Priſoner till the Welſh thought good; that Lewelin ſhould giue the King toward his expenſes three thouſand Markes.

(26) Theſe home-bred garboyles thus appeaſed; whereas Ambaſſadours had formerly repayred to the King out of Gaſcoigne, Poictou, and Normandie, to offer him their ſeruices for recouery of thoſe his inheritances, if himſelfe would come in perſon with a royall Army, he about Michaelmas is now ready at Portſmouth for the exploit; whither all his Nobles were come with ſo great a multitude, not onely out of England, but out of Ireland, Wales, and Galloway, as none of his Anceſtors euer had. Many were the motiues which encouraged the King to this attempt, but none greater then the buſie workings of Queen Dowager his mother. Lewis king of France had created his brother Alfonſe Duke of Poictou, commaunding the Lords of that Countrey to doe their Homages to him; one of theſe was Hugh Earle of March, now husband to Queene Iſabel, who becauſe ſhee had once beene the Wife of a King, and now the Mother, diſdayned that euen her preſent husband, though but an Earle, ſhould doe homage to a Subject, and thereby her ſelfe, (bearing the ſtile of a Queene,) ſeeme inferiour to the Lady Ioan, Wife of Duke Alfonſe. The Earle was heereupon drawne to a refuſall of Homage; and the like ſpirit ſhee had breathed into the hearts of the princely family of Luſignian, whoſe Anceſtors had bin Kings of Ieruſalem and Cyprus. Nor thus contented to haue plotted a party, for her Sonne among the French, ſhee is charged to haue ſought by poyſon to make riddance of Lewis himſelfe, and that her Agents for that purpoſe were diſcouered, and executed. But Æmilius ſhall pardon vs, if we herein credit not his judgement, as alſo in thinking her the Authour of ſuborning Aſſaſines to murther the King; for that wee finde him ſingular therein, the * receyued opinion being, that they were ſent vnder-hand by the Sarazens out of Aſia, to take away the daunger which they fore-ſaw was comming, in regard King Lewis was ſo deuoutly addicted to Chriſtian pietie, and the hatred of Mahomets Infidelity. There were alſo at the ſame time great Diuiſions among the French Nobility; but the Engliſh, (ſaith Æmilius himſelfe) wrought not by treachery, but after the manner of faire warre, which they firſt by defiance denounced, and then did openly proſecute with ſword in hand.

Which enraged the King ſo farre, that turning himſelfe to Earle Hubert, (vpon whom hee charged the blame,) he called him ranke olde Traytor, affirming, that that hee had of purpoſe beene ſlacke herein, as in other things, in regard of fiue thouſand Marks, with which the Queen Dowager of France had (as he ſaid) embribed him, and withall ranne at him in great furie with his drawne ſword, but Ranulph Earle of Cheſter and others ſtept betweene, and ſaued the King from ſo foule a blemiſh, who ſoone after receiued him into grace againe. But that aſſembly was diſperſed by the arriuall of a * great man out of Britaine; a principall confederate with the Engliſh againſt Lewis, who ſhewed the vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, and other reaſons; and the enterprize thereupon adiourned to the Spring. So after Easter hee tranſports from Portſmouth with a full Armie into Britaine. The * ſame day in which he ſet ſaile from England, himſelfe did in perſon viſite the poore and feeble, and dealt large Almes, not refuſing to kiſſe the ſicke and leprous. The ſucceſſe of this voyage is ſo diuerſly reported, that without preiudice to an obſeruant Reader, it might bee all left out. Much certainely was not done. The King of Englands purpoſe * was to haue marched through Britaine (where many receiued him) into Poictou; and as * ſome write hee did ſo, and tooke homage in Gaſcoigne. To empeach this paſſage, the King of France lay with a great Armie at Angiers, and the King of England at Nants in Britaine, expecting the repaire of more force. Fulk Paganel a noble Norman, with about * ſixty valiant Knights perſwaded the King of England, it was eaſie for him to reduce Normandy to his obedience; but Hubert de Burgo diuerted the King from acceptance of that enterprize. The Normans therefore made an ill iourney and an vnlucky, for * they preuailed not with King Henry, and for their conſpiracy were diſſeiſed at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by loſſe in battle (wherein, if any battle were at all, ſome ſay the * French had the better, taking about foure thouſand of the Engliſh,) or otherwiſe, this is agreed on, that after the waſte of infinit Treaſures, and the great diminution of his numbers, the King of England returned * without accompliſhment of his purpoſe; leauing for the defence of Britaine, the three great Earles of Cheſter, Pembroke and Aumarl, with forces anſwerable.

(28) It is not vnlikely that the dangerous rebellion of the Iriſh, haſtned his returne; for the King of Connaught and his Iriſh, ſeeing the King and the Earle of Pembroke (who as Heire to the great Strangbow had goodly poſſeſſions in thoſe parts) wholly embuſied in the enterpriſe of Britaine, had inuaded the Kings people, with a purpoſe and hope, vtterly to expell and amoue our Nation from among them: but their deuiſes proued miſchieuous to themſelues, that rebellious King himſelfe being taken priſoner, not without the loſſe of many thouſands of the Iriſh. The Welſh alſo ſoone after brake out againe, whoſe Prince Lewelin, (in reuenge of thoſe Welſhmens heads, which Hubert de Burgo had cruelly cauſed to bee ſtrucken off in cold bloud, and preſented to the King,) had burnt certaine Churches and Gentlewomen in them; for which, at * Oxford in the preſence of the King, all the Nobility, and Clergy, he was ſolemnly excommunicated; and the King there gathering a great Army, in perſon went to repreſſe the Welſh, though not without loſſe.

(29) Another Garboyle thereafter no leſſe diſturbed the whole land, the * Inſolency of the Romans (who were charged to haue wrought innumerable confuſions and infinite grieuances to the King, his Kingdome, Peeres and People) ſtirring vp multitudes through the Land, by a common conſent, to ſeeke by force to ſhake off the importable yoke of their oppreſſions. It was alleadged by theſe reformers, * that they had vnder-hand the kings Letters Patents, the Lord Chiefe Iuſtices aſſent, the Biſhop of Londons countenance, and the Sheriffes aide in ſundry Shires, whereby the armed troupes took heart euery where, violently to ſeize on the Romans Corne, and their other wealth; which booties they imployed to * good purpoſes, and for reliefe of the poore, the Romans the while hiding their heades, for feare of looſing them. And though the King, on the Popes complaint thereof, ſeemed to miſlike the outrage, yet had the King himſelfe no leſſe cauſe to bee mooued with the inſolency of the Pope, then were his ſubiects of thoſe Popelings. For that very time the See of Canterbury being voyd, Ralph Neuill Biſhop of Norwich was elected by the Monkes, and gladly approued by the King, whoſe * moſt faithfull Chancelour hee was, an vnſhaken pillar of truth, doing right to all without delayes, eſpecially to the poore, without declining to the right hand or the left. But the Pope being told he was a Royaliſt, and one that would ioine with the King and whole kingdome (who now all ſtrugled to ſhake off the Popes ſeruitude,) and would to the death ſticke to that law, and thoſe Appeales, which Stephen Langton ſolemnly before the Altar in Saint Pauls Church vrged againſt king Iohns ſubmiſſion to the See of Rome; his Election (as being a perſon very dangerous) was preſently pronounced voyd. Whereupon the Monkes choſe a ſecond, and him the Pope miſliked; for being too olde, and ſoft ſpirited, then a third was elected, a man of eminent learning, a Student in the Vniuerſity of Oxford, and him alſo the Pope reiected; neuer reſting till they had choſen Edmund of Abington, a man more pleaſing to the Romane palate. But the King ſeeing the Great Emperour Fredericke, euen this very time whiles hee was winning the kingdome of Ieruſalem from Infidels, ſo Turkiſhly in his abſence depoſed from his owne Empire by the Pope; vpon a priuate ſpleene; no maruaile, if in this his vnripe age, and diſtracted gouernment, he feared to draw on himſelfe by any oppoſition, ſo mercileſſe an enemy. So that for the time theſe indignities were winked at in theſe parts: in France alſo by the wiſedome of * Queene Blanch, and mediation of the Archbiſhop of Reims, and Philip Earle of Bollein of one part, and the Earles of Britaine and Cheſter on the other, a three yeares ceſſation from mutuall hoſtilities was ratified by oath, betweene the French and Engliſh.

(30) Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, Chiefe Iuſticiar of England, hauing with few rubbes hitherto, enioyed the moſt inward loue and fauour aſwell of this King, as of King Iohn, ſeemes now to haue run the Stage of his beſt fortunes. For the King (vpon occaſion of ſuch inrodes and ſpoyles, as the Prince Lewelin continually made in the Marches of Wales) being aduertiſed by Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and certaine other of the Councell, once for all to giue an end to thoſe braues and inſolencies of the Welſh, complained; that he was not able, in regard of his wants; ſaying, that his Treaſurers told him, all the rents of his Exchequer would doe no more then ſcarce maintaine apparell, houſhold and ordinary Almes-deeds. This was not vnknowne to the Biſhop, and the reſt of that faction, who watched this opportunity of purpoſe to lift the Earle of Kent out of fauour: wherefore they boldly anſwered the King: that if he were poore he might thanke himſelfe, who gaue away to others ſuch Honours, Cuſtodies, and Dignities, as were vacant, alienating them from his eſtate; that he was onely to be called a King in name, rather then for any riches which he had; that his Anceſtors, magnificent Princes, abounding in all ſorts of worldly glorie, and wealth, heaped to themſelues ineſtimable treaſures, out of no other meanes, but the Rents and Profits of the Kingdome.

(31) The King ſtung with this iuſt reprehenſion, beganne (by their inſtructions) to call the Sheriffes of Shires, Baylifes, and other his Officers to a ſtrait account, for all ſuch receits, as appertained to the Exchequer, thruſting ſome out of their places, and wringing out of all their full * ſpunges, ſtore of coyne, till hee ſatisfied himſelfe both for the arrerages and intereſt. and alſo put him from his place, into which (by the Biſhop of Wincheſters ſuggeſtion, who now predominated in Court) hee ſubſtituted Peter de Oriuail a * Poictouine, the Biſhops * Nephew or Sonne, if Paris ſay true; and ſo, ſaith hee, The Kings coffers otherwiſe empty and leane, were by theſe meanes ſtuffed againe, though not to their full ſurfet. For theſe were but preparatiues to a farther ſcrutinie and ranſacke, intended againſt the Earle of Kent, whom (vpon the * Biſhops ſuggeſtion) the King remooued from the * Proto-Iuſtitiariſhip (or high office of his Chiefe Iuſtice) and put in his place Sir Stephen Segraue, a Knight onely in name. Then is a ſtrict and captious account demaunded of the Earle of Kent, for all ſuch things as hee was in any ſort chargeable with; as 1. For ſuch receipts or debts, as were due to King Iohn, or to this King Henry himſelfe: 2. For the meane profits of ſuch lands, as the King was ſeiſed of, from the day of the death of the firſt great William, Earle of Pembroke, his Iuſtitiar and Marſhall, whether thoſe lands were in England, Wales, Ireland, or Poictou: 3. For ſuch Liberties or free Cuſtomes which the King had in Forreſts, Warrens, Counties, and elſewhere, and how they were kept or alienated: 4. For ſuch things as the King loſt by Huberts negligence: 5. For the wrongs and dammages offered to the Romane, and Italian Clerkes, and to the Popes Nuncios, againſt the Kings will, by authority of Hubert, who would take no order to correct the miſ-doers, as by vertue and nature of his place hee was obliged: 6. For the many eſcuages comming by Carrucages, gifts and preſents, or for the rents of Cuſtodies belonging to the Crowne.

(32) To all which heads, the Earle anſwered, that hee had the Charter of the Kings Father, by which he was freed from giuing any account either for things paſſed, or to come, and that he had giuen ſuch proofe of his fidelity vnto King Iohn, as hee would not endure to heare him make an account. Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter replyed hereunto, that ſuch a Charter after the death of King Iohn had no force, and therefore the Fathers Charter, & graunt of Priuiledge, was no reaſon why he ſhould not ſtand accountant to the ſon. This defence for mony dangers in this ſort trauerſed or auoided, they laboured to draw him in for his head, by charging him with ſundry Articles ſounding treaſonable; as 1. That Hubert had diſſwaded the Duke of Auſtria from matching his Daughter with the King, who ſought it; 2. that he had hindred the King from entring vpon forrain lands to him belonging, whereby the King, Peeres, and People conſumed their Treaſures vainely: 3. that hee had enticed the Daughter of the King of Scots (whom King Iohn had entruſted to his cuſtody, meaning himſelfe to marry her) and traiterouſly defiled the noble young Lady, whom he married in hope to be King of Scotland in her right, if ſhee ſuruiued her Brother: 4. that he had ſtolne out of his Iewel-houſe a precious ſtone of wonderfull value, whoſe vertue was to make him who had it, inuincible in Battle, and that hee gaue that ſtone to Lewelin Prince of Wales, the Kings enemy: 5. that he by his letters had cauſed Lewelin to hang William de Breuſe.

(33) The Earle much perplexed with theſe accuſations (whether true or falſe) could hardly obtaine a ſhort reſpite to make his anſwere: Thus that Hubert (ſay the * Monkes) who for loue of the King, and defence of the Kingdome, had prouoked the hatred of all the great Lords, now being forſaken of the king, is left ſole & ſolitary, without friends or comfort: Onely Luke Archbiſhop of Dublin, neuer forſooke him, but with prayers and teares beſought the King on his behalfe, but could not be heard againſt ſo great oppoſites, on ſo great pretenſes. When the cry was thus vp, and that the world ſaw it was no ſuperficiall diſpleaſure, into which the Earle was falne with the mutable King, there riſe forth many accuſations (ſauouring of much malignity) round about, vpon hope to oppreſſe and bury Hubert vnder them for euer; as, 1. that he had poiſoned the two noble Earles of Saliſbury and Pembroke; 2. that he had alſo procured Falcaſius de Brent, and Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury to be made away; 3. that by Sorceries and Enchantments, he had drawne the King to fauour him aboue all other; 4. that in the victory gotten againſt the French by Sea, he forceably tooke many Priſoners from the Kings Sailers, and made his benefit of their ranſomes, contrary to right, and that he had ſpoiled and diſinherited many; 5. that he had without triall vniuſtly put to death Conſtantine, for which exceſſe the Citizens of London required iuſtice againſt the ſaid Hubert. The King hereupon makes Proclamation through the Citie, that all ſuch as could charge Hubert with any wrong, ſhould repaire to Court, and there receiue immediate redreſſe. This ſtrange courſe of proceeding did ſo appale and terrifie the Earle, that he forthwith fled to the Priory Church of Merton in Surrey, where among the Chanons, he ſheltered his head for a time.

(34) The King with his Prelates and Peeres meeting at Lambeth, at the * day appointed for Huberts anſwere, hee (being made to beleeue that the King would put him to a moſt fowle death) durſt not appeare, or peepe foorth of his ſacred refuge. The Londoners were aſſembled in Armes (by the Kings commaund) to the number of about twenty thouſand, vnder banners diſplayed, to dragge the Earle out of Sanctuary: but vpon the Earle of Cheſters wiſer Counſell, the prey was taken out of the hands of a bloudy multitude (who mortally hated him for Conſtantines death) and they returned againe to their City. The Archbiſhop of Dublin ſtill performing the office of a true friend, ouer-ſlips not this occaſion, and by his importunity obtained day for Hubert, till about Twelfe-tide then next enſuing, and the King for his aſſurance, during the Interim, giues him letters Patents. Hubert thinking himſelfe ſecure for the preſent, is now vpon his way toward his wife at the Abbey of Saint Edmund in Suffolke, but his enemies ſo preuailed by their ſuggeſtions, that Sir Godfrey de Crancumb Knight, with three hundred armed men, was ſent to apprehend the Earle in Eſſex. Hee hauing intelligence of their approach, fledde into a Chappell at * Brentwood, which adioyned to his lodging; from whence thoſe rough Souldiers haled him (hee holding in one * hand a Crucifix, and in the other the Sacrament) and ſent for a Smith to make for him ſhackles of yron. But when the Smith vnderſtood, that it was for Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent, hee refuſed, vttering ſuch words (if Mathew Paris doe not Poetize) as did well ſhew that honourable thoughts are ſometimes found in the hearts of men, whoſe fortunes are farre from honour; for hauing firſt drawne a deepe ſigh, he ſaid; * Doe with me what yee pleaſe, and God haue mercy on my ſoule; but as ſure as the Lord liues, I will neuer make yron ſhackles for him, but will rather die the worſt death that is. For is not this that moſt loyall and couragious Hubert, who ſo often hath preſerued England from being deſtroyed by ſtrangers, & reſtored England to England? Hee who faithfully and conſtantly ſerued his Soueraigne Lord King Iohn in Gaſcoigne, Normandy, and elſewhere, that hee was compelled to eate the fleſh of Horſes, whoſe high courage euen Enemies admired? he, that ſo long defended Douer Caſtle, the Key of England, againſt all the exquiſite ſieges of the French, and by vanquiſhing them at Sea, brought ſafety to the Kingdome? What need I rehearſe his excellent doings at Lincolne, and Bedford? Let God be iudge betweene him and you, for vſing him ſo vniuſtly and inhumanely, repaying good with euill, nay, requiting his moſt excellent deſerts with the worſt recompenſe that can bee. But Sir Godfrey, and his blacke band, regarded not ſuch ſpeeches, but otherwiſe binding the Earle hard, they ſet him on horſe-backe, and ſo conuayed him to the Tower of London.

(35) This breach of Sanctuary being made knowne to Roger Bishop of London (whose Diocesse it was) he confidently tells the King, that if the Earle were not restored to the Chappell, hee would excommunicate all the Authours of that out-rage. The Earle is accordingly restored: but the Sheriffes of Essex and Hertford, at the Kings commandement, with the powers of their Counties, besiege the Chappell so long, that at last (they hauing cast a Trench about it, that none might goe in or out) the Earle was compelled to come forth and render himselfe, bearing all things with an equall minde, as one that had a cleare conscience before God, which he professed to haue. While the Chappell was thus beset round, the Kings indignation was so violent, that hee forbad all men once to make mention of Hubert in his hearing. No maruaile then if it be said, that the Princes indignation is death. The Archbishop of Dublin neuertheless was not deiected, but with prayers and teares besought the King, who remained as yet inexorable, Huberts enemies possessing his soule and senses. Hubert therefore is againe imprisoned in the Tower. There was no sacrifice as it seemes could appease the Kings ire, but that of the Earles Hoord of Gold, and other riches, which the Knights Templars had in their custody vpon trust, & without Huberts consent refused to deliuer. Hubert therefore willingly yeelds; which when the Depositaries did giue vp, the value seemed incredible. This hoording perhaps was Huberts crime, whereof being thus purged, he had hope to recouer out of these deadly pangs and convulsions of fortune, and himselfe to be made capable of curing. Well, the King obtaines this precious booty, but his enemies would haue his bloud also; saying, sith he was conuicted of theft and fraud, it was meet he should die a most shamefull death. It seemes, they thought, that the very finding of so much treasure was a conuiction of fraud in the getting, and that the King must be interpreted to haue lost, whatsoeuer the Earle had gained. But the displeasure of the King was mollified with this golden balme, for he answered them thus; Hubert from his childhood hath (as I haue heard) faithfully enough serued my vncle King Richard, & my Father King Iohn, and if he haue done ill towards me, he shall neuer therefore die an euill death. For I had rather be reputed a foolish or a negligent King, then a cruell Tyrant, or a bloudy man toward him, who hath long serued me and mine ancestors; nor will I weigh more his euill deeds, which are not as yet manifest, nor proued true, then all his good deeds, which are plainely knowne to the Realme, and to vs all. Hereupon Hubert had all such lands granted vnto him, as either King Iohn had giuen, or himselfe had purchased. There vndertooke for him to the King (as sureties) the Earles of Cornwall, and Warrenn, Marshall, and Ferrars, and himselfe was committed to the Castle of Deuises*, there to abide in free Prison, vnder the Custody of foure Knights, belonging each of them to one of these foure Earles. (36) The King being naturally, as it seemes, addicted to repose himselfe vpon some one mans counsell, was now wholly swayde by Peter de Rupibus Bishop of Winchester, who had therfore wrought the Earle out of grace, that hee might soly raigne, and predominate in the gentle King. Which the better to effect, the Bishop procures him to displace the * English Officers, and in their roomes to surrogate Poictouines and Britons; who comming ouer to the number of about two thousand, hee stuffes his Castles with them; and (in briefe) did as it were wholy entrust himselfe, his treasures, strengths, and the Realme to them. So that * Iudgements were committed to the vniust, Lawes to the Out-lawes, Peace to Wranglers, and Iustice to wrong-doers. Such as would haue prayed redresse for these abuses, were interrupted, and put off by the Bishop of Winchester. Among them who were remoued from their places in Court, was one Sir William de Redune a Knight, and Deputy Marshall to Richard Earle of Pembroke. This was to the Earle very displeasant, which ioyned with a consideration of the publique cause and danger, he associates vnto him certain of the great Lords (as was the fashion of those Lording times, vpon euery discontent,) and in the Company of them aduanceth confidently to the King, whom in the hearing of many he reproueth; for that hee had, through sinister aduise, called in the Poictouins, to the oppression of the Realme, of his naturall subiects, of their Lawes and Liberties: humbly therfore he beseecheth him that he would speedily reforme such abuses, which threatned the imminent subuersion both of the Crowne and Kingdome: which if he did not, himselfe and other Lords, would so long with-draw their attendance, as he entertained Strangers. The Bishop hereunto makes answere; That the King might well and lawfully call in what Strangers himselfe thought good, for the defence of the Crowne and Realme, and such, and so many of them, as might be able to compell his proud and rebellious people to due obedience. When the Oracle would speake no otherwise, they departed from Court greatly discontented; firmely promising one to the other, that in such a cause, which did so touch them all, they would like men stand together while any breath was in their bodies.

The King by aduancing strangers discontents his Nobles.

The English Peeres confederate against the strangers.

(37) Those who were now most potent about the King, nothing sorry for the discontentment of so great a Peere as the Earle Marshall, but counting it a part of their strengthes, to vse the regall power toward the weakning of the English, nourish in the King his auersion. The mindes of men sufficiently inclining of themselues, to doubt the worst vpon such diuisions, had their feare increased by sundry prodigies of strange thunders and raines, but especially of foure red Parhelions (or resemblances of the Sunne) besides the Sunne it selfe, (appearing about the parts of Hereford and Worcester) from morning till night in the Skies: and indeed much trouble immediately ensued aswell in England as Wales, & Ireland. The Poictouins, and other Strangers thus bearing the sway, so as the Kings person went guarded with troupes of such, the Earles and Barons being by the Kings commaund summoned to another Parliament at Oxford, refused to come. While the King was there, one * Robert Bacon, who vsed there to preach before the King and Prelates, freely tolde him, that if he did not remoue from him Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Peter de Riuallis, he could neuer be in quiet. The King did hereupon a little come to himselfe, and Roger Bacon a Clergy-man also of a pleasant wit, did second Roberts aduise, telling the King that * Petræ and Rupes were most dangerous things at Sea, alluding to the Bishops name, Petrus de Rupibus. The King therefore (as hee had the happinesse in his mutability, to change for his more security) taking that good aduise of Schollers, which hee would not of his Peeres, summons a Parliament to be holden at * Westminster, giuing the world to know withall, that his purpose was to amend by their aduice, whatsoeuer ought to be amended.

(39) This Rebellion had not many great names in it, but tooke ſtrength rather by weight then number: the knowne Actors were the Earle Marſhall, the Lord Gilbert Baſſet, and many other of the inferiour Nobles. The Biſhops Arts had pluckt from him, the Kings Brother, and the two Earles of Cheſter and Lincolne, (who diſhonourably ſold their loue * for a thouſand Markes,) and otherwiſe, as it ſeemed, ſecured the reſt: neuertheleſſe, theſe may well bee thought, not to haue borne any euill will to their now-forſaken confederate, the Earle Marſhall, who tooke himſelfe to handle the common cauſe; certainely hee handled his owne ſafety but ill, as the euent ſhall demonſtrate. The Earle hearing theſe things, contracts ſtrict amity with Lewelin Prince of Wales; whoſe powers thus knit together, by aduantages of the Mountaines, were able to counterpoize any ordinary inuaſion. To the Kings aide, Baldwin de Giſnes with many Souldiers came out of Flaunders. The King now at Hereford in the midſt of his Forces, ſends from thence (by Wincheſters counſell) the Biſhop of Saint Dauids, to defie the Earle Marſhall; how farre ſoeuer this word defie extends it ſelfe, ſure it ſeemes that the Earle hereupon vnderſtood himſelfe diſcharged of that obligation, by which hee was tyed vnto the King, and freed to make his defence. The King notwithſtanding after ſome ſmall attempts, and better conſiderations, did promiſe and aſſume, that by aduiſe of his Councell *all that was amiſſe ſhould (at a * day appointed) be rectified and amended*. About which time, Hubert de Burgo, hauing intelligence that the Biſhop of Wincheſter (who was a Poictouine) * plotted his death, eſcaped out of the Caſtle of Deuiſes (where he was priſoner) to a neighbour Church, but was haled from thence by the Caſtle-Keepers. (40) The King, at the day and place appointed, holds his great Councell or conference with the Lords; but nothing followed for the peace of the Realme; it was not an ordinary paſſage of ſpeech, which hapned there betweene the Lords, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter. For, when the Engliſh Biſhops and Barons humbly beſought the King, for the honour of Almighty God to take into grace his naturall Subiects, whom (without any triall by their Peeres) hee called Traitors: the Biſhop (offended it ſeemes, at Peeres) takes the words out of the Kings mouth, and anſweres; That there are not Peeres in England, as in the Realme of France, and that therefore the King of England, by ſuch Iuſticiars as himſelfe pleaſeth to ordaine, may baniſh offenders out of the Realme, and by iudiciall proceſſe condemne them. The Engliſh Biſhops reliſhed his ſpeech ſo harſhly, that with one voyce they threatned to excommunicate and accurſe by name the Kings principall wicked Counſellors; but Wincheſter appealed; then they accurſed all ſuch as alienated the heart of the King from his naturall ſubiects, and all others that perturbed the peace of the Realme.

(41) The Earle Marſhall, this while had by force reſumed a Caſtle, which he had a little before ſurrendred to the King, which ſtirred the King to gather his forces at Gloceſter, and thence to aduance towards Wales. But the Earle had politickly barred the Country of all Prouiſions for man and beaſt, that the King was faine to ſtrike aſide to Groſmont Caſtle; where the Earle, with his Confederats and the * power of Wales, ſo awaited their time, that aſſailing the Kings Campe vnawares, there were taken about fiue hundreth Horſe, with the Sumpters, riches, and carriages of the Armie; vpon which loſſe (his men alſo greatly ſcattered) the King leauing * two noble Gentlemen with the Poictouines, to make good the Marches againſt the Welſh, returned more empty and inglorious then before. The Earle found them worke, whom the King had left behinde; and (as hee was a man of no leſſe courage then deepe wit,) whereas Baldwin de Giſnes (the valiant Flemiſh Knight) with a thouſand Horſemen, thought to haue ſurprized him, who hauing but a tenth part of that number, came to view the Caſtle of Monmouth; the Earle alone defended himſelfe againſt twelue of his enemies; and when his Horſe was cowardly ſlaine by them, he pitcht one of them by the legge out of the Saddle, and leapt into it himſelfe, neuer giuing ground till his Army came to the reſcue, and obtained a faire victory, with the ſlaughter and captiuation of many Poictouines, and others. His other exployts in and about Wales, were not few nor vnfortunate; if it were not onely in this, (as what indeed could be more grieuous or vnglorious to a noble minde?) for that his Soueraigne was vpon the contrary ſide.

The * King then at Gloſter for want of ſufficient Forces, departed thence (greatly grieued) to Wincheſter, abandoning thoſe other parts as it were to waſt and ruine. It therefore ſeemes, that he was not growne ſtronger or richer, by the diſplacing of Hubert Earle of Kent, and the reſt, and by taking new into their roomes, who commonly bite and ſucke hard till they haue glutted themſelues, (if at leaſtwiſe there be any ſatiety in auarice) whereas the olde officers, hauing prouided in a ſort for the maine chance, haue the leſſe reaſon to be grieuous.

The Earle Marſhall had in Ireland all the ample Patrimonies of his Grand-father, the famous Strongbow. (45) The Kings mind therefore being ſtill exulcerated towards the Earle Marſhall, he grieuouſly charged Alexander Biſhop of Cheſter, that he had too much familiarity with the Earle, affirming that they ſought to thruſt him from his throne; the Biſhop to cleare himſelfe from ſo hainous a ſcandall, put on his Epiſcopall habite, and ſolemnly pronounceth all thoſe accurſt, who did but imagine a wickednes of ſo fowle a nature, againſt the Maieſty or perſon of the King: and thereupon by the interceſſion of other Prelates, he was receiued into grace. The King was then at Weſtminſter; where Edmund the Archbiſhop of Canterbury elect, with other his Suffragan Biſhops, bewailing the eſtate of the kingdome, preſent themſelues before him, telling him, as his loyall Liegemen, "that the "Counſell of Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, and his Com-"plices, which now hee had, and vſed, was not ſound "nor ſafe, but cruell and perillous to himſelfe and his "*Realme. Meane-while the behauiours of the Marſhalline faction (hauing this backing at Court) grew more and more intolerable: for while the King was at Huntingdon, the Lord Gilbert Baſſet and others, ſet fire vpon Alckmundbury, a Towne belonging to Stephen de Segraue, the flames whereof were ſeene of the owner, being then with the King at Huntingdon. They alſo tooke priſoners vpon the Welſh Marches, and according to the Law of Warre (which, ſayth one, is * lawleſſe) did put them to their ranſomes.

(46) Nothing had hitherto preſerued the King more, then that he could, without great griefe forgoe any fauourites, if hee were neerely preſſed; the contrary quality whereof hath been the cauſe of finall deſolation to ſo many Princes. For albeit the choiſe of Counſellors ought to be free, yet by common intendment they ſhould be good; or howſoeuer they are, or are not, it is madneſſe to hazard a Crowne, or leeſe the loue of an whole nation, rather then to relinquiſh or diminiſh a particular dependant. The rights of amity ought neuertheleſſe to remaine inuiolable, but in ſuch diſtance, that the publike be not peruerted, nor interuerted for a priuate. The King therefore, in this poynt not vnfortunate, commanded Biſhop Peter to betake himſelfe to his reſidence at Winton, without once medling in affaires of State; but againſt Peter Riuallis his Treaſurer, he was ſo vehemēt, that he ſware, hee would plucke out his eyes, were it not for reuerence of holy Orders; commanding alſo their Poictouines to depart the Realme, neuer to ſee his face more.

(47) Then are the Archbiſhop of Canterbury with the Biſhops of Cheſter and Rocheſter ſent into Wales to pacifie things there. But the inuincible Earle Marſhall had now croſt the Seas into Ireland, to take reuenge for the ſpoyles and diſſeiſures, which his hired enemies had made in his lands there; by whoſe plots, according to that ſecret agreement, hee was finally taken, and died of a wound giuen him in the backe, as hee with admirable manhood defended himſelfe. His Body was buried in Kilkennie, (which pleaſantly-ſituated Towne, our Soueraigne King Iames erected into a City,) where himſelfe in his life had appointed, in the Oratory of the Minorites: in which Towne, as yet ſome ſmall tokens of this great name are remaining; for in the Eaſt window of the Abbey-Church of S. Iohn Baptiſt, and in the Abbey of S. Dominicke, the ancient Armories of * Marſhall, Lord of Kilkenny, are yet extant. The Patrimony of this Earle was ſhared by the Contractors, according to the purport of the Letters patents: but when the King heard of his death, hee (to the wonder of all that were by) brake forth into teares, bewailing the loſſe of ſo braue a Knight, affirming that hee had left no Peere behinde him in the Kingdome. (48) The Archbiſhop of Canterbury with the other Biſhops, repaired to the King at Glouceſter vpon their returne from Leoline Prince of Wales, who pretended hee could not conclude, till the King had receiued into grace ſuch of the baniſhed Nobility, withwhom himſelfe had beene confederated during the late diſpleaſures. The King hereupon mooued with Pittie, ſends forth his Proclamations, that all ſuch as were out-lawed or proſcribed, ſhould bee at Glouceſter vpon a certaine day, there to bee receiued into the Kings fauour againe, and to haue reſtitution of their inheritances; but leſt they might ſuſpect any euill meaſure, it was ordered that they ſhould bee in the Churches protection, and come vnder the ſafe-conduct of the Archbiſhop and the other Prelates. Thither at the time and place limited doth Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent (and lately chiefe Iuſticiar of England) repaire; vpon whom, by mediation of the Biſhops, the compaſſionate King lookes gratiouſly, receiuing him in his Armes with the kiſſe of peace; in like ſort was the Lord Gilbert Baſſet, and all others of that fellowſhip, receiued into fauour, their ſeuerall liuings and rights fully reſtored; and both Hubert and Baſſet admitted to bee of his Councell. And, that nothing might bee wanting to make the ioy vniuerſall; Gilbert, Brother to the late Earle Marſhall, had the whole Earledome conferred vpon him, with all the lands and rights thereof whereſoeuer, notwithſtanding the foreſaid treacherous conueyance; whom alſo the King made Knight at Worceſter, and deliuered into his hands

The practiſe to deſtroy the late Earle Marſhall openly read.

(49) Vpon this reconcilement, the practiſe, by which the late great Marſhall was deſtroyed, and his poſſeſſions diſmembred, came to light; the copy of the letters which had beene ſent into Ireland, being by commandement of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, openly read in the preſence of the King, the Prelates, Earles and Barons: It mooued teares in all of them; the king with an Oath affirming that he knew not the contents of the ſaid letters, though by the vrging of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Riuallis, Segraue, Paſſeleu, with other of his Councell, hee had cauſed his Seale to be put vnto them. At the ſound of Summons to make their ſeuerall appearances, the Malefactors take Sanctuary, the Biſhop and Peter de Riuallis in Wincheſter Church, Segraue in Leiceſter Abbey, Paſſeleu in the New-Temple, and others otherwhere. In the end, vpon the interceſſion of Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who piouſly endeauoured to extinguiſh all occaſions of further diſſention in the Kingdome, and vndertooke they ſhould haue a lawfull triall, the delinquents appeared at Weſtminſter before the King, *who * ſate in perſon with his Iuſticiars vpon the Bench. Peter de Riuallis* was firſt called (for the Biſhop came not,) whom the King ſhot through with an angry eye, ſaying; O thou Traitour, by thy wicked aduiſe, I was drawne to ſet my Seale to theſe treacherous letters for the deſtruction of the Earle Marſhall, the Contents whereof were to me vnknowne; and by thine and ſuch like counſell, I baniſhed my natural Subiects, and turned their minds & hearts from me. By thy bad counſell, and thy Complices, I was mooued to make warre vpon them, to my irreparable loſſe, and the diſhonour of my Realme, in which enterprize I waſted my treaſure, and loſt many worthy perſons, together with much of my royall reſpect. Therefore I exact of thee an account aſwell of my treaſure, as of the cuſtodies of Wardes, together with many other profites and eſcheats belonging to my Crowne. Peter denying none of the accuſations, but falling to the ground, thus beſought him. My Soueraigne Lord and King, I haue beene nouriſhed by you, and made rich in worldly ſubſtance, confound not your owne Creature, but at leaſt-wiſe grant me a time of deliberation, that I may render a competent reaſon for ſuch poynts as I am charged with. Thou ſhalt (ſaid the King) *bee carried to the Tower of London, there to deliberate till. The like euaſion Robert Paſſeleu had, by leauing the fault vpon Walter Biſhop of Carleil, who was aboue him in the Exchequer: and thus were theſe ciuill enormities reformed, not without reducing ſtore of Coyne to the King.

(50) As thoſe continuall turmoiles, and plagues of the Sword, much afflicted the land, ſo this was the third yeare, wherein God inflicted alſo for ſinne, the plague of Famine, whereby the poore did miſerably periſh, there being no Samaritan to pay for their harbouring, or to annoynt their wounds with the oyle of conſolation. Our Authours, to make manifeſt how odious the mercileſſe heart is in the ſight of God, relate a ſtorie of that time with proteſtation, that they doe it, leſt ſo memorable an example ſhould be in time forgotten. Certaine * poore, while as yet the Corne was greene, pluckt the eares in the common fields, to ſuſtaine their liues; whereupon the Owners call on the Prieſt, to curſe all ſuch as had ſo done: but one in their company adiured the Prieſt in the name of God to exempt his corne from the ſentence, ſaying, it pleaſed him well, that the poore driuen with famine, had taken his corn, and ſo commended that which they had left to God. The Prieſt, compelled by importunity of the reſt, was entred into the ſentence, when by a terrible interrupting tempeſt of thunder, lightning, winde, haile, and raine, all the Corne-fields about were deſolated, as if they had been troden downe with Horſe and Cartes; that no kinde of Beaſt or Fowle would feede vpon the Corne thus layd. But (as ſay our Authors out of the * Scripture) ſeeing * they who are pitteous, finde mercie, that honeſt and compaſſionate-hearted man, found all his corne and grounds (though interlaced with theirs,) altogether vntoucht and vnharmd. Whereupon (ſay they) it is more cleare then any light, that as glory to God on high is ſung of Angels, ſo there is peace on Earth to Men who are of good-will. This dearth was in * Fraunce and Gaſcoigne aſwell as in England. A Iewiſh impietie may well bee annexed to want of Chriſtian Charitie. There were brought before the King at Weſtminſter ſeauen Iewes, who circumciſed a Childe, and purpoſed (in contempt of Chriſt and Chriſtianitie) to haue crucified him in Eaſter at Norwich.

(51) Theſe now calmer times, were made more happy, by the marriage of the Emperour Fredericke with the Lady Iſabel, the King of Englands ſiſter, a beauteous young Lady, about twenty yeares of age. The meſſengers arriued in March with the Emperours letters, cloſed vnder a Seale of gold; and there were ſent to conduct her ouer, the Archbiſhop of Collein, and the Duke of Louain. The King brought her to Sandwich, with about three thouſand horſe in his traine; and being imperially furniſhed with all worldly abundance, ſhee tooke ſhipping in May, and in one dayes and one nights ſpace arriued at Antwerpe, a City of the Empire, and was euery where moſt magnificently entertained: her ſweet humility, and excellent beauty, drawing all to loue and honour her. At the ſolemnity of her * marriage were preſent three * Kings, eleauen Dukes, thirty Marqueſſes and Earles, beſides the number of great Prelates. On whether ſuperſtition, or obſeruation, of the Emperour is noted at this marriage, that hee forbare the Empreſſes company, till a certaine houre, which his Wiſards or Aſtrologers had aſſigned, and in the morning hee cauſed her to be carefully tended as a Woman with-childe, and ſent word to his Brother the King of England, that he ſhould haue a Sonne, ſo skilfull or confident hee was; and God did fauour his iudgement, for it proued ſo. This Imperiall affinity gaue a * worthy Hiſtorian occaſion heere to diſplay and emblazon the Maieſtie and glorie of the Engliſh Princes; but amongſt them all, none were higher aduanced then the Children of King Iohn, one of whoſe Sonnes was now a * King, the other afterward choſen to be an * Emperour, and one of his daughter a * Queene, this other (here mentioned) an * Empreſſe. And here doth Wendouer end his Hiſtory, to whom wee haue hitherto beene beholding for his labours, ſorry we can enioy his good company no longer.

of ſupplying with mony ſuch as wanted preſent pay. The * Popes continuall angariations and extortions, vnder colour alſo of the Turkiſh warres, kept theſe men (if men) ſtill in vſe here in England, to the * extreame beggering of infinite numbers, who were inueigled (either by perſwaſion, or craning, or commanding, or comminating, or excommunicating,) to giue way to the Popes vnſufferable extortions, all men wondering into what bottomleſſe gulfe that huge Maſſe was put, which the Popes Factors had gathered, wherewith all mens hearts were deeply wounded, for that all this vnualuable treaſure neuer was imployed to any publike vſe, or honour of the Church. Roger Biſhop of London (a learned and religious Prelate) burning with zeale of Chriſtian charity, ſeeing the numbers and miſchiefes of theſe execrable Vſurers, thus ſtill to encreaſe, firſt admoniſhed them (whom hee reputed no better then Schiſmatickes) to repent, & leaue that wicked trade of life. But when he found them deafe to all aduiſe, armed with the weapons of ſpirituall iuſtice, he openly pronounceth them accurſed, preciſely commanding them to packe out of LONDON, WHICH TILL THAT TIME KNEW NOT WHAT SVCH A PLAGVE MEANT, leaſt his flockes ſhould be infected therewith. But ſo Apoſtolicall and holy a remedy tooke not ſuch effect as it deſerued; for they ſwelling with pride and preſumption on the Popes patrociny, eaſily procured from the Court of Rome, that the olde ſickly Biſhop ſhould be peremptorily cited to appeare in the remote parts beyond the Sea, there to anſwere for that iniury which he had offered the Popes Merchants.

(53) The King, being now in the beſt ſtrength of his yeares, tooke to wife the Lady Elenor, ſecond daughter of Raimund Earle of Prouince, which hee had by the Daughter of Thomas Earle of Sauoy. A Lady about twelue or thirteene yeares of age, and altogether as beautifull and princely, as ſhee was young. Her Father, by * reaſon of warres which he had with the Citizens, of Maſilia his ſubiects (who vpon pretence they were oppreſt, ſought to driue him out of all his territories) was but a poore Prince. Neuertheleſſe it was the happineſſe of his foure Daughters (whoſe Parentage adorned with rare beautie, and faſhioned with excellently-vertuous education, made them fit Brides for any Princes in the world) that each of them had * a King to her Husband. The Eldeſt was married to Lewis the ninth King of France, Elenor to the King of England; Santia (or Cynthia) to Richard his brother king of Romans; Beatrix to Charles the French kings brother, King of Sicilia. The Nuptials were accompliſhed at * Weſtminſter; where alſo ſhee was crowned Queene, with incredible ſtate and ſplendor, the King himſelfe wearing his Crowne alſo. The Citizens of London are noted of much ſeruiceable forwardneſſe and magnificence at this royall feaſt. The Citie was adorned with Silkes, Banners, Crownes, Pals, Tapers, Lamps, and with * certaine wonders of wit, and ſtrange ſhowes; the Citizens richly attired and well mounted, met the King on horſe-backe. At the Nuptiall dinner, the Trumpets ſounding before them, they came in, carrying three hundreth and threeſcore Cups of Gold and Siluer, to ſerue the King and that noble Company with Wine, according to their duties at Coronations. The King had twice or thrice before attempted to marrie, but God ordained otherwiſe till now; and it was a match made principally after the manner of honeſt priuate perſons, for loue; and not as heads of publique bodies vſe to doe, for ſeeming worldly ſtrengths and profits. It was alſo begun and concluded without the priuity of the States. The Emperour ſoone after requeſted the King to ſend him his Brother Richard, Earle of Cornewall, to make him Generall againſt the French, whereby the Engliſh alſo might recouer their right: but the Emperour was deſired to chooſe any other; for him the States of his Realme, (which were aſſembled to conſult thereupon) would not forgoe, becauſe he was but young, and next heire to the Crowne, if the King ſhould die without children. This anſwere was giuen to the Emperours Ambaſſadours at Merton neere London; where alſo the Statutes, called of Merton, were at the ſame time enacted.

(54) The humorous Lords beganne now againe to relapſe into their wonted giddineſſe, taking it in great indignity, that the King was ſo much ruled by his wiues vncle, William de Valentia; in ſo much that the King with-drawing himſelfe into the Tower of London, thither none of the Lords would come. Vpon better aduice therefore he returnes to his Palace; where ſome great Officers, and others, were put from the Priuie Councell, and their places, not without the admiration of many. But the Biſhop of Chicheſter, choſen Lord Chancellor in the Kings minority, being required by the King to deliuer vp the Seale, refuſed; alleaging, more ſtoutly then loyally, that as he had receiued it with the publike allowance of the Parliament, ſo without the ſame aſſent hee would not reſigne it. Which thwartings of his Peeres & Prelates, incited the King (it ſeemeth) to reſume againe into his fauour ſome of thoſe his Counſellors which hee had formerly diſ-courted, as Peter de Riuallis, & Stephen de Segraue. But (whether on diſcontent hereof or no) Richard the Kings brother (whoſe ſeruice was formerly denied to the Emperour,) the Earles Marſhall, Cheſter, * Lincolne, and Sariſbury, with many other honourable Souldiers aſſumed the vow to fight in Paleſtine againſt Gods enemies, for accompliſhment whereof they departed thither * the ſecond yeere after. Meane-while the King, to ſecure himſelfe from dangers neerer home, trauailes toward Yorke, to ſettle a peace betweene himſelfe and Alexander King of Scots; who, the rather vpon Confidence of Leolines amity, (which toward the Engliſh was but * ſhadowie, and alwayes ſuſpected) demanded Northumberland. Neuertheleſſe, by the wiſedome of friends, and moderation of both the Princes, they parted in peace; the King of England being elſewhere to lay out lands to a certaine * value, leaſt he ſhould diſmember his Kingdome by forgoing ſo great and neceſſary a frontire. The Scottiſh King claimed that County from King Iohn, who by his deed enfeoffed him thereof, as in portion with his Daughter, which King Alexander had married.

(55) Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter (remoued formerly from Court by the working of the Engliſh Biſhops and Lords) being craſed and ſicke in body, returned about Michaelmas from forraine parts; ſoone after which (as if that Biſhop had brought them with him) Paris notes, there enſued great raines, and extraordinary land-flouds: Though * indeed hee was a man of great wiſedome, and dexterity in handling weightieſt affaires: he alſo built ſundry Monaſteries, and beſides other his worthy deeds, hee left his Biſhopricke ſo furniſhed at his * death (a preſident which few of his ſucceſſors haue followed) *that there was not ſo much diminiſhed of that which he found at his entrance, as the very * Cattle which ſerued to draw the plough*.

(56) The King whoſe treaſures were exhauſted with paiment of his Siſters portion (* thirty thouſand Markes to the Emperour, and otherwiſe) called a Parliament at London, where he could not obtaine any * ſupplies from the States, but vpon * confirmation of the Nationall Priuiledges of England formerly granted, and vpon acceptance of the Earles of Warren and Ferrars, and Iohn Fitz-Geoffrey into his moſt inward Counſels; whom the King (meerely enforced to ſatisfie his People) cauſed to ſweare to giue faithfull Counſell, and to forſweare all corruption or ſale of Iuſtice; and finally hee conditioneth, to relye wholly vpon his naturall Subiects for aduiſe, leauing all others. (57) There is in Mathew Paris much complaint of the State of England at this time, which by the Kings flexibility (ſaith he) was become the ordinary prey, ſometime of one ſort of ſtrangers, and ſometime of another, Poictouins, Italians, Almaines, and Prouincios. Indeed the Genius, and common humor of a Nation, is not eaſily alterable: and our Miſoxenie (or hatred to ſtrangers) was no new qualitie, for * Horace noted it before, or about, Chriſts birth: and Engliſhmen can hardly ſee when they are well to keep them ſo. But no kind of Strangers at that time more infeſted England (ſaith our * Monke) then the Romans, of which here ſwarmed three ſorts, Vſurers, which were the Popes Marchants, Italian Clerks, moſt vile & illiterate perſons, which armed with the Popes Bulls, poſſeſſed themſelues (againſt all right of Priuiledges) of ſpirituall reuenues, and if any withſtoode them, they were by the Popes owne warrant excommunicated; laſtly, the * Farmers and Proctors for the Romans, who cunningly ſcraping together whatſoeuer was of price in the Land, ſent it ouer Sea to the Maſters, who there liued in deliciouſnes on the Patrimony of him that was crucified, and in pride on other mens goods. Inſomuch, that holy men with heart-breakings, teares, and deadly * grones, profeſſed it was better for them to dye, then to ſee thoſe meſeries on their Nation and holy men. So that the daughter of Sion was become like an impudent Harlot. And as theſe Papall Engines dealt here in England, ſo did they with others * at Rome, the Gouernours of that Church not ſeeking to winne mens ſoules, but their money, oppreſſing the religious by puniſhments, vſuries, and Simonie, without any care of iuſtice & honeſty. Which made the Greeke Church at this time to fall quite away, and oppoſe it ſelfe againſt the Romane. Doubtleſſe England had no leſſe cauſe ſo to doe, then had the Greekes; but as Pope Gregory knew that his onely way to keepe England faſt, was to hold cloſe with the King; ſo the King alſo ſaw no way to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt his Barons, but by holding in with the Pope, though with ſo many vnſufferable miſchiefes. And for ſome ſuch purpoſe of the Kings, newly now arriued Cardinall Otto, the Popes Legate, greatly againſt the liking both of the Peeres, and of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who not onely reproued the King therof, as of a thing dangerous to the Kingdome, but ſoone after alſo tooke his iourney to Rome, to make ſome complaints, neither would hee ſtay, though the Legate recalled him by his authority, which euer after cauſed much hatred betwixt them. Yet ſundry good offices were at firſt performed by the Legate. The treaty of peace begun betweene the two Kings of England, and Scotland at Yorke, was againe reſumed in the ſame City, where Otto interpoſed himſelfe toward making a finall agreement, which enſued. There were alſo aſſembled, the Earles and Barons, who by the princely offices * of Alexander King of Scots, were reconciled to the King their Soueraigne, if this be the time which Boetius meanes, and not the next yeare. Otto had formerly accorded many of them among themſelues, whoſe diſagreements had emperild the State of the Realme, ſo that for a time nothing but calmneſſe and amity appeared. Yet ſoone after they ſtormed to ſee the King ſo * addicted to the will of the Romans, eſpecially the Legate, for which Richard Earle of Cornwall reproued him, as carrying himſelfe more like the Popes Penſioner then a King. Notwithſtanding the King was ſo prouident of his State, that the Legate calling his * Nationall Councell, thither came from the King, Iohn Earle of Lincolne, Iohn Fitz-Geoffrey, and William de Kele a Canon of Pauls, to forbid the Legate on the behalfe of the King and Kingdome, not to attempt any thing againſt the Crowne or royall dignitie.

(58) Simon de Montfort (afterward created Earle of Leiceſter) had now wrought himſelfe into ſuch fauour, that the King with his own hand ſecretly gaue Elienor, (widdow of the laſt Willlam Marſhall Earle of Pembroke) to him in mariage, notwithſtanding that ſhe had vowed her ſelfe a Nunne. When this was once knowne to Richard Earle of Cornwall, and the angry Lords, they all tooke ſuch ſnuffe thereat, becauſe they were not firſt conſulted with, in regard the King had promiſed to doe no weighty matter without them, that none but Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent adhered to the forſaken King. The head of this defection was the Earle of Cornwall, of whom men generally had hope, that hee would now free the Land from the miſerable oppreſſions both of Romans and other Strangers. Him therefore the Legate vndertakes, but found him ſtiffe and vntractable at firſt. For when he truely and fatherly told him: That if all the people of the land roſe againſt the King, yet hee being his owne brother ought alwaies to ſtand faſt with him againſt the whole world, & not to make himſelfe Captaine of the enemie, &c. The Earle roundly replied; * That none ought to maruaile, if he being the only Heire apparant, had a care of the Kingdomes ſtate, when there was no treaſure in the publike coffers for defence thereof, though it were enuironed with enemies: That it was moreouer wondred at, for ſomuch as the king his brother did moſt ſtand in need of helpe, and good diſcretion, that he would not take example by ſuch as were wiſe; as neither of the Emperour, who hauing married their ſiſter, retained her with him, but ſent backe all that attended her, not giuing to any of them either lands or money, although himſelfe did abound in both; nor the example of the king of France, who tooke the ſame courſe though hee married the eldeſt ſiſter of the Engliſh Queene, &c. The Legate vpon theſe and many other ſhrewde ſharpe ſpeeches, takes with him Peter Biſhop of Wincheſter, & deales with the King, who required time to anſwere; which the Lords granted, and met at London ſtrongly appointed vpon the day. There, while the quarrell hung in ſuſpenſe, Simon de Montfort had with money, faire words, and much entreatie of Mediators, reconciled himſelfe to the fierce young Earle, and ſo alſo had Iohn Earle of Lincolne, another marke of the publique enuie. This practiſe (which Earle Richard entertained without his Confederates priuity) had profitable effects; for the controlling Lords loſt thereby their Generall, and hee greatly weakened himſelfe in the opinion of the Lords and People; both which were poynts of aduantage and ſafetie for the King. But Simon feeling himſelfe as yet vpon no ſure ground, left his Wife with-childe at Kenilworth, not ceaſing, till by the fauour of the Emperours letters, and * exceſſiue bribes, (by which iuſtice was ouercome, and made captiue to the Romane auarice) he had obtained at Rome a diſpenſation for that marriage, which yet was * doubted, whether it could be lawfull, becauſe ſhee had taken the * Ring, though neither the habit of a Nunne, nor the vaile. Howſoeuer, the King did afterward ſo dainely breake with him, obiecting that Montfort had * firſt corrupted her, and hee to couer his Sifters ſhame, was content to giue her in Marriage.

of Richard late Earle Marſhall) to commit that * aſſaſſinate vpon him. This execrable wretch hauing beene a Courtier, and one of the Kings * Knights, ſuppoſing to haue found the King in his owne retiring Bed, had about mid-night gotten in at the Chamber-window; but God (in whoſe ſpeciall protection the liues of Princes are) diſappointed him, for the King was elſe-where in Bed with his Queene. Neuertheleſſe he gaue not ouer, but with naked knife in hand, fought vp and downe in ſome other Chambers. One of the Queenes * Gentle-women (ſitting late and very deuoutly at her Booke by Candle-light,) at ſight of the furious villaine, with her ſhriking noyſe wakened the Kings ſeruants, who ſtarting out of their Beds, laid hands vpon him; and afterward hee was drawne in peeces with Horſes at Couentree. And worthily: for (as * a vulgar Chronicler heereupon ſaith truely,) *in wounding and killing a Prince, the Traytor is guilty of Homicide, of Parricide, of * Chriſticide, nay of * Deicide. William de Mariſco*, who was ſaid to be the inſtigator of this Treaſon, knowing his danger, became a Pyrate, and fortified the Iſle of Lundey in Seuern, where hee did much miſchiefe, the ſituation of that little Iland being * inexpugnable. At length he was ſurpriſed therein, and ſixteene of his Complices, who all of them after conuiction were put to death at London. William to the laſt gaſpe denying his priuity to the former treaſonous attempt of killing the King. About the time of the Kings danger at Woodſtocke, the Legate was in very little better caſe at Oxford, where being at firſt honourably by the Vniuerſitie entertained in Ouſney Abbey, the pride of his Romans there proued ſo intollerable, that a troupe of the younger Students, prouoked therewith to arme themſelues, not onely ſlew the Legates owne brother, but would haue done the like with the Legate himſelfe, whom they tearmed an Vſurer, Symoniſt, Rent-raker, Money-thirſter, peruerter of the King, ſubuerter of the kingdome, enriching ſtrangers with ſpoyles of the Engliſh; but he lurking in the Belfrey, at mid-night eſcaped ouer the riuer (not without danger of drowning) and fled to the King for his protection. For which outrage, the King ſending the Earle of Warren with an armed band, * impriſoned about 30. of the offenders, and the Legate interdicted the Vniuerſity, till *all the Biſhops of England (purpoſely * meeting in a Synode) pleaded for the Vniuerſity, as beeing the ſecond of Chriſtendome*: to whoſe importunity the proud Legate would not condiſcend, vnleſſe all the Biſhops would yeeld to goe on foot with the Students from Paules-Church to the Legates houſe, (which was about a mile,) who there vngowned and vnſhod, ſhould humbly craue abſolution; which accordingly they performed.

(60) The Legate was (not long after) called home by the Pope, * vpon notice of the ſcandall daily giuen in England, by the vnſatiable auarice of the Romanes; but by the earneſt workings of the King, who feared leſt his great ones would riſe againſt him, hee was detained, as a neceſſary euill, to eſtabliſh the good of Peace. For it was in a manner taken vp for a faſhion among the Lords, to glorifie themſelues with the ſenſeleſſe multitude, by ſeditiouſly diſparaging and taxing the Kings diſcretion and gouernement, being farre too gentle and amiable for ſpirites ſo peruerſe and inſolent; which might well force his louing nature, to ſeeke kindneſſe and aduiſe among ſtrangers, ſeeing he could not haue it for any his deſerts among the home-borne. A great reaſon why (perhaps) hee did ſome few things raſhly and paſſionately enough: it being a thing forceable to diſtemper a very wiſe man, to haue ſo many imperious cenſors to obſerue his actions, and few to humble their abilities to obſequious ſeruices, all bearing themſelues rather like Tutors or Controllers, then like Subiects or Counſellors. About which time, one William an ordinary Calumniator, and accuſer of great men to the King, was for that impious practiſe condemned to die; though he ſought to peece out his daies by the helpe of new appeachments and falſe criminations; but that being diſcouered, he was hanged vpon a Gibbet in London. Now alſo the King began to ſmell out the vndirect and falſe dealing of his beloued Legate, whoſe familiar friend (Peter Saracen) being taken Captiue by the Emperour, and to pay 10000. l. Sterling for his ranſome; the ſhameleſſe Legate counſelled the King to binde himſelfe and his Crowne for that payment. Whereby the King perceiuing what toyles were layde to entrap him, (the Romanes not caring what loſſe happened to the Kingdome, ſo they might be gayners) ſwore in great rage, that it repented him he had euer admitted the Legate into the land, to diſſipate the wealth thereof. But the Biſhops of the land meeting in Councell at London, to redreſſe the oppreſſions of the Engliſh Church, tolde the Legate flatly, that the Romanes importunity had ſo long exhauſted their Church-goods, that they would no longer endure it. Theſe Engliſh repentances ſeeme ſomewhat too late; but that prouidence which the King of Scotland ſoone after vſed, was, as more tempeſtiue, ſo more commendable, when meeting the ſame Legate (for now into Scotland he is going to gather coyne) he denyed him entrance into his Kingdome, telling him, he was the firſt Legate which euer entred that Kingdome; yet by entreatie to ſaue the Legates credite, he was permitted; firſt making a declaration, that his entrance ſhould neuer goe for a Preſident of any after; whereto the Legate ſhould put his Seale at his departure; but hauing gotten what hee came for, hee ſodainly ſtole away without leaue of the King, and carried his writing with him. By all which vile and indigne vſages, a man might thinke the Church of Rome did purpoſely ſtriue to draw the hatred of all Nations againſt her; eſpecially, ſith (as wee ſhewed) the Greekes were fallen from the Romane vnion, ſo now the Church of Antioch had both excommunicated the Pope, the Church and Court of Rome, and challenged the Primacie aboue the Pope and the Romane Church, as being an ancienter See, wherein S^t. Peter firſt ſate Biſhop for ſeauen yeares; and more excellent and deare, ſith there Peter liued with loue and reuerence, whereas both hee and Saint Paul were continually perſecuted in Rome; which Church was now alſo defiled with Simonie, Vſurie, Auarice, and other hainous offences.

(61) But (doubtleſſe) it was worthy of reproofe in the King; that after ſo manifold trials of faith and conſtancy in Hubert Earle of Kent, he ſhould now againe afflict his honourable old-age with reuiuall of accuſations, when hee rather ought to haue tendred him as a Father. Among other the Articles (engines of vexation) which the King bent againſt him, theſe were three new ones, by which any reaſonable man may take a ſcantling of the reſt. 1. That Hubert had taken the money out of the barrels which were ſent for the reliefe of Rochel & Poictou, and ſtuffed them with ſand. 2. That to diſſwade a great Ladie from marriage with the King, hee had ſaid the King was a ſquint-eyde foole, a lewd man, and a kinde of Leper, deceitfull, periured, more faint-hearted then a woman, only terrible to his owne friends; and vtterly vnfit for any faire or noble Ladies company. 3. That at Woodſtocke, when the King was alone, he ruſht in with a naked knife to murther him: Which and many other accuſations the Earle did modeſtly and cleerely refute. But with the laſt, (being moſt wicked of all) he was ſo grieued, that making low obeyſance to the King, he could not forbeare to ſay, that he was neuer traitor to his father, nor to him, which by Gods grace did well appeare in the King: as if he ſhould haue ſaid, (quoth Paris) That if the Earle would haue beene a Traitor, the King had neuer obtained the Crowne. This ſeemes to haue beene a publique triall, vpon a Suit or Action of treſpaſſe, brought againſt the Earle by the King in the Kings Bench, at which triall the King himſelfe

(62) After so many mischiefes patiently brooked, at last the King, vpon receipt of Letters from the Emperour (whom as his brother in law, he was loath to offend,) commaunded Otto the Popes Legate, in regard of the great enmities betweene the Pope and Emperour, to depart out of England. There was also strait commaundement giuen to the Italian Vsurers, to leaue the most * pure earth of his Realme, (meaning that his owne people was most innocent and free from such a sinne,) but (saith * one, who durst write any thing he thought) by giuing the King money, which is too much vsed to iustifie the wicked, they for a great part remayned still, as loath to forsake such fat pastures. And the Legate himselfe also stayed so long, till the Pope by wily inducements and * forged calumniations had drawne the King, both to relinquish the Emperour his brother in law, and to suffer the Papall Excommunication to passe heere against him, and money also to be gathered to his impeachment. A briefe taste of all the Popes proceedings against this glorious Emperour, wee may take from the Nobilitie of France, who (when the Pope offered the Empire vnto Robert the French-Kings brother) in their grand Councell refused to accept it, charging the Pope with the Spirit of audacious rashnesse, for deposing the Emperour, not conuicted of any fault, and whom a Generall Councel onely ought to censure, not the Pope, to whom no credit ought to be giuen, being his Capitall enemie. For that themselues knew hee was a vertuous and victorious Emperour, and one who had in him more religion then the Pope had. Our Legate Otto (who now at length is gone) was no sooner departed, but Peter of Sauoy, the Queenes Vncle, arriued, to whom the King gaue the Earledome of Richmond, and entertained otherwise most magnificently. This and the like largesse to strangers, drew on the King much euill-will, who also in fauour of his Queene, procured her Vncle Bonifacius to be chosen Archbishop of Canterburie in place of * Edmund, who weary of his life in England, by reason that he could not redresse the Popes detestable exactions and oppressions, made choyse of a voluntarie Exile at Pountney in France, where hee dyed with the honour and opinion of a Saint.

(63) The Kings imployments hitherto haue (almost wholly) beene taken vp either in the impatiencie of ciuill disturbations, or in the too-patient sufferance of some forraine grieuances, nourished within his Kingdome; which gaue him perhaps little leasure, minde, or meanes, to pursue any transmarine designe. But now better prouided with money, then with men, (and yet not sufficiently with money) he takes ship immediately after Easter towards Poictou, where the Earle of March (now husband to Queene Isabel his mother) expected his arriuall. Hee committed the Gouernement of the Realme in his absence to the Archbishop of Yorke. Thirtie Hogsheads or * Barrels fraught with sterling money were shipt for that seruice. There also went with him Richard Earle of Cornewall, (who was returned, with much honour, out of the Holy-land not long before) and seauen other Earles, with about three hundreth Knights, besides other souldiers. To resist the English, the King of France (who had giuen Poictou to his brother Alfonse) assembled an Armie-royall of foure thousand men of Armes, excellently well appoynted, and about twentie thousand choyse Souldiers; with a thousand Carts to carrie their other necessaries. King Henrie vnderstanding that the King of France lay before Frontenay, (a Castle belonging to the Earle of March,) seeking to force it by assaults, sent a messenger of defiance to him as a breaker of Truce. Lewis, a most just and valiant Prince, denyed that euer hee brake the truce; but that the King of England, by maintenance of his Rebels, did rather seeme to infringe the Peace. Neuertheless he offered (so as the English would not protect his enemies, the Earle of March and others) to giue him Poictou, and a great part of Normandy, in satisfaction of his * Fathers Oath, and moreouer, to enlarge the last truce with a longer terme of yeeres. These so honourable, safe, and profitable conditions, by the practise of the Poictouines (who feared the French Kings indignation would prooue too heauie for them to beare, if the English abandoned their cause) were vnfortunately refused.

(64) When the French King heard hereof, it repented him that he had humbled himselfe so farre; telling his Lords, that he neither feared his Cousen of England, nor all his forces, but onely that Oath, (for restoring of the Lands in France) which his father made when he was in England. This scruple did so trouble the Kings minde, on the behalfe of his dead Father, that hee would admit no comfort, till one of his Lords tolde him, that the King of England, by putting Constantine Fitz-Arnulf to death, for hauing spoken some words in honour of King Lewis (his Father) had first broken the truce. This satisfied the French. That whole businesse is thus concluded by * Tilius; Hugh Earle of March ouercome with the pride and perswasions of his wife Isabel, would not doe homage to Alfonse the French Kings brother: for shee was a cause to draw the English thither, where things thriuing on his part but meanly, Hugh is constrained in the end to doe both homage and fealty vnto Alfonse. This only must be added, that he did vnfaithfully prouide for his priuate safety, without the knowledge of the King of England, at such time as he * pretended otherwise.

(65) This treacherie lost the King all Poictou, for whereas he principally tooke care for money, presuming vpon the Earle for men, when it came to the point, the Earle was not only not prouided, but sware by the throat of God, hee neuer promised any such matter, and denyed he had set his Seale to any writing concerning such promises, and that if any such sealed writing were (as the King and his brother the Earle of Cornwall affirmed) their mother his wife had forged it. They were now in sight of the French Host before Tailbourg in Xainctoing when this improuident expostulation was made. The King of England manifestly seeing his perill, and hauing by his Brother Earle Richards mediation (whom many of the French did greatly honour, because hee had by composition been a meane at his arriuall to free them from the Sarasens in the holy-land,) raised his campe by night, and retreated with much more haste then good speed. Not long after this, the faire City of Xaincts in Xainctoing, vpon displeasure conceiued by the Citizens against the King, because he had giuen the same to the Lord Hugh his halfe-brother, (sonne to the Earle of March) first contriued a perfidious reuolt so closely, that if first the said Lord Hugh, & then Guy de Lusignian his elder brother, had not in good time signified the danger, the King and all the English had beene surprized by the French. There was none, (among all the mutable Poictouins) found respectiue of honour and loyalty, but onely one called Hertold, Captaine of the famous Castle of Mirabell, who in great sorrow repayred to the King of England, praying counsell and assistance, where the King with a downe-cast-looke gaue him this answere: Thou dost see (O Hertold) *that my forces are scarce sufficient to defend my selfe. * The King lands at Portſmouth in October.

The prodigality of Kings, ends in the rapine and ſpoyle of the Subject.

(67) Neither will the Majeſty and honour of the Kingdome permit, that ſuch kindes of expenſe ſhould be wanting, when publique occaſions doe require; in which reſpects they are not onely vſe-full, but abſolutely neceſſary, becauſe Common-weales are partly founded vpon the opinion which Subjects and Neighbours haue of their power and riches, and their eſtimate is commonly made by that which is outwardly ſeene at ſuch times. This care, beſides the great loue hee bare to his Wiues kindred and Country-men, made him purſuey for money in this manner; for in December the Lady Beatrix Counteſſe of Prouince, * mother to the Queenes of England and France, hauing with her the Lady Cincia, Cynthia, or Scientia, (for by all thoſe names ſhe is called in Authours) and a princely trayne, in all poynts excellently well furniſhed, landed at Douer, where innumerable of the beſt ſorts gaue her welcome and attendance. London was hung with rich Ornaments, from the Bridge thereof to Weſtminſter. This noble young Ladie Cincia, was brought hither to bee marryed to Richard the Kings brother Earle of Cornwall: At whoſe Nuptiall Feaſt, there were thirty thouſand * Meſſes prouided in the Cookery onely, and of all other things there was incredible plenty. All which notwithſtanding did manifeſtly proue (as Paris ſaith moſt truly) that the world is but a very Iugler, and the pompe thereof but an idle ſhadow, ſeeing the next morrow blew away the whole varietie of ſo great preparations; like as if it had beene a Clowde. Nor much vnlike is the life euen of greateſt Princes, which hangeth on very vntruſty tearmes, as Griffin, eldeſt brother of Dauid Prince of Wales did finde, when hoping by a chaine of Blankets, and ſuch like ſtuffe, to eſcape out of the Tower of London, where the King had impriſoned him, the line breaking, hee pitcht vpon his head, which the weight of his great Body draue (as it were) into his ſhoulders, and miſerably ſlew him. The King therefore puniſhing the Keepers for their ſloath, commanded that the Sonne of Griffith (priſoner with his father) ſhould from thenceforth bee more narrowly watched. Not long after the which, Dauid Prince of Wales prouoked by wrongs, (chiefly done by the * Earle of Hereford) inuaded the Engliſh Marches, whom the Earles of Gloceſter and Hereford, and other mighty men in thoſe parts, hauing the Kings conſent and aſſiſtance, did withſtand, yet fighting but with variable fortune. It was Prince Dauids purpoſe to haue freed himſelfe from the obedience or tenure which he had acknowledged to the King; for which purpoſe he exhibited his * complaint to the Pope, pretending that the King of England compelled him vnjuſtly to holde his Principality and Lands of him. But the Kings credit, cauſe, and workings, eaſily ouer-weighed the Prince of Wales, and preuayled.

(68) The States of the Realme were in thoſe dayes nothing ſupple, when the King ſought to handle them for money: for hee about this time labouring to draw ſome from them, vpon faithfull promiſe to keepe and obſerue the Liberties, vnto which he had ſworne at his Coronation, and whereof hee had graunted his Charter, they beſought him to remember, how often hee had wrung from his faithfull liege-people, (whom he ought to cheriſh, not vtterly impoueriſh) without performing his promiſe. "That forthwith after the taking of Bedford, he had "Carrucage, that is, two ſhillings vpon euery Plough-"land; the next yeere after, a fifteenth of all their "Moueables: vpon his paſſage into Britaine, no "ſmall ſummes of money from the Prelates, Religious "orders, Burgeſſes, and Iewes: after his returne, hee "had Eſcuage, that is, vpon euery Shield (or knights "Fee) three markes: then a fortieth part of all their "Moueables: within a while after a thirtieth part; "By and by, for the marriage of the Ladie Iſabel "to the Emperour, two markes vpon euery Plough-"land; at his Sonnes birth, he by Preſents heaped "vp no ſmall ſtore of money. Againe, when he "went into Gaſcoigne, he rayſed almoſt infinite "heapes of money from all ſorts of Subjects: vpon "his returne, where hee had beene deluded and "diſhonoured, hee fleeced all manner of Subiects. They now alſo (vnder the name of ayde for the marriage of his eldeſt Daughter,) graunted him vpon euery Knights Fee, which held of the King in chiefe, twentie ſhillings, the one halfe to be payd at Eaſter, the other at Michaelmaſſe. But (ſay they) how well the King will keepe and fulfill his vndertakings and promiſes, in requitall of the paſt and preſent contributions, he onely knowes to whom nothing is vnknowne. But ſuch as trauelled to ſtrengthen the Popes deſignes, with collections of money among the Engliſh Clergy, found a ſterne and conſtant oppoſition, not onely for that they were vnwilling, but alſo for that the Emperour had written to the King in plaine phraſe, that if he ſuffered any ſuch matter, he would not fayle in grieuous ſort to puniſh all the Engliſh hee could get, in reuenge of that partiality.

(66) About

(69) About which time, many ſeditious perſons were in the Court of England, which * hoped that warre with Scotland would bring them this commoditie, that the oppreſſions they did to the people ſhould reſt vnpuniſhed; for Lawes and Iuſtice haue no place in time of battell. Their hope thus tooke beginning. Alexander King of Scots had married the Lady Marie, a goodly Gentle-woman, daughter to the Lord Ingelram de Cowcie, who (as all Frenchmen) being a deadly enemy to the King of England, had laboured to weaken that ſtrength of amitie, which was betweene the two Kings of England and of Scots, as a poynt neceſſarie or profitable for the tranquilitie of France. Their hope thus had ending; the ſaid Ingelram by the ſtumbling of his Horſe in a Foord, being caſt out of his Saddle, and pitcht into the depth of the Riuer, while his foote hung faſt in the ſtirrop, his ſword at the ſame time falling out of his ſheath, and running him through, did moſt ſtrangely end his life by a triple death, with whom it ſeemed the humour of battell betweene the two Siſter-Nations likewiſe dyed: for not long after, (notwithſtanding the great preparations on both ſides) all quarrels were abſolutely * concluded, with relation to ſuch Articles as had beene formerly made betweene them at Yorke. The King of England had with him fiue thouſand Horſe-men moſt fairely armed and appoynted; beſides a moſt puiſſant number of ſeruiceable men on foote. The Welſhmen feared and expected, that vpon this agreement, the King would turne all his forces againſt them; but hee knowing it needeleſſe to vſe ſuch numbers for that ſeruice, ſent onely three hundreth men of Armes, vnder the conduct of Sir Hubert Fitz-Mathew, to repreſſe their attempts, but through their owne raſhneſſe, and the Welſhmens valiancie, hee and his people were with loſſe at that time ſcattered. The newes of this bad ſucceſſe troubled the King neerely, for finall remedy whereof, he reſolued to leade a ful Army thither. But when, to furniſh this deſigne hee prayed more Subſidie of the States of his Realme, they with one voyce and with one minde contradicted; though alſo his debts to Merchant-ſtrangers for Wines, and other neceſſaries, were ſo many and ſo continually called for, as hee could ſcarce paſſe abroad without their clamours. Neuertheleſſe, the newes which hee receyued out of Aquitaine, where his Seneſchall Nicholæs de Molis had wonne the day in a battell againſt the King of Nauarre, did ſomewhat mitigate the ſowreneſſe of theſe ouer-thwarts; and for repleniſhment of Coffers, Robert Paſſeleu ſo ordered the matter, by fining ſuch as had encroched vpon the Kings Forreſts, that hee vnexpectedly began againe to make them ouer-flow.

(70) The great helpes which the King found by the new ſupply of his Treaſure, made him daily conſider, how to augment the ſame, and how to ſtop all vndue Out-lets, by which it was ordinarily impaired. Vpon the departure of Otto the Popes Legate, who had well ſtuffed his owne and his Maſters Coffers, (and had no leſſe filled the peoples hearts with repinings, and their mouthes with curſes of him) there was ſome hope the Romiſh horſe-leaches would for a while haue left ſucking the beſt juyce of the Land; but it proued otherwiſe, new Agents, Legats, and Factors, ſtill comming ouer, as if England had beene a Well which could neuer be drawne dry, and Rome a bottomleſſe gulfe which could neuer be filled full. Whereupon, before this, the King writ his letters both to this Pope, and to his Predeceſſor Gregorie 9. deſiring them to ſurceaſe from thus afflicting England with their exactions; but neither one nor other of them would vouchſafe to bridle their owne wilfull motions, as if God and S. Peter (whoſe ſteps they follow not) had euen bent their bowes againſt that Church of Rome. With which contempt the King had the more reaſon to be incenſed, becauſe the Pope had endeauoured to free Dauid Prince of Wales from his homage made to King Henry, pretending that if it were done by feare or force, it was of no force, but vtterly void. Notwithſtanding the Pope ſeeing the King and State reſolued to the contrary, was deſirous not onely to hold faſt the Kings good-will, but alſo to come into England; to which purpoſe he cauſed his Cardinals to write their perſuaſory Letters to the King, as a thing tending much to his ſafety, and to his Kingdomes immortall glory, to enjoy the Lord Popes preſence, who did long to ſee the delicacies of Weſtminſter, and the riches of London: but the Kings Councell told him, that the Romans Rapines and Simonies had enough ſtained Englands purity, though the Pope himſelfe came not perſonally to ſpoyle and prey vpon the wealth of this Church and Kingdome. The like deniall of entrance he had found both in France and Arragon, it being ſaid, that the Pope was but like a mouſe in a ſachel, or a ſnake in ones boſome, who did but ill repay their Hoſts for their lodging, and the infamies of the Popes Court deſerued no other, whoſe filth (ſaith our Monke) ſent forth a ſteme and ſtench as hie as the very Clouds. The Pope, though he could not come himſelfe, yet hee had his pipes and conducts to conuay this ſtench into this land, and the wealth of it backe in lieu thereof. Which was now ſo factoured by his Chaplaine Martin, that certaine of the Peeres commiſerating the inceſſant depredation of the Land, tooke order for ſtrickt watch at all the Ports in England, that all Letters, comming daily from the Pope to picke mens purſes, ſhould be ſtopt. But ſoone after, a more generall redreſſe was intended againſt ſo vnmercifull tyranny: the King finding by diligent inquiry, in euery Shire, that the annuall reuenues here, wherewith the Court of Rome had fraudulently and violently enriched Italians, amounted to threeſcore thouſand Markes, to the great both wonder and anger of the King; which made him now begin to deteſt the inſatiable greedineſſe of the Court of Rome. Hereupon, for that the Pope had now ſummoned a Generall Councell at Lyons, Ambaſſadors were thither ſent, there publiquely, in the name of the whole Kingdome, both to complaine and craue redreſſe of the Popes too long ſuffered extortions, (which were particularly there rehearſed, and which as being deteſtable to God and man, they would no longer endure;) and to diſauow all ſubjection vnjuſtly pretended from King Iohn, as whereunto both the then Archbiſhop openly contradicted, and the Nobles and State neuer conſented, nor euer would. The Pope, (aſhamed belike to be ſo taxed in ſo great an Aſſembly) is noted to haue ſate long ſilent, not ſo much as liſting vp his eyes from the ground, till at length hee cut off their importunity with this briefe anſwere, That ſo difficult a matter would aske longer deliberation; which vaine delay ſo enraged Earle Bygod, and the reſt of the Kings Agents, that with threats and terrible oaths, they ſware to remedy that themſelues, which the Pope would not. And indeed the Nobles at home had already begun ſo to doe; hauing commaunded Martin (the Popes Agent) to depart out of hand, for if he ſtayed, he and all his company ſhould be cut in peeces; who preſently packing away, (the King alſo wiſhing the Diuell to take him, hauing thus preyed vpon his land) ſo enraged the Pope with tidings of this vſage, that his Holineſſe ſaid; It is high time that we make a quicke end with the Emperour, that ſo we may cruſh theſe petty Kings (meaning the Engliſh and French, who both denied him entrance into their land) who ſpurne againſt vs; for the great Dragon being once cruſhed, thoſe leſſer poore ſnakes will ſoone be troden vnder.

(71) The Welſh affaires, by reaſon of the caſuall death of Fitz-Mathew, growing daily leſſe tractable then other, the King againe prepares to repreſſe their inſolencies in perſon. Before hee ſets forward, hee came into London to the Church of Saint Paul, to the intent that before his departure hee might take his leaue of the Citizens in a popular and louing manner. And becauſe neither warre nor want want could make him forget his magnificence, and bountie, he causèd the East-part of the great Church at Westminster to be taken downe, and by aduise of expert Worke-men newly to be builded and ioyned to the West. The effect of the Kings expedition into Wales was, that after he had fortified the Castle of Gannocke in North-Wales, vpon the passage into Anglesey, and by the Irishmen wasted that fertile Iland, hee was himselfe enforced by sharpenesse of the weather, and for want of victuals, to returne about the end of October, hauing taken all courses hee could to starue the Welsh, forbidding the Irish vpon paine of death to bring any relieefe into Wales; and lest that they of Cheshire, or the neighbour parts should giue them any succour, he so spoyled them of all their prouisions, that they were scarce able to feede themselues; and if the Welsh compelled by famine ventred out of their strengthes or fastnesses, in or about Snowdon, the Garrison Souldiers of Gannocke were ready to intercept and kill them; and on the other side, the Lords of Brumfield and Powys, though Welsh-men,* held with the King, so that they were miserably straitned. The King pawnd his Iewels to his brother Richard at this journey for 3000. Markes, which holpe to piece out the charge thereof. Paris hath a long list of great names, which dying about this time, left neyther name, nor issue to preserue the memory of their Greatnesse; bnt none so strange as of the Marshals, fiue Brethren of them successiuely Earles of Pembroke, and all dying issuelesse; which he attributeth to the judgement of God, for the iniquity of their Father, and of themselues, who would neuer restore certaine Manours, which their Father in warre-time had taken in Ireland from the Bishop of Ferns, an holy Irish-man, who often required restitution, and for want thereof, did put them vnder Gods curse and his. * One doth indeede obserue, that the Irish-Saints are vindicatiue; but certainely the examples of punishments for Sacriledge, and violent extortions are terrible in holy Scripture; and most fearefull was the sentence it selfe which Gods Prophet pronounced against Ahab for * Naboths Vineyard; agreeing with the very plague which this yeare fell vpon the house of the Marshall.

(72) The Popes furie was now so much inflamed against King Henry and the English, for so disgracing him publiquely in the Generall Councell, * that he vsed lofty threats, if once the Emperour were quelled, to tame England also; and whetted on the French King, to enter on the Land, promising him all the helpes of the Church, and Papall power. But the just King, not onely refused so vniust an offer, (as hauing no title to England, themselues also knit by kindred, and by truce, their Queenes being sisters, the attempt bloudie for Christians, &c. but further ratified the former truce, and enlarged it with the addition of more yeeres, because King Lewis was prepared to make warre against the Infidels, which voyage King Henrie would not hinder, but aduance. And that nothing might disturbe the peacefull life, with which the King of England was most delighted. Dauid Prince of Wales departed out of the vale of the dying, (as Paris elegantly saith) into the vale of the dead. The King seeing all things quiet and safe about him, doth now conuert his whole cares to the reformation of the inward maladies of his dominions, calling the estates of the Land together for that purpose. To whom hee there deliuered in writing, sundry * Articles of the grieuances and oppressions of his Kingdome, and the Church. 1. That the Pope extorts great Contributions of the Clergie, without the Kings assent, against the rights & liberties of the Kingdome. 2. That Patrons cannot bestow Church-liuings on fit men; but the Pope giues them to his Romans, who can speake no English, (nor celebrate diuine seruice, nor preach, nor keepe hospitality, nor care for soules, &c.) but onely beggar the Land with carrying away the Coyne. 3. That the Popes Prouisions and Pensions are vnsufferable. 4. That Englishmen are drawn forth of the land to end their causes. 5. That the Pope by his Non obstante ouerthrowes Oaths, Customes, Charters, Grants, Statutes, Priuiledges, Rights, &c. whereupon, the King, Bishops, Nobles, Abbots, and Priors, did all write * their seuerall complaints to the Pope, requiring speedy redresse of those infinit wrongs to the King, the Kingdome, the Clergy, the Nobles, and the People, who would rather die, then thus daily endure those oppressions. Notwithstanding sundry Prelates (either out of ambition or feare) vnder-hand furthered the Popes desires, when secretly he craued an annuall tallage of the Clergy for maintenance of his Souldiers; and that the State should take no notice thereof, the Pope causèd his Agents to make them * sweare, not to reueale this their Contribution to any man liuing, for the space of halfe a yeere. Yet the King came to the knowledge thereof; and sent forth his writs, forbidding vnder great penalty that the mony should be carried forth of the land. This the Kings displeasure was much augmented vpon the returne of his messengers from the Councell of Lyons, who related how proudly the Pope reiected the iust complaints of the State, saying, the King himselfe did Frederize, and holding his people as Schismaticks. Which incensed the King to publish his Proclamation in euery Citie and towne, that none of his subiects should dare to contribute any mony to the Pope: but it came to no effect, for that some* Popizing Bishops and ambitious Clerks (of his Councell) fearing the Papall threats, where no cause of feare was, drew him to leaue his purpose womanly, which he manfully vndertooke.

(73) The Bishop of Worcester (a principall worker herein) was said to * haue had authority from the Pope to interdict the land, which perhaps was it which the King so greatly feared, and which the Monk said, was not worth the fearing. The Earle of Cornwal also with others (who fauoured not the Emperour Fredericks cause) laboured to change the Kings minde, so that the wonted extortions were as current as euer; insomuch that a * Cardinall truely told the Pope, that England was to the Pope as Balaams Asse, which being so often wronged, spurgalled, and cudgeld, it was no maruaile, if at length she opened her mouth to complaine: and for themselues and their Romane Court, they were like Ismael, * euery mans hand against them, and theirs against euery man. But if we should so often insist on the relation of this Kingdomes distresses, as the Popes endlesse Corasions from yeere to yeere, and the States remedilesse complaints, giue vs occasion, we should but cloy the Reader with rufull matter, which * Monkes themselues haue mournfully and copiously endited vnto vs, and set forth the too seruile affections of our owne Ancestors, who still entred new consultations about the disease, but neuer brought the medicine vnto a perfect receipt. For vpon fresh angariations from Rome, the King * againe assembles his State to thinke of redresse, * the Common-wealth, as well of Laitie as Clergie, being brought to the poynt of vtter desolation, as the like was neuer heard in any age, whereof they againe made their lamentable complaint to the King, whose duety it was to protect the Land from such wrongs and dangers. Their onely remedy was, againe to write letters to the Pope, which slender meanes he could as sleightly put off; and though (to stop the clamour for the present) he promised neuer to send any Legates into England, but on entreatie of the State, yet daily did he send his raking Clerkes, with the power, though not the Title, and Ensignes of Legates, both into England and Ireland, so to delude the King, and still purloine his Subiects.

(74) The State of the Kingdome still requiring reformation, there assembled againe at London certaine Prelates, Earles, and others, at the Kings commaundement, where after so much purloyning by others, now the Kings owne errand and affaires was to get money for himselfe. But they (who gaue such way to the Popes collections) were now all close-handed, close-handed, and open-mouthed; for, besides their vndutiful vpbrayding the king with some ouer-sights, they vntruly & seditiously charged him to haue done contrary to the example of his magnificent Predecessors, in that his chiefe Iustice, Chancellour and Treasurer were of his owne chusing, and not by the Common Councell of the Realme, as they ought. The King inwardly touched herewith, yet seeing no other helpe, promiseth redresse and change for the better. Whereunto they answered; that they would expect a while with patience, and as the King shall carry himselfe toward them, so will they performe their obeysance to him. So the meeting was adjourned from that Candlemas till Midsommer; at which time also there was nothing done, but all parts rose discontented. The cause of that discontentment was, for that the King, in stead of satisfying their audacious demands, answered them, That they sought to bridle him at their surlie pleasures, proudly forbidding that in him, which was lawfull for themselues. For that euery priuate man may vse, what, and whose Counsell he list; euery master of a family prefer or remoue what officers in his house he list; which yet they saucily denyed vnto him, their Lord and Soueraigne, as if seruants and vassals were to rule their Lords; whereas indeed he is no King but a seruant, who must bow at others becke. That therefore he would neither place nor displace either Chancellour, Iustitiar, or Treasurer, as they thought good. Neuertheless he required money at their hands, to recouer such forreine lands as concerned as well them as him, to see it done. Hereupon the Parliament brake vp, and the King was left to furnish himselfe otherwise so well as hee could, euen by saile of his Iewels, Plate, and other precious stuffe, after a dishonourable manner.

(75) The affaires of Gascoigne (which one Guasto de Biard had greatly troubled) by the manhood and wit of Simon Earle of Leicester were now brought into better quiet, which made his presence (being returned, as it seemeth for more supplies, which went again with him) very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to furnish that enterprise afresh against the comming Spring-time, left no meanes vnthought of, which either by Art or strong entreatie he could vse, to repleniſh his exhausted Coffers. In which he embased too much the Royall name and dignitie, telling some (and perhaps truly) whose bountie he craued, that it was more almes to aide him with money, then one that went begging from dore to dore. Meane while the King neglects not his administration of Iustice; for, whereas the whole Countie of Hampshire swarmed with Felons and murtherous Robbers, himselfe so ordered the matter, sitting in person in Winchester-Castle, that the infamie and danger of those places were cleared by hanging the Offendors; many of which were very wealthy, and some the Kings owne seruants. Walter de Clifford also (a Baron of the Marches of Wales) for enforcing an officer (whom he had otherwise handled badly) to eate the Kings Writ, Waxe and all, ranne so farre into the Kings displeasure thereby, that while he liued, he was made the lesse able to feed himselfe; paying to the King a very great summe of money, and hardly escaping without confiscation of his whole patrimonie. The King desirous to be friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had beene ouerhard, publikely reconciled himselfe vnto them, whom for that cause he had commanded to appeare at Westminster, and there immediatly receiued the badge of the Crosse at the hand of Boniface Archbishop of Canterburie; but whatsoeuer his intention was, it neuer came into action on his part. In the meane time, contrary to his Fore-fathers example, hee so much abridged the expences of his house, and his Almes, that he vnder-went some dishonourable imputation. Neuertheless he wisely wound himselfe out of many a Merchants debt; whereto he wrung great helpes from the Iewes, (as the ordinary Clippers and defacers of his Coyne,) and the forgers of Seales and Charters; from one of whom hee had at times drawne thirty thousand markes Sterling, besides two hundreth markes in Gold.

(76) It seemeth an inseparable quality in his nature, to be extreamely violent, in doing whatsoeuer he had a minde to doe, and that sometime without the due respect to secular Majestie; as in the course hee tooke for aduancing his halfe-brother Æthelmare to the Bishoprick of Winchester. For not contenting himself to haue sent his messengers to the Couent by them to worke the election, hee came thither in person, where the Chapter being set in the Cathedral Church, he entred, and placing himselfe in the Presidents seat, makes to them a speech in the nature of a Sermon, taking for his Theme those words of Dauid: Iustice and Peace kisse each other. Whereon hee shewed them, That, whereas Iustice belonged to him, and to such as had the rule of Nations, and to the Clergie calmenesse and Peace, both these should that day kisse together, if they elected his brother for their Bishop: For which he gaue them many reasons, but concluded, if they did otherwise, they should feele his Princely displeasure. When therefore they published to the King their Choise, they did it with this reseruation, (because Æthelmare was to remaine vnder the title of the Elect of Winchester, for that hee was not a Priest) if such an election might stand by Law, or lawfull fauour. But the Pope, who meant to make his aduantage hereof, as well as the King, exacted of him for confirmation of the same election, fiue hundreth Markes of Church-reuenewes, to be passed ouer vnto the Earle of Burgundies Sonne a Childe; which makes * the Monke to breake forth into this bitter lamentation; *O Pope, the Chiefe of Fathers, why dost thou suffer thus the Christian world to be defiled? worthily, worthily, therefore art thou * driuen out of thine owne City and See, & like a runnagate and another* Cham, art inforced to wander vp and downe. O God, thou God of iust reuenge, when wilt thou draw forth thy sword to imbrue it in the bloud of such oppressors? Though in these vniuersall abuses, the Pope would neither redresse himselfe nor others, yet God raised vp a stout and learned Prelate, Robert Grosteſt, Bishop of Lincolne, who vndertooke to reforme the Monkes and Friars; but they (who knew Rome was from the beginning * Asylum Latronum) appealed to the Pope. Whereupon the aged Bishop going to his Holinesse, tolde him that all offenders escaped, by his opening his bosome to such as brought him Bribes; who snapping him vp with angry countenance and speech, sent him home with reproach. The Pope was at this time at Lyons, where not long after the Councel breaking vp, Cardinal Hugo made *a Sermon of farewel to the citizens; wherein, amongst other benefits which the Popes lying in their City had brought them, hee told them this was a * Principal, that whereas at their comming there were three or foure Whore-houses in Lyons, now at their departing they left but one, but indeede that reached from the East-Gate of the Citie to the West.* Whereby we see, France had some part of the Popes Almes, as well as England.

(77) The King now wholly intented vpon encrease of treasure, neither gaue any rich presents according to the ancient Custome of England, nor robed himself in royall estate, but shortened yet more the allowances of his houshold & entertainments, without any regard to Majestie or rumour. And to spare his owne charge the rather, he inuites himselfe sometime to this man, and sometime to that, but no where contenting himselfe with his dyet and hospitage, vnlesse both he, his Queene, and Sonne Edward, yea and chiefe fauourites in Court, were presented with great and costly gifts, which they tooke not as of Courtesie, but as due. This was the vnhonourable face of the Kings estate at that time. But in the depth of his wants and rigour of his Parcimonie, hee could not shut vp himselfe against the suits and aduancement of his Poictouines and Prouincois, so that it was become a common murmur in England; Our inheritance

(78) Another of the Kings Iuſticiars, and a learned Knight, Sir Henry de Bath, (whoſe Lady, becauſe her ſelfe was well deſcended, filled him with pride,) was ſo confidently greedy, the better to ſatisfie her ambition, that in one circuit, he appropriated to himſelfe aboue two hundreth pound lands. Corruption in Iuſtice, which muſt needes be ſuſpected to be there, where exceſſiue wealth is gotten by the Officers of Iuſtice) is but a ſandie ground-worke of a vainely-hoped greatneſſe, and may well be reputed in the number of crying ſinnes; and this mooued a Knight, Sir Philip de Arci, to appeach him before the King, both for vnfaithfulneſſe in his office, and treaſon againſt the King. The King had no hold of himſelfe, after he was once throughly kindled. Bath knowes it, and therefore writes to his Wiues friends to come ſtrong in his defence, that the King ſhould not dare to call him to his triall; yet withall hee ſeekes all ſecret meanes how to appeaſe the King; who vnderſtanding of this combination, was the more enflamed. The Earle of Cornwall his brother could not appeaſe him; no, not though he knit vp his interceſſion with theſe minatorie words; Wee muſt not forſake Gentlemen in their right, nor in preſeruing the peace of the tottering Kingdome. In March there was holden a Parliament at London; there the king cauſed Bath to be ſharply proſecuted. Thither Sir Henry Bath repaires, ſtrongly attended with Knights and Gentlemen of his owne friends, and his Wiues, to daunt the edge of Iuſtice, which he deſeruedly feared. The accuſations were many, (for all men were called to ſay what they could aganſt him,) and among all, theſe two, moſt hainous: That he troubled the whole Realme, and ſtirred all the Barons thereof againſt the King, ſo that a generall rebellion was to be feared, (which one of his fellow-Iuſtitiars did openly teſtifie:) That he had for reward diſcharged a conuicted Maleſactor out of priſon without puniſhment, in prejudice of the King, and to the perill of his aſſociate Iuſtitiars. The King was ſo enraged herewith, that ſeeing no other way to puniſh him, being ſo ſtrongly backed, hee mounted into an higher place then before, and cries out, Whoſoeuer kils Henry de Bath ſhall be quit of his death, and I heere doe acquit him; and preſently departs. Neuertheleſſe, although he left behinde him many men, who would haue readily executed the Kings terrible doome; yet by the wiſdome of Sir Iohn Manſell, (one of the Kings priuate Counſellors) they were reſtrayned. His words are worthy to be remembred; Gentlemen, and friends, it is not neceſſary for vs to put that preſently in execution which the King hath in his anger commaunded. It may be when his wrath is ouer-blowne, he will be ſorry he ſaid it. Moreouer, if any out-rage be done to Bath, loe heere are his friends, who will take all ſorts of reuenge. Sir Henry eſcaping thus from ſo preſent a danger, found meanes vpon promiſe of * money and great mediation of friends, to obtaine his peace and ſafetie; for at this time, Iuſtice and all things grew faileable. The North-Eaſt part of Wales was committed to Alan de Zouch, who had it in Farme for eleuen hundreth Markes yeerely, whereas Iohn de Gray (whom he ſupplanted in the place) paid but fiue hundreth, ſo * miſerable Wales was let out to ſuch as would giue moſt.

(79) Alexander the third, ſucceeding his Father in the Kingdome of Scotland, comming in Chriſtmas to Yorke, there eſpouſed, though very young, the Lady Margaret, daughter to King Henry. There were preſent the two Kings in perſon, with a moſt choiſe multitude of either Nation, the Engliſh being in number aboue a thouſand Knights, beſide greater States, as Prelates, Earles, and Barons, and of the Scots about ſixe hundreth Knights and Gentlemen, all of them well appoynted. There was alſo two Queenes, the Mother of the Bride, (who was to be Queene) and the Widow, or Queene Dowager of Scotland, who for that cauſe was returned out of France, attended vpon in royall manner with many Lords and Gentlemen of France. The Scots were lodged in one place of the City by themſelues. Vpon Chriſtmas day the King of England gaue the order of Knighthood to the King of Scots, and at the ſame time to twentie others richly apparrelled. Vpon the next day the princely couple were eſpouſed. Take a ſcantling of the cheere and multitude of gueſts by this. The Archbiſhop of Yorke, who was Prince (as it were) of the Northerne parts (and the common hoſt of al that moſt noble fellowſhip, which coſt him about foure thouſand markes) gaue toward that Feaſt ſixe hundreth fat Oxen, all which were ſpent in the firſt generall ſeruice; and whatſoeuer the vaine * Stage-play of the World might affoord, eyther for pompe or delight, was there all enjoyed. More worthy to be remembred, then that magnificent gluttonie, (the naturall vice of theſe our Nations) was the orderly and no childiſh action of the young Bridegroome, in reconciling Philip Louell (whom King Henry had lately fined and diſcourted for taking Bribes) to the King his Lord. King Alexander vndertaking the buſineſſe, and finding a fit time, preſents himſelfe to the king of England vpon his knees, holding vp his hands, neither would he riſe, though earneſtly requeſted, but with a geſture which ſeemed to draw teares of joy and loue from the eyes of ſuch as * ſate round about, proſecuting his intent, ſaith; My Lord King, your Maieſtie knowes, that though I my ſelfe am a King, and through your goodneſſe honoured with the Girdle of Knight-hood, yet that I am withall both a Childe, as well in age as in Knowledge, and alſo an Orphan, my father being dead, and my mother leauing mee, though at your ſending for, ſhee is now pleaſed to be preſent, therefore from henceforth, and for euer after, I heere doe take you, both for Father and Mother, that you may ſupply both their wants, and with your paternall care, helpe and protect all mine inſufficiencies. The King ſcarce able to refraine from tender teares, or to hold downe his throbbings, ſaid no more but onely this one word, Willingly. The princely Childe replied thereupon: I will make experiment of that, and know it by proofe; ſeeing you haue graciouſly heard mee hitherto, in trying whether I ſhal reape the effect of my firſt ſuit. Then he declared his requeſt, and had it; ſo that Louell was afterward Treaſurer.

(80) The State and fidelity of the Gaſcoignes was ſo deſperately ſhaken and plunged by the reuenges which Simon de Montfort (to whom the King had giuen the gouernement of their Country for ſixe yeeres,) had exerciſed vpon them, for that they had accuſed him to the King of tyrannous and proditorious dealing, and affirmed, that his name ought rather to be Sinon then Simon, that but for the vent of their Wines, (in which reſpect their ſubjection to England was very beneficiall to their Common-weale) it was thought they would generally haue reuolted. But the King though ready thus to leeſe Gaſcoigne, would yet needes hope to obtaine Normandie, and his other Lands in France without blowes. The King of France (whoſe conſcience was wonderfully tender and ſincere) had indeed written out of Paleſtine to that purpoſe, as thinking King Henries title was better then his owne: but the French, among whom their Kings misfortunes in the loſſe of Damiata in Ægypt, which was wholly * aſcribed to the Popes auarice, who for money releaſed thoſe who ſhould haue ayded him,) had brought him into leſſe regard then his excellent vertues merited, did vniuerſally and conſtantly refuſe, adding, that before the King of England ſhould haue any more Land among them, hee muſt paſſe through a thouſand ſharpe Lances, and a thouſand bloudie Swords when the Lances were burſt. On the other ſide, the King of England was but in little credite with his people: for, whereas (by an agreement betweene the Pope and him,) the Tenths of the Clergie through England during three yeeres ſhould haue beene receyued toward his charges in his pretented journey to the Holy-land, yet in a generall Aſſembly at Weſtminſter, very few were drawne to giue their names to that ſeruice, notwithſtanding that two Biſhops and the Abbot of Weſtminſter laboured in their Sermons all they could to ſtirre the people to that martiall Pilgrimage, and though the King himſelfe in all their view tooke a moſt ſolemne Oath, that within three yeere he would ſet forward; the onely reaſon of their vnwillingneſſe growing vpon ſuſpition, that he onely ſought (as the Pope had giuen him example) to draw by this colour the treaſure of the Realme into his hands. This their diffidence of ſincerity in him, made him the rather incline to foſter and fauour ſtrangers, and that with a kinde of peruicacie, though himſelfe by manifold neglects of his word, had worthily bred that diffidence.

The Kings hope to recouer Normandie fruſtrated.

(81) The King could more hardly finde followers in ſuch an enterprize, for that his people had no conceit of his valour, but ſaid: What reaſon encourageth him, who was neuer trayned vp in Martiall diſcipline, nor hath managed an Horſe, nor drawne a Sword, nor charged a ſtaffe, nor ſhooke a Target; to hope for a triumph ouer the Sarazens, againſt whom the Cheualrie of France hath miſcarried? or wherefore dreames he of recouery of more Land, who could not keepe that which he had in forraigne parts? concluding, that he was a man onely borne to draine their purſes, to emptie his owne, and to multiply debts. This was the opinion of men, and behinde his backe; but not onely of men, for Iſabel Counteſſe of Arundel, Widow of Henry Earle of Arundel, a young Ladie, receiuing the repulſe at the Kings hands in a matter which ſhe alledged to be hers in equity, durſt ſay thus to his face: O my Lord King; why doe you turne away from juſtice? wee cannot now obtaine that which is right in your Court; you are placed as a meane betweene God and vs, but you neyther gouerne vs, nor your ſelfe, neither dread you to vex the Church diuerſly, as it hath not onely felt in preſent, but often heretofore. Moreouer you doubt not manifoldly to afflict the Nobles of the Kingdome. The King fired at ſo free a ſpeech, with a ſcornefull and angry countenance, anſwered with a loud voyce; O my Ladie Counteſſe, What? haue the Lords of England, becauſe you haue tongue at will, made a Charter, and hyred you to be their Orator and Aduocate? whereunto the Counteſſe replyed: Not ſo my Lord, for they haue made to mee no Charter, but that Charter which your Father made, and which your ſelfe confirmed, ſwearing to keepe the ſame inuiolably and conſtantly, and often extorting money, vpon promiſe that the Liberties therein contained ſhould be faithfully obſerued, you haue not kept, but without regard to honor or conſcience, broken. Therefore are you found to be a maniſeſt violater of your faith and oath. For where are the Liberties of England ſo often fairely engroſt in writing? ſo often granted? ſo often bought? I therefore though a woman, and all the naturall loyall people of the Land, appeale againſt you to the Tribunall of the feareſull Iudge, and Heauen and Earth ſhall beare vs witneſſe, that we are vſed vniuſtly, & God the Lord of reuenges right vs. The King abaſhed at theſe words, asked her, if ſhe did not looke to obtaine her ſuite vpon fauour, in regard ſhe was his Kinſwoman? whereunto ſhee anſwered: That ſeeing hee had denyed that which the Law gaue, how could ſhe hope to obtaine her ſuite by fauour? Therefore (ſaid ſhe) I doe appeale to the preſence of Chriſt, againſt thoſe alſo your Councellors, who bewitch and dull your iudgement, and draw you out of the path of truth, gaping onely after their owne commodity. But the King (ſaith Paris) remained incorrigible, and the Lady loſt both her charges, hopes, and trauell.

The common opinion of the Kings deſigne for the Holy-Land.

A perillous bold Dialogue between the Counteſſe of Arundel, and the King.

(82) Thus harſh were the former yeeres to the King and Kingdome: let vs ſee what more gentle or rougher accidents riſe vnto vs in the next. But it then at the firſt little better appeares; for the King hauing bought out the time which Simon de Montfort had in the gouernment of Gaſcoigne (which now hee giues to Prince Edward) was truely aduertiſed, that Guaſto de Biard was turned Spaniſh, and laboured by all the meanes he could to plucke that part from the Engliſh obedience. Alfonſe King of Spaine, claymed the ſame by vertue of a Charter made thereof by Henry the ſecond, confirmed by Richard and Iohn Kings of England. Simon Earle of Leiceſter thus diſplaced, to let the World ſee that he would not for any preferment incurre the ſuſpition of diſloyalty, refuſed moſt honourable offers, which, (after the death of Lady Blanch, Queene Dowager, and Rectrix of France,) the French Nobility made him, if he would with his counſell and Force helpe to ſuſtaine that Monarchie, while Lewis their King was abſent. In the meane time the King of England (all olde matters being buried in obliuion, vpon hope of future amendment) for aduauncement of his martiall Pilgrimage, had large aydes granted him in Parliament; but vpon condition that hee ſhould now at laſt, once for all, ſubmit himſelfe to gouerne by a Law, not at his pleaſure, confirming the Charters of Liberties, againſt the breakers whereof a moſt ſolemne curſe was pronounced by the Kings aſſent. The Archbiſhop, Biſhop, and the reſt of the Prelates pontifically apparelled, pronounced that curſe with Tapers burning, which when they had throwne away vpon the pauement, where they lay extinguiſhed and ſmoaking, the King (hauing layde his hand on his breaſt all the while,) ſware to keepe all Liberties vpon paine of that execratory ſentence; as hee was a Man, a Chriſtian, a Knight, and a King annoynted and crowned. The buſineſſes of Gaſcoigne ſoone after called him to a neerer warre, whether vpon his promiſe made to the Gaſcoignes, he ſet ſaile, leauing his ſonne Prince Edward, and his Kingdome to the gouernment of his Brother, the Earle of Cornwall, and the Queene his Wife: his arriuall there giuing a light and ſtay to all the affaires thereof. Such Holds as held againſt him, he reduced to obedience, but with too faultie a Clemencie, ſparing moſt open Traytors, whereas if an Engliſh-man had offended, he was ſure to ſmart for it, and that rather more then leſſe.

Ann. 1254. Prince Edward married the King of Spaines sister.

(84) Soone after the Queenes arriuing in Gascoigne, when all things were rightly prepared, Prince Edward was thence sent into Spaine, where, at the City of Burgos hee married the Lady Eleanor, sister to the King, with great honour, hauing first receiued Knight-hood at his hand; which done, hee returnes with his Bride to Burdeaux, from whence they all together came safe through Fraunce into England. What treasure this noble young Princesse brought in portion to her Husband, wee cannot say; but the King forthwith gaue his Sonne Gascoigne, Ireland, Wales, Bristow, Stanford, and Grantham. He had drawne vpon himselfe a debt, in this and other his actions, of aboue three hundred thousand Markes; the King of Fraunce being not long before returned from the Holy-Land, gaue them both safe-conduct in their passage, and did to him, and his whole noble company all the honour which the wit of man, or the most goodly Kingdome of Fraunce could afforde. There were at Paris in this entertainment Beatrix the Countesse of Prouince, and foure Queenes her Daughters. The King of England had in his owne Housholl traine, a thousand choyce and excellent horse, beside Carriages, Sumpters, and Coursers. Hee was lodged in the Pallace of the olde Temple, being an house almost capable of an Armie, where the next morning he commanded that all sorts of poore should bee relieued with his charity and Almes. The magnifence of the great Feast of the Kings, at the King of Englands charge, shall be expressed in our Authors owne words, who is bold to affirme, that Assuerus, Arthur, Charles the Great, had neuer any such. After dinner, the King sent to the French Lords, and men of Armes, Plate, Buckles of Gold, and other royall presents. The King of England sate at the Table on the right hand of the French King, and the King of Nauarre on the left. But the French King contended much in curtesie to the contrary, till King Henry obstinately refused saying, the King of France was his Lord, and should be, for there was reason, meaning, because hee held his Lands in France of him. To whom the most iust and gratious King Lewis with a soft voice answered; Would to God euery one had his right without offence, meaning such other lands as the English Crowne had right vnto. At another time he gaue the reason why the Peeres of France would not consent to the restitution of Normandy, for that the Normans would neuer learne to keepe their Borders in quiet. The English King did to himselfe, and to the English name great honour, in his whole behauiour and carriage, which was full of Charity towards the poore (a vertue for which in those dayes Kings chiefly sought to be commended) of Maiestie, Magnificence, and all sorts of royall liberality and gentlenesse. The King and Court of France brought him an whole dayes iourney vpon the way. Hee staid a while at Boloigne for a winde, but returned safe, hauing peaceably measured a way through France, out of Gascoigne, which his martiall Nephewes, Kings of England, trode afterward in another manner, drawing lines of bloud and fire ouer all Fraunce, the most pleasant, rich, and spacious Realme of Christendome.

The Ambassadour was a Bishop, who forthwith departed, for indeed his errand was in shew glorious, but in truth both delusory and vnprofitable, aswell because the King had already vnreasonably interessed himselfe in this quarrell, (the Pope hauing changed his vowe against the Turkes, into this against Christians,) as also, for that the Roman Armie which (by the Popes fetches) warred most at his charge; was (notwithstanding the Popes blessings) vtterly ouerthrowne, before this ayrie honour could be setled in the Lord Edmund, whom yet his Father (whose credulity the Pope for his owne ends had shamefully inueigled, by drawing him into obligations of * two hundreth and fifty thousand pounds) openly tearmed and vsed as the King of Sicilie, (for which also hee vsed this annexed Seale) highly pleasing himselfe in the variety of a wastfull Title, to his owne, and his whole Kingdomes * extreame impouerishment.

(86) The Calamities of the Kingdome in these exhaustings, was the more lamentable, because they were countenanced by the King, who should haue repelled them. But the Pope hauing no so easie way to be supplied as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King were well accorded to grinde the people each for the others vses; the King to satisfie the Popes Auarice; the Pope to aduance the Kings Ambition. The gayning of the Kingdome of Sicilie must bee the colour, for which the King was resolued to goe in person; and therefore Rustandus (the Popes Agent) sent to gather the Tenth of all England, Scotland and Ireland, for the Popes vse and the Kings, indifferently, had called called a great Councell the former yeare, and adiourned it * till this; where hee alſo required all the Prelates to binde themſelues to the Popes Marchants, as hauing receiued of them a great ſumme of money, which was imployed to the vſe of their Churches. At which guilefull and vntrue deuiſe, the Prelates replyed they would rather dye then ſuffer ſuch oppreſſion, and that they held it a manifeſter Martyrdome to dye in ſuch a cauſe, then was the death of Thomas Becket. The Nobles alſo peremptorily refuſed either to recouer Sicilie, or to beare the charge thereof, being both impoſſible; the one for the ſtrength of Manfredus, the other for the preſent pouerty of England. And indeed ſoone after the Pope and Manfrede were made friends, and ſo King Henry and King Edmund beguiled, one of his great expenſes, the other of his high hopes. The King was herewith wakened out of a ſweet dreame wherein till then he continued, feeding his minde with the hope to leaue to either of his Sonnes a Kingdome; though neither ſo he reſted quiet till hee had almoſt throwne the Crowne into the gulphes of irrecouerable debts and vſury. The young King of Scots and his Queene, about this time came into England to viſite their beſt friends, the King and Queene of this Kingdome, which lay wholly open to their honour and vſes. The King, to let his Sonne in law ſee how welcome hee was, did beſtowe vpon him the Earledome of Huntingdon; They, and their Queenes, with almoſt all the great Lords and Ladies of England met at Woodſtocke by Oxford, from whence they came to London. The King was vnwilling to deny his Sonne in law and daughter any thing, for at their earneſt ſuite he pardoned Sir William de Lile Knight, Sheriffe of Northamptonſhire, who was prooued to haue practiſed by moſt fowle ſuborned treacherie to ſpoile another Gentleman of his eſtate: for which the ſaid Lile had dyed a ſhamefull, but a worthy, death, by drawing and hanging, had not his Wiues teares and prayers made the King and Queene of Scots their interceſſors. Thus the young Princes returned into Scotland, worthily well contented.

(87) The King, much the freſher to vndergoe ſerious affaires, by reaſon of the late comfort hee had in his Childe the Queene of Scots, beſtirres himſelfe, and comes in perſon into the Exchequer among the Barons thereof, when the Court was ſet, and made ſharpe orders againſt all Sheriffes and Bayliues of Townes incorporate, who did not yearely appeare at the Exchequer, to pay ſuch money of the Kings as was come to their hands. At the ſame time all the Sheriffes of England were amerced, becauſe they had not diſtreined all thoſe which had ſuch eſtates in Land, as the law limiteth, to take the order of Knighthood, or pay their fines. Which of the Lords could ſay now, that the King would not prooue a good Husband? Howbeit the caſe of the people ſeemed nothing relieued, for (ſaith Paris) there were ſo many petty Tyrants, by the negligence or conniuence of one, that the auncient State of England, when it had many Kings, ſeemed to be brought in againe.

(88) Occaſions of expence, like the heads of Hydra, daily encreaſed. The Welſh (oppreſt by Geoffrey de Langley, an officer vpon the Marches) roſe in armes, and miniſtred one of thoſe occaſions, but that Prince Edward, to whom his Father had giuen Wales, was left therein to himſelfe, for his Father could ſpare no money. The Prince therefore borrowes ſome thouſands of Markes of his Vncle Richard, and with his owne and them wageth Souldiers; his ſeruants behaued themſelues moſt violently euery where, taking without paiment, or paying with blowes; and it was the humour alſo of their young Maſter, who had ſtore of martiall and ſtirring fire in his boſome. The Welſh therefore would not for any perſwaſions be drawne to lay downe weapons, but hauing about ten thouſand of their countrey horſemen, and many more on foot, tooke a ſolemne Oath, that they would ſtand together for their libertie and ancient lawes, holding it better to die with honour, then to liue a wretched life in ſhame and ſeruitude. And indeed they did great things vnder Prince Lewelyn ap Gruffith, by whoſe meanes they valiantly recouered all the Inland-countrey of North-Wales, with other places; and in one fight ſlew aboue two thouſand Engliſhmen, and draue the reſt out of the field. They alſo ſpoyled the land, to the very * gates of Cheſter. This they had the greater oportunity to doe, for that the King, while he built kingdomes in the Clowds, and plunged himſelfe into the Abyſſes of Vſury, ſuffered ſome few, his Sonne, his Brother, the Earle of Glouceſter, and his halfe-brothers, with their Families, to trample right and reaſon vnderfoot, and with his hatred to enrich themſelues, his owne meanes daily conſuming, and mens mindes more and more alienated from him, as men that deſpaired of redreſſe and iuſtice. The Welſh alſo perſiſting in their enterpriſe, made Prince Edward retire in a battaile, and he complaining to his Father, had no other comfort but this: What is that to mee? the land is thine of my gift. Put forth thy ſtrengths at firſt, and get honour in thy youth, that from thenceforth thy enemies may ſtand in feare of thee. As for me, I haue ſomewhat elſe to doe.

(89) The greateſt worldly forreine honour that (ſince Conſtantine) euer fell vpon any Engliſh ſubiect, was at this time, in regard both of his birth and riches, deriued and tendred to Richard Earle of Cornewall, brother to the King, to whom was ſent an honourable Ambaſſage out of Germanie, who, in humble manner declared, that the Princes of the ſacred Roman Empire had elected him King of Romans, beſeeching him to accept of that their common choiſe. In teſtimony whereof the Archbiſhop of Collein, high Chancellor of the Empire, Prince Elector, and other great Lords of Almaine, had ſent their writings vnder ſeale, affirming, That neuer was any one with ſo generall conſent and vniuerſall good liking elected to that place as he, his name carrying it clearely without any contradiction among them. Vpon receipt of this moſt honourable inuitation and offer, there was much debatement in the Chappell, where they ſate vpon the Earles behalfe, whether he ſhould accept thereof, or no; but while all of them ſtood in doubt, the King puts in a deciding voyce, ſaying: Leaſt my Brother be thought faint-hearted, my opinion and requeſt is, that hee would not refuſe to accept this honour, which God and man haue tendred vnto him. This made the ſquadron of the negatiues to giue way, & at leaſt-wiſe to become Neutrals, till all obiections were anſwered, as they were all of them by one or other, concluding in their ſpeeches to the Earle; That hee ſhould bee warned, and withall ſtirred vp to the ſeruice of God, in acceptance of this higheſt place, by the example of Robert Curthoſe Duke of Normandy (eldeſt Son of William the firſt, King of England) to whom the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, for the intent to rule the inheritance of Chriſt, was offred; which hee refuſing to accept, did afterward feele the grieuous wrath of God, and neuer had happy daies after. To theſe and many other reaſons, the king, his half-brothers, & ſpecially the Elect B. of Wincheſter encouraged him, with one voyce, affirming, that this honour would exalt the Engliſh name for euer: The Earle therefore putting on the man, with a free and cheerfull voyce, anſwered: And I relying vpon the goodneſſe of Almighty God, though I am inſufficient, & vnworthy, to auoide the note of faintneſſe, doe thankefully accept this burthen and honour, which Heauen (I hope) hath put into my hands. And then turning himſelfe to the Biſhops who were preſent, among which Richard Biſhop of Bangor (from whoſe mouth our * Author wrote thoſe things) was one, he concluded and ſaid: Let me before I depart out of this Chappell die, and ſodainly be burnt with the fire of Hell, if I doe accept thereof either for ambition, or auarice; but only to reſtore the Empire (which God grant) to a better eſtate, eſtate, and to gouerne them, who haue willingly elected me for their Lord, in modeſt, iuſt and honorable manner. Theſe words exhaled ioyfull teares from many of the hearers, and the Ambaſſadors returned to deliuer the newes of this acceptance, who from thenceforth was King of Romans, that is, Emperour Elect, which title is vſed till they receiue the Crowne imperiall; though to all other purpoſes hee is Emperour, ſo that king of Romans ſeemes to anſwer to the Title of Cæſar, which vnder the ancient Roman Emperours was giuen to the heire apparant of the Empire, or Coadiutors. After the German Ambaſſadors were gone, the King permitteth his Brother to ſend ſome ouer to ſound the truth of the Electors and Peoples affections, which (in regard the Engliſh were originally Germans, and by late affinity incorporated, and for that Engliſh (ſaith Paris) was in a ſort agreeable to the Almaine tongue) they found entire, and with that certitude returne. The King of England hereby ſeemed to haue his deſignes for recouery of Normandy, greatly ſtrengthned, the Almaines and French hardly brooking one the other; but howſoeuer, ſure it is that his Brother the new King, had occaſion to ſpend the golden Oyle, which was ſo long in gathering, to maintaine the light of this Imperiall lampe; and without queſtion hee might bee liberall, for hee was reputed to poſſeſſe ſo much ready coyne, as would euery day for tenne yeares afforde him an hundreth Markes vpon the maine ſtocke, without reckoning his rents and reuenues in Germany, and the Engliſh dominions. (90) In the meane time, while his brothers royall preparations were in hand, the King being for a weekes ſpace at the Abbey of S. Albans, certaine maſters of Oxford brought a great complaint againſt the Biſhop of Lincolne, for ſome encroachments vpon the * auncient liberties of that Vniuerſitie, to whom the King was gratious, and aſſigned a day; and Mathew Paris, whom the King in honor of his learned paines, admitted euery day to his Table, and Chamber, ſaid to him vpon this Complaint; * My Liege, for Gods loue haue a care of the ſhaken State of the Church. The Vniuerſity of Paris (the Nurſe, and mother of ſo many holy Prelates) is not a little diſquieted. If at the ſame time the Vniuerſity of Oxford ſhould bee diſturbed, which is the ſecond Schoole of the Church, yea, the fundamentall baſe thereof, it is greatly to bee feared, leaſt the whole Church doe fall to ruine. Whereunto the King made anſwere, God forbid that ſhould happen at all, but chiefly in his dayes. Which the Parliament then at hand, he accordingly prouided for, to their contentation. The memory of the King ſeemes by this to haue beene excellent, for beſide that he recounted to Paris all the Kings of England which had beeene Canonized Saints, all the Princes Electors, and great Princes of Germany and Erance, hee called to minde the names of about two hundreth and fifty Baronies in England.

(91) At this Parliament, (which was exceeding great) holden at London, the King in ſight and view of all the people, brings forth his younger Sonne Edmund, attired like an Italian of Apulia, (which Country is a member of the Kingdome of Sicilia) and vſed this ſpeech: Behold here good people, my Son Edmund, whom God of his gracious goodneſſe hath called to the excellency of kingly dignity; how comely and wel-worthy he is of all your fauours, & how cruell and tyrannicall they are, who at this pinch, would deny him effectuall and timely helpe, both with aduice & money? The ſum of all was to draw a vaſt contribution from the Clergy for atchieuement of this ſhadow (it proued no better) into his Coffers. Neuertheleſſe he obtained a grant of aboue fiftie thouſand Markes, vpon couenant that the liberties of the Realme ſhould be really and finally once for euer eſtabliſhed: which was done. There were preſent in this Parliament ſix Archbiſhops, Canterbury, Yorke, Dublin, Collein, Meſſana in Sicilia, and Tarentum in Apulia. The politike Germans knew what they did in chooſing Richard their King, for they ſaw a cloud of gold and ſiluer would diſſolue it ſelfe into ſhowres among them at his arriuall; and all elections of ſtrangers turne to their profit, becauſe none is choſen that relies wholly vpon the rents of the Empire.

The King commends the cauſe of his Sonne Edmund for the kingdome of Sicilia.

Note that by this it appeares Edmund was not deformed as Hen. 4. did afterward alleadge.

(92) It was a worthy care in this King, that when by the prouiſion of his Brother Richard King of Romans, there arriued in the Riuer of Thames fifty ſaile of German Ships, laden with Corne, to relieue the great dearth, which then raigned through the Land, he cauſed proclamation to be made, That no Citizen of London ſhould buy any of that Corne to ſtore vp, which they were wont to doe, to the intent they might ſell it the dearer afterward, to ſuch as wanted. But no warning, prayers, aduiſes, nor ſenſe of wants were able to make him frugall of his expenſe; whereby hee was miſerably ſtreightned, neither would the Laity in Parliament contribute any thing, but (hammering ſome great attempts in their thoughts) in plaine words concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure ſuch (they called them) extorſions. Moreouer, they there vttered many grieuances, and Simon Earle of Leiceſter complained of the diſhonor and iniury done him by William de Valence, calling him Traitor; ſo that againſt the Seſſion to be holden vpon prorogation, hee, the Earle of Glouceſter, and Marſhall, confederated themſelues and (pretending the feare of ſtrangers, the Kings fauorites,) determined to come ſtrong to Oxford at Saint Barnabas day. They alſo ſent Meſſengers to the King of Fraunce, praying at leaſt ſo much aſſiſtance, as that he would not hinder the good purpoſe which they held of ordaining ordaining and ſetling the troubled eſtate of England. They had alſo taken order to watch the * Ports againſt ſtrangers. Thus they prepared to abate (as it ſeemed) or baniſh the loftineſſe and inſolency of the Poictouines and of other Forreiners, by whom the King was powerfully led, for they deſpaired of redreſſe at his hands, who like another Proteus (as Paris ſaith) tooke all ſhapes vpon him to ſerue his turnes, and then ſlipt out at his pleaſure, no promiſes, or ties, being ſtrong enough to hold him. Theſe were the beginnings of bloudy euils, and the ſeede-ſparkes of thoſe factious fires which afterward brake forth, from the ſight and ſenſe whereof, many thouſands were taken by death, whoſe mortall ſtroake of peſtilence raged ouer England, ſpecially among the poore, through ſcarcity of food.

* Matth. Paris. pag. 940.

(93) When the time appointed for the Parliament at Oxford was come, the ſeditious Earles and Barons (with whom *ſundry Biſhops had taken Counſell againſt the King, the Lords annointed) repaired thither, and ſternely propounded ſundry trayterous Articles to the king, to which they required his aſſent. The chiefe poynts were, That the King would vnfainedly keepe and obſerue the Charter of liberties, which he had ſo often granted, and ſworne to maintaine inviolable; That ſuch a one ſhould bee in the place of Chiefe Iuſtitiar, who would iudge according to right, without reſpect to poore, or rich, &c. Then they renewed their confederacy, ſolemnely ſwearing, That neither for life, nor death, nor loue, nor hate, they would be drawne to relent in their purpoſe, till they had cleared England (in which themſelues and their fore-fathers were borne) from vpſtarts and aliens, and had procured laudable Statutes. Thoſe turbulent Nobles had yet a further plot then all this; which was firſt broached (ſaith Mat: Weſtminſter) by the diſloyall Biſhops, which was, that 24. perſons ſhould there be choſen, to haue the whole adminiſtration of the King and State, and yearely appointment of all great Officers, reſeruing only to the king the higheſt place at meetings, and ſalutations of honour in publike places. And becauſe they would not be croſſed in their purpoſes, they came exquiſitely armed & appointed, that ſo the King & his Aliens ſhould be enforced, if they would not willingly aſſent. To all theſe their ordinations, the King and Prince Edward, was enforced to ſweare, for feare of perpetuall impriſonment, the traiterous Lords hauing, by an Edict, threatned death to all that reſiſted. Whereupon all the Peeres and Prelates tooke their Corporall Oath to be faithfull in this their infidelity, and made all who would abide in the Kingdome, to ſweare they would ſtand to the tryall of their Peeres: the Archbiſhops and Biſhops ſolemnely accurſing all that ſhould rebell againſt it. The * Monks themſelues deteſting this impudent treaſon, aske, with what forehead, eſpecially Prelates, durſt thus impaire the kingly Maieſty, expreſly againſt their ſworne fidelity to him? This coniuration they ſo proſecuted, that when William de Valence the Kings halfe-brother, denied with Oaths to render vp any Caſtle which was giuen him, the Earle of Leiceſter, and the reſt of the Barons anſwered, they would either haue his Caſtles or his head. This violent proceeding ſo terrified the Poictouines, that ſodainly they left Oxford, and ſhortly fled into France, where alſo the Barons had made them odious. Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marſhall, was made chiefe Iuſtitiar. The people, ſeemed wholly theirs, which made the Barons ſo rough and peremptory in all their conferences, that when the Lord Henry, ſonne to the King of Almain, refuſed to combine or take their oath, without his Fathers conſent, they roundly bad him know, That if his Father himſelfe would not hold with the Baronage of England, he ſhould not haue a furrow of earth among them. And leaſt any thing which might tend to their ſecurity ſhould ſeem to be omitted, they vſing the kings name, commanded London to ſtand vpon her guard, by keeping their Citie gates carefully ſhut, and by maintaining ſtrong watches night by night, vpon pretence of danger to the Realme through the practiſes of ſtrangers; and after they diſpatched thither certaine fit Agents, who in the Guilde-hall made knowne their commiſſion, which was directly to vnderſtand, Whether they would immutably adhere to the Barons and obey their conſtitutions, by manfully aiding and effectually ſupplying them in the common cauſe. Whereunto the Citizens condeſcended, binding themſelues thereunto vnder the publike ſeale of London.

(94) The Barons did as yet forbeare to declare, what thoſe reformatorie Prouiſions ſhould bee, becauſe the Earle of Glouceſter (a principall man among them) was in danger of death, whoſe ſicknes did perplex and ſuſpend their proceedings, and the manner of his maladie did put them in doubt of their owne ſafeties, making them grow in diſtruſt of their Cooks, their butlers, and ſewers, for the Earle his body breaing out into puſtules, and his haire, nailes, teeth and skinne it ſelfe, falling away, was (as many others, of which ſome died) thought to be poyſoned. But whither they were or no, the Poictouins & ſtrangers had the blame laid vpon them, to make them the more odious to the Commons. But the Earle partly recouered his health in time, by the benefit of medicines and diligent attendance. The * poiſons were ſaid to haue beene tempered in the houſe of Elias a Iew, afterward baptized. The King himſelfe perhaps would not haue beene ſorry, if that he, Simon Earle of Leiceſter and ſome few others of the Barons had beene with God, for howſoeuer his body was among them, yet his heart was not at quiet, which in this wiſe well appeared. For being in the moneth of Iune vpon the riuer of Thames in his Barge, the aire ſodainely grew darke, and there enſued a terrible ſhower with thunder and lightning, of which the King impatient commands himſelfe to bee ſet on land at the next place which was Durham houſe, whereas then, the Earle of Leiceſter lay. The Earle being therof certified came out to entertaine him, ſaying, Sir, why are you afraid? the tempeſt is now paſt: whereunto he anſwered with a ſeuere looke: I feare thunder and lightning aboue meaſure, but by the head of God, I doe more feare thee then all the thunder & lightning of the world. Whereunto the Earle replied: My Liege, it is iniurious & incredible, that you ſhould ſtand in feare of me, who haue alwaies beene loyall both to you and your Realme, whereas you ought to feare your enemies, ſuch as deſtroy the Realme, & abuſe you with bad Counſels. The Barons therefore remaining firme in their firſt purpoſe, ſend meſſengers abroad to will all ſuch as had beene wronged by the Kings halfe-brothers, and other Poictouines and ſtrangers, to preſent their grieuances to the Barons, and to proſecute them. Moreouer (becauſe ſundry other petty-tyrants of the Engliſh nation, encouraged by their example, had exceeded their limits, in oppreſſing their inferiours) they procured the King to appoint foure Knights Commiſsioners in euery Shire, to enquire of all ſuch iniuries, and certifie the ſame vnder their ſeales within a certaine time limitted.

(95) The Barons in the meane time neglect not their enterprize, at whoſe inſtance (principally of Hugh Bigod the new chiefe Iuſtitiar) Philip Lonel the Kings Treaſurer, for abuſes committed in the Kings Forreſts and game, about Stony-Stratford, and many Officers of the Exchequer, were likewiſe remoued, to giue roome to ſuch as the Barons better liked. The Sheriffes likewiſe of Shires, their practiſes and extortions, were diligently ſeene into, and it was ordained, that as well the giuers as the takers of bribes ſhould be ſeuerely puniſht. The Welſh ſeeing theſe round proceedings in England, the peace and reflouriſhment whereof they feared, laboured for reconciliation but could not then obtaine it.

(96) Richard King of Romans, hauing a deſire to ſee the king his brother, and his lands in England, not without a purpoſe to bring an Armie, or ſuch a number of men as might greatly ſtrengthen the King againſt the Barons, as they ſuſpected, was aduertiſed that that they prouided for his reſiſtance aſwell by Land as Sea. This made him, his Wife, and Sonne, to lay aſide that purpoſe, and to arriue in a priuate manner at Douer with a ſmall traine, in which there were onely two Earles, and about nine Knights. The King met him with great congratulation at the Sea ſide, but nor King, nor hee could bee ſuffered to enter into Douer Caſtle, becauſe (forſooth) it was the principall Key of England; for the ſafegard whereof they openly exacted an Oath of him at Canterbury in this manner. The holy Goſpels being laid vpon the Pulpit in the Chapter-houſe at Canterbury, the Barons reuerently brought in thither the Kings of England and of Almaine; then Richard Earle of Gloceſter (for Simon Earle of Leiceſter was gone with others into France, to deale with the King and States thereof about a perpetuall league) ſtanding in the midſt openly, and in humble ſort, cals Richard King of Romans vnto him, by the name onely of Richard Earle of Cornwall, who obeyed accordingly, to whom he diſtinctly miniſtred the Oath following: Heare all men, that I Richard Earle of Cornwall ſweare vpon the holy Goſpels, to be faithfull and forward to reforme with you the Kingdome of England, hitherto by the counſell of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an effectuall Coadiutor to expell the * Rebels and troubles of the Realme, from out the ſame. This oath will I obſerue vpon paine to forfeit all the lands I haue in England. On the other ſide (had the King known how to vſe it) there fell out ſuch diſſention between the Earles of Glouceſter & Leiceſter, that Leiceſter departed from England diſcontented, ſaying, he tooke no ioy to liue among men ſo mutable and deceitful. Neuertheleſſe ſuch means were vſed, that theſe two chiefe Captains of the Barons, brake not forth into any farther diuiſion. Thus whiles the Barons vſing the Kings name, diſpoſed of all things, and Simon de Montfort Earle of Leiceſter, was gone with others to tranſact with the French about an indiſſoluble league; the King himſelfe through deſire not to * bee interrupted with forraine matters, if warre ſhould riſe at home, or through want of money or better aduiſe, was induced (if not betrayed) to an act of little honour, though it carried with it the face of profit and ſetled quiet.

The King not ſuffered to enter his owne Caſtles.

(97) For (the affaires of the realme thus ſtrangely managed) the King in perſon ſailes ouer into Fraunce, there to demaund a peaceable reſtitution of ſuch Signiories as Philip and Lewis (Father of this Lewis) had iniuriouſly withdrawne from his Father King Iohn. The French replied, that no reſtitution was due for many reſpects, ſpecially, becauſe the * ancient grant made to Rollo the firſt Duke of Normandy, was not voluntary, but extorted by feare and force of Armes, in the daies of the weake ſtate of Fraunce. The King hauing * no diſpoſition to recouer his claimes by battle; and deſtitute of money wherewith to wage an Army, but principally for that his owne Peeres and people ſtood on their guard againſt him, did * vnwillingly ratifie a concluſion; the Articles whereof were, that the King of France ſhould quietly hold the Dukedome of Normandy, and Earledome of Aniou (* Main alſo, Tourain and Poictou) for * three hundred thouſand ſmall pounds of Tourain, and vpon promiſe to receiue other lands to the yeerely value of twenty thouſand pounds. Polydor ſaith, that the reputed limits of the Engliſh Pale in France, were from thenceforth the riuer of Charent in Xanctoing, and the mountaines Pyrenees; and that hee ſhould peaceably haue Angoumois, Quercy, and Limain, being Countries marching vpon Gaſcoigne, in lieu of the reſt, yet ſo as the king of England ſhould * hold them of the Crowne of France by homage and fealty. Vpon theſe Articles the King acquitted, and for euer renounced all his challenge to Normandy, and the other lands, and thenceforth abridged his Stile, and changed his Seale, vſing a Scepter in place of a Sword: whereon theſe Monkiſh and mockiſh verſes were written.

(98) The King (at theſe vnworthy rates) hauing ſecured himſelfe from the French, labours to vindicate the Regall power out of the vſurping Barons hands (whoſe ouer-toppings at home had driuen him to thoſe forraine indignities,) alleadging, that the Oath which his Sonne and hee had taken at Oxford, was voide, in regard it was compulſory, that the Barons alſo, who pretended the profite of the Realme, ſought onely their owne honour and gaine, contrary to their decrees. was notwithſtanding brought about againe by the Queenes ſpeciall diligence; and Doner and Rocheſter Caſtles (whither hee went in perſon) are deliuered vnto him. This makes him reſolue to purſue the Barons; the rather alſo for that the French King (who much condemned the Barons vniuſt courſes) had promiſed his aſſiſtance. Henry therefore thruſts out the Barons Chancellor, and Chiefe Iuſticiar, placing Walter Merton and Philip Baſſet, men of much more loyall affections in their roomes. The * cauſe was heard at Amiens, where he gaue iudgement with the King of England againſt the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford, to bee vtterly void: prouided neuertheleſſe, that the Charter of Liberties which King Iohn had made to the Engliſh nation, ſhould in no ſort bee thereby infringed. This prouiſo animated Simon Earle of Leiceſter, and the Barons, to maintaine all the Statutes of Oxford, (becauſe they were pretendedly founded vpon that Charter) notwithſtanding that iuſt iudgement which King Lewis had giuen. The ſecret confederacy with Lewelin Prince of Wales, miniſtred to the Barons no little encouragement; who about this time waſted the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales. This iudgement of the French King did much diſaduantage the Barons, of whom diuers being drawne with perſwaſions, gifts, and promiſes, reuolted from Simon Montfort. There was now a taking of Townes and Priſoners on all hands. Prince Edward (who now was wholly for his Father, in deſpite of the Barons) takes the Caſtle of Briſtol, and fines the City at a thouſand pounds. Simon Montfort executeth his greateſt reuenges vpon the Queenes friends which were Aliens, not ſparing the Kings. Marching forward, he recouers Gloſter-Caſtle, enters Worceſter and Bridgenorth; laſtly, ſurprizeth the Ile of Ely, ſubduing that faſtneſſe or fenny ſtrength to the Barons vſe. Sir Iohn Manſel the Kings Councellour, fearing the euent of things, flies ſecretly from the Tower where the King was. Henrie ſonne to the King of Almain, was after this taken by the Barons. Meane-while Prince Edward fortifies Windſor-Caſtle with Strangers. Mutuall wearineſſe at length begat a deſire of peace, and the * King had yeelded that the Statutes of Oxford ſhould ſtand: but the Queene was vttetly againſt it, not without cauſe; for it did enfeeble the arbitration which the French King had made. The Queenes oppoſition in this poynt was knowne to the Londoners; which put the baſer ſort into ſo lewd a rage, that ſhee being to ſhoote the Bridge from the Tower toward Windſor, they with durt and ſtones and villanous words forced her to returne. Prince Edward vnder the conduct of the Biſhop of Worceſter, came from the Caſtle of Briſtol (by reaſon of quarrell betweene his men of warre and the Burgers) and contrary to his promiſe entred into Windſor-Caſtle; but afterward going forth to meet Simon Montfort at Kingſton vpon Thames, with purpoſe to offer peace, the ſaid Simon got Windſor-Caſtle, & would not permit him to depart. At London yet in a Parliament, matters were pieced againe, and the Kings ſide grew ſtronger daily.

(99) There were with him his brother King of Romans, his Son Edward, William de Valence (whom Prince Edward had brought out of France) Iohn Comyn of Scotland, with a multitude of valiant Scots, (whoſe King was Henries ſonne in law,) Iohn de Baliol Lord of Galloway, Robert de Brus, &c. with whom hee marcheth from London to Oxford, where the Rendeuou of his friends and forces was appointed. The King meaning to make that place (where his chiefe blow was giuen him) his chiefe ſeate to conſult for remedies, diſmiſſed thence all the Students, by reaſon of their multitude, * being aboue 15000. (ſaith William Riſhanger who then liued) of thoſe only whoſe names were entred into the Matriculation book, amongſt whom being ſo many young Nobles, the King doubted how they might be affected to the Barons. Whereupon many of them went to Northampton, where then the Barons were ſtrong; and thither the King comming with his hoaſt, and breaking in at the Towne-walls vpon Paſſion-Sunday, encountred his enemies, amongſt whom the * Students of Oxford had a banner by themſelues aduanced right againſt the King, and they did more annoy him in the fight, then the reſt of the Barons: which the King (who at length preuayled) had vowed ſharpely to reuenge, but that his Councellors told him, thoſe Students were the ſonnes and kindred of the Great-men of the Land, whom if he puniſhed, euen the Nobles who now ſtood for him, would take Armes againſt him. The King there tooke Simon Montfort the younger, and foureteene other principall Barons and * Knights Banerets, forty other Knights, beſides Eſquiers, &c. Encouraged with this ſucceſſe, hee aduanceth the Standard royall toward Nottingham, burning and waſting the Barons Lands whereſoeuer he came. To diuert this tempeſt, Simon Montfort haſteneth to London, and attempts the taking of Rocheſter-Caſtle, which Iohn Earle of Warren defended for the King: who comming to raiſe the ſiege, takes Kingſton-Caſtle, which belonged to the Earle of Glouceſter; then vnexpectedly falling vpon ſuch as maintayned the ſiege of Rocheſter, while Simon was abſent, kils very many, and ſcatters the reſt. Then ſeiſeth hee the Caſtle of Tunbridge, and therein the Counteſſe of Glouceſter, whom, notwithſtanding he nobly ſet at large, as profeſſing not to warre againſt Ladies; from thence the Cloud of power borne vpon the wings of indignation, ſpeedes to Winchelſea, and receiues the Cinque-Portmen to grace, ſetling at laſt in Lewis, where himſelfe reſted in the Priorie, and his ſonne in the Caſtle, whither the Barons ſent Letters to him, proteſting their loyall obſeruance to his perſon, but all hoſtility to their enemies which were about him.

(100) But the King flaming with deſire of reuenge, ſets ſlight by theſe vowed (but fained) fidelities; and returnes a full defiance as to Traitors, profeſſing that he takes the wrong of his friends, as his owne, and their enemies as his. The King of Almaine, Prince Edward, with other of the Kings chiefe friends, ſent their like letters of defiance. The Barons, loath to let it come to the hazardous and vnkind triall of ſteele, (though they then encamped about ſixe miles from Lewis,) not acquitting themſelues in this repulſe, iterate their meſſage, with an offer to pay to the King thirtie thouſand pounds, in ſatisfaction of ſuch hurts as their people had done through the Realme; ſo as the Statutes of Oxford might ſtand. The king of Almaine (whoſe honour they had toucht, and ſpoild part of his inheritances) hindred all harkening to any their offers.

(101) It came to a battell; wherein Simon de Montford commands his trayterous Army to weare white Croſſes on breaſt and backe, to ſhew they fought for Iuſtice; great was the effuſion of bloud on both parts; chiefly of the Scots vpon the Kings ſide, and of the Londoners vpon the Earles ſide; whoſe Battalion, (lead by the Lord Segraue,) Prince Edward moſt furiouſly charged, and had the execution of them for about foure miles, which he purſued the more bloudily, in reuenge of the extreame diſgrace which they had offered vpon London-Bridge to the Queene his Mother, and after that the Garriſon of Tunbridge followes, and ſlew many at Croyden. But while the Prince ſpent himſelf in that reuenge, his Father (who, hauing his Horſe ſlaine vnder him, had yeelded himſelf priſoner to Simon de Montfort) his vncle the king of Romans, and others great Peeres were taken, and the whole hope of that day loſt. There fell in all on both ſides, about fiue thouſand. Prince Edward returning from the ſlaughter of the Londoners, would

The King of Almaines Letter, & Prince Edwards.

The Barons ſend the ſecond time.

Simon Earle of Leiceſter takes the Kings of England, and of Almaine in the battel at Lewis.

Prince Edward and Henry sonne to the King of Romans yeeld by composition.

would haue re-enforced the Battaile, but the Barons offered peace; which vpon the next day was concluded for the preſent, ſo that Prince Edward and Henry Son to the King of Romans, ſhould alſo render themſelues priſoners, and the two kings, till ſuch time as all quarrels might receiue an happier concluſion by calme deliberation. Thus was Simon Earle of Leiceſter in poſſeſſion of both the Kings and of their elder ſonnes; ſo fortunate may Treaſon and Rebellion bee for a time, but in the end it ſpeeds as it deſerues.

An. 1265. An. Reg. 49. The Earle of Leiceſter carries the King about till he had gotten all the chiefe ſtrengths of the Realme.

(102) By this aduantage this Kingly Rebell got all the chiefe Caſtles of the kingdome into his hand, leading his Soueraigne as his Priſoner about the Country (yet with all outward reſpect and honour) the rather to procure a more quiet ſurrender. The King of Romans he impriſoned in the Tower, Prince Edward and the Lord Henry in Douer. The Earle feeling now his owne greatneſſe, began to be leſſe tractable; neither could the Popes authority interpoſing it ſelfe for the King, preuaile. For as the Pope by Apoſtolike ſentence before had abſolued the King and others from his Oath to the Prouiſions of Oxford, ſo now he ſent his * Cardinall Legate to excommunicate all the fauorers of thoſe Acts, and impugners of the King; but theſe men * hauing the materiall ſword to truſt vnto, made no reckoning of the Spirituall, pretending they appealed to the Pope, or to better times, or a generall Councell, or to God himſelfe: ſo great account made theſe croſſed ſouldiers of the Popes curſe. Notwithſtanding the loyall bloud of Roger de Mortimer, and many other high-ſpirited men of Armes, could not brooke their Kings ſo baſe vſage & dangerous eſtate, but make head in vaine. For Simon treacherouſly combines himſelfe with Lewelin Prince of Wales, and with their ioynt forces takes Hereford Caſtle; thether they remoue Prince Edward from Douer. The loyall band was hereby compelled to capitulate, and deliuer hoſtages. O the fearefull poynt, to which England was brought at this preſent, but God (in whoſe protection it was) deliuered it. Simon and the Earle of Gloceſter fall at debate about their diuidend & ſhares in the ſpoiles, (for what euer they pretended for the Kingdome, their owne greatnes & gaine was the motiue,) and ſomewhat alſo the vnequall altitude of his ſaid partner the Earle of Leiceſter, together with the perill of his Country moued him. Who thereupon confederates with Roger Mortimer, and his aſſociates, to whom not long after Iohn Earle of Warren, Surrey and Suſſex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembroke with others are ioyned; & not long after Prince Edward by eſcape from the Caſtle of Hereford, commeth in ſafety to Wigmore. There were that laboured to attone the two Earles of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, but offence and indignation had taken too deepe root. Meanewhile thou, O Henry art ſhewed vp and down by the Arch-rebellious Earle of Leiceſter, to countenance thine owne deſtruction.

Prince Edward hauing eſcaped ioynes with the Earle of Gloceſter.

(103) The Prince therefore ſeeing that he muſt reſolutely ſtand for the liberty of the Realme and of his Father, friends and poſterity, raiſeth an Armie, confederates himſelfe with the people and Counties of Hereford, Worceſter, Shropſhire & Cheſter. Gloceſter he enters by force, and driues the defendants into the Caſtle, which after yeelds. Simon Montfort with Lewelin Prince of Wales, doe in the meane time ſpoile their enemies lands in * Monmouth and Glamorganſhires, the King in perſon, not in ſpirit, being preſent. Prince Edward, and the Earle of Gloceſter on the other ſide, ſpeed to the Caſtle of Kenelworth, kept againſt them by Simon ſonne of the Earle of Leiceſter; there they intercept the Earle of Oxford with about thirteene Knights Bannerets before they could reach the Caſtle, whither they were haſtning. Newes came then that the Earle of Leiceſter was returned with the king in his company out of Southwales, neere to Worceſter. Thither the Prince aduanceth to fight with him. The Earle hearing of his approach, encampes at Eueſham with his whole power. Vpon the third of Auguſt the noble Edward ſets out of Worceſter, and ſtrikes betweene Simon Montfort and his way to Kenelworth, and the next day turnes backe toward Eueſham; the Earle of Gloceſter with his force, and Roger de Mortimer (as they had agreed) with his battalion, drawing thither by two other wayes; ſo that Simon thus ſhut vp and encloſed, muſt either fight or yeeld. They ioyne in battaile in a goodly large field before the Towne of Eueſham; where the Earles hoſt being aſſailed on all ſides, was with much ſlaughter (of the Welſh eſpecially) vtterly in the end diſtreſſed and diſcomfited. At the houre of his death it thundered and lightned, and ſo great a darkneſſe ſpread the skie, that men were amazed. The Earles head, (which was ſent to Worceſter Caſtle to the Lady Mortimer) his hands, and feet, were chopt off. In this cruell battaile the King himſelfe (being wounded vnawares with a Iauelin) was almoſt ſlaine. Let vs now behold how this victory is vſed. The king being thus reſtored to liberty, cals a Parliament at Wincheſter, by authority whereof hee ſeiſeth into his hands the Charters and freedomes of the City of London, and of many other Townes for their Rebellion. Thoſe that were taken in the battaile are committed to ſafe cuſtody, and all ſuch as had been vpon the Earles ſide were diſinherited, a rateable diſtribution being made of their eſtates to the Kings well-deſeruing friends. Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Earles ſonnes, were chiefe of the attainted; their mother the Counteſſe with all her goods was ſent in ſafety out of England neuer to returne. Simon the eldeſt brother ſought to preſerue himſelfe, and the remaines of his Fathers misfortunes in the Ile of Axholme.

Simon Earle of Leiceſter encloſed by the Princes Armies, is ſlaine at Eueſham in Worceſterſhire.

Ann. 1266. An. Reg. 50.

(104) The King meaning to take all refuge from him, is together with his brother the King of Romans, Ottobon the Popes Legate, (who was lately arriued) and a puiſſant armie, at Northampton, with purpoſe to oppreſſe him by warre. Simon had friends about the King, but the Earle of Gloceſter maligning his reſtitution to full grace, it was concluded (vpon his ſubmiſſion) that hee ſhould liue in exile, and for his maintenance receiue onely fiue hundreth markes by the yeere. But the Caſtle of Kenelworth would not yeeld, driuing the King to an halfe yeeres ſiege; who alſo in the end was content to giue the garriſon pardon for life and limme, licenſing it to part with bag and baggage. In the meane while, the other outlawes, and diſinherited men, made ſundry excurſions out of the Ile of Elie. Temperate men, deſirous to pacifie all theſe euils, would gladly haue had the King to pardon thoſe tranſgreſſions, and reſtore their lands vpon reaſonable fines. This propoſition found a ſowre enemie of Roger Mortimer, who had by the Kings gift gotten much of their Land; which moued the Earle of Gloceſter (who fauoured the other courſe) to indignation and diſtruſt, ſo that he withdrew himſelfe. Not long after which, he by his meſſengers beſought the King, to remoue ſtrangers from about him, to ſee that the Statutes of Oxford were obſerued through the Kingdome, and to keepe ſuch promiſes as he had made at Eueſham: Otherwiſe the king muſt not marueile, if he did that which himſelfe thought beſt. The Legate Cardinall Ottobon, about the ſame time (to hinder the growth of any new rebellion) excommunicated the biſhops of Wincheſter, Worceſter, London & Chicheſter for hauing adhered to Simon Montfort, and alſo declared that the Clergie were to pay their tenths, for ſeuen yeeres next enſuing, to the King. On the other ſide, all the vndone and diſinherited men (except the ſonnes of Simon Montfort and Robert Earle of Derby) were offered to be put to ranſome, and for certaine fines to be reſtored to their Lands; but they required to haue them without redemption, expoſtulating with the King and Legate many grieuances. When words had no better operation, the King and Prince Edward beſiege the Ile of Elie on all ſides. This being knowne to the Earle of Gloceſter, who (although he had vnder his ſeale promiſed neuer to take armes againſt the King and Prince, but only in his owne defence) gathers a for ce in Wales in fauour of the diſinherited, marcheth vp to London and taketh it, the Citizens fauouring him. Then commands he the Popes Legate, who lodged in the Tower, to yeeld vp the ſame; but he, as taking no knowledge of any ſuch matter, repaired quietly to Pauls, there, by preaching to ſtirre vp people againſt the enemies of Chriſt in the Holy-land. Peace enſued not long after, by mediation of the King of Romans, and the noble Lord Philip Baſſet, the Earle binding himſelfe in ten thouſand markes to the King, neuer to mooue any tumult. Lewelin Prince of Wales, who had greatly ſupported the Earle of Leiceſters rebellion, for *thirty two thouſand pounds ſterling was reſtored to foure Cantreds, which the King had taken from him in the warre, and reconciled.

(105) Domeſticke peace now beginning to ſhine in the Engliſh Hemiſphere Prince Edward his brother, the Lord Edmund, the Earle of Glouceſter, with many other Noblemen of England, with intent of a more honourable warfare, take the Croſſe vpon them at Northampton, by the deliuery of Ottobon, who not long after returned into Italie. Then was the kings peace proclaimed through England, all men being vpon paine of death commanded to forbeare to make ſpoiles, or take booties violently, as they of late had been accuſtomed. The Prince, ſeeing the Realme thus acquitted, doth the more willingly (hauing his Fathers conſent) yeeld to goe with Lewis King of France, into the Holy-land, who, toward his furniture in that voyage, lends him thirty thouſand markes: for aſſurance whereof, the Prince morgageth Aquitaine vnto him. But what true ſetled peace may wee iudge it, when Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey, the Kings halfe-brother, (vpon the increaſe of words betweene them) durſt kill Alan le Zouch the chiefe Iuſtice, with his owne hand in Weſtminſter Hall? A plaine and fearefull example of fauourites potency. That all things yet might not run out of ſquare, the King held a Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes called of Marlborough were enacted. The old king & his Queene henceforward enioyed the bleſſing of a quiet eſtate at home, with the more leiſure to pray therein for their Sons faire ſucceſſe in Paleſtine, whoſe vertues had there raiſed an admiration of him among the Infidels. That quiet neuertheleſſe was a little interrupted by an incendiary outrage at Norwich, where the Citizens ſet on fire the Priorie Church. The king being kindled with another kinde of fire, ſware hee would in perſon ſee a reuenge taken; and diſpatching firſt away Sir Thomas Triuet, (before whom a great multitude were found guilty, and condemned to bee drawne and hanged) himſelfe, hauing in his company one Biſhop and the Earle of Glouceſter, followed; where beholding the deformed ruines, he could hardly refraine from teares. The Biſhop hauing therefore excommunicated the nocent, and the King condemned the Towne in three thouſand markes, toward the re-edification of that Church, as alſo to pay one hundreth pounds for a Cup weighing ten pounds in gold, he purpoſed to returne toward London. This publike act of zeale to religion and Iuſtice, was the laſt which he did, as a King; for now he was come to that, which hee was to enter into as a mortall man: At the Abbey of S. Edmund in Suffolke, he fell grieuouſly ſicke, where while hee lay, * hee cauſed the Earle of Glouceſter to be ſworne to keepe the Realme for his Sonne; the Prelates, Earles, and Barons of the Land, being aſſembled to be preſent at his departure. Therefore after he had in Chriſtian manner prepared his ſoule, by acknowledging his ſinnes, and receiuing fit ſpirituall conſolations, he rendred vp the ſame to his Redeemer. His Will was ſhort, for his Creditors and the Poore ſhared all his goods. The ſpace of time which he raigned, is almoſt an old mans age, and abſolutely the longeſt number of yeares, that euer any King of England raigned, not excepting Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King, if (which is *written by ſome) he raigned fifty ſixe yeares, and as many dayes more, as are between the feaſt of Simon & Iude, and *Saint Edmund the Archbiſhop, which are about twenty. A Prince whoſe * deuotion was greater then his diſcreation, as we ſee in his permitting the depredation of himſelfe and his whole kingdome by Papall ouer-ſwayings, the errour of whoſe Gouernment, concurring with the tumultuous treaſons of his Nobles, did precipitate him into many miſchiefes, out of which yet God almighty did ſtrangely deliuer him; for if he had not beene diuinely protected, there is no cauſe for a reaſonable man to doubt, but that his end had proued as headlong, as ſome of his owne, and his Barons actions ſeemed to threaten. The royall remaines of this happily-dying Prince were with all the due pompe of exequies interred in Weſtminſter, the great & ſumptuous new worke whereof he began, but finiſhed not; the deſcription of whoſe life, being full of diuerticles and abrupt paſſages, as a maze or labyrinth, here at laſt hath found a place of reſt for it ſelfe and vs.

CHAPTER X.

An. 1273.

EDward, who followed King Henrie in wearing the Engliſh Crowne, but farre out-went him in all regall vertues, was abroad at the time of his fathers death, ſtill purſuing his high deſires for the Holy Warres: wherein what he performed, (being yet but a Prince) againſt the publique enemies of Chriſtians, it ſhall not be impertinent to touch, before wee come to his actions as a King; hauing already remembred, with what valour and felicity he had ſubdued his Fathers domeſticke enemies, ſetled the peace of his kingdome, and re-eſtabliſhed the raines of Soueraigntie in his Fathers hands, which thoſe potent Rebels had formerly extorted.

(2) King Lewis of France, whoſe perſwaſions had enflamed this noble-ſpirited Prince to aſſociate him in this glorious quarrell, hauing firſt ſet forth for the enterpriſe, lay now in ſiege of Tunis in Africa; where Prince Edward with all his forces arriuing, the French King (greatly rejoycing in his wiſhed preſence,) together with the King of Nauarre, and other Princes of his Army, went forth to meete him, and receiued him in the kiſſe of Peace. This place which they beleaguered, was (as then) not great, yet by reaſon of the ſituation, it *greatly impeached the Chriſtians in their paſſages through thoſe Seas; being built out of the ſcattered ribs, and waſted ruines of that mighty and famous City Carthage, riual once in Majeſtie and Ambition with ancient Rome, as contending with her about the Empire of the World. Therefore to ſecure the Mediterranean Seas, it was thought neceſſarie to beginne that enterpriſe for Aſia, with this in Africa; but not long after Lewis yeelding vp his holy Soule to GOD at the ſiege, and ſickneſſe (by reaſon of the heates in thoſe Regions, for it was Auguſt) raigning in in the Christian Campe, Charles King of Sicilie, whom Lewis (before his decease) had sent for, to take charge of the whole enterprise, arriues; and after sharpe re-enforcement of the siege, (where Edward gaue frequent proofe of his great valour and prudence,) Charles is content to forbeare extremitie, (to which the Sarazens were brought) vpon capitulations with them, contrary to Edwards minde, being wholly set to subdue, conuert or roote them out.

Prince Edward vnwilling to any truce with the Sarazens.

(3) Yet the points of the treaty & truce (though graunted for many yeeres) carried shew of honour, being these: 1. That all Christian Captiues should be set free without ransome: That in the Cities of that Kingdome, the Christian faith might freely be taught: 3. That all such as were willing, might freely receiue sacred Baptisme: 4. That the Sarazens should repay to the Christian Kings, their charges: 5. That the King of Tunis should remaine tributarie to the King of Sicilie. The siege hereupon was raised, to the griefe and indignation of Edward, who would not (as is reported) partake nor share in any of the Treasure, which by reason of the truce was payed by the Sarazens, as accounting it to be wickedly gotten, and contrary to the Tenour of the vow, which for the honour and aduauncement of Christian Religion had beene made. The euent also seeming to confirme no lesse; for the wrath of Heauen (saith our * Author) pursued King Charles, brother to the late King Lewis, and finding him out vpon the Sea in his returne toward Sicilie, tooke seuere reuenge by terrible weather, as well vpon him, as almost his whole Army, which perished in the waters, together with the impious treasure brought from Tunis, and all other his furniture of State and Houshold. Which when Prince Edward vnderstood, he sware, By the Bloud of our Lord, that though all his Companions in Armes and Country-men should abandon him, yet hee and Fowin his * Lackey alone would enter into *Ptolomais, and keepe the vow which he had made, whiles soule and body held together. A noble resolution, and as faithfully performed; but not with so small attendance; for the English hearing his feruent asseueration, promised with one heart to accompanie him, and that (in all likely-hood) the more willingly, becaus it is not obserued, that the tempest had any way damnified Edward, or his fellowship. He forthwith therefore sets saile toward Acon, into which he entred safe not aboue foure daies before the City should haue beene yeelded to the Sarazens, from which precipitation these succors out of England withheld it. The Sultan of Babylon, who lay about Acon with a puissant hoast, and had begun to assault the breaches; hearing this, not long after raised his siege, & without the fruition of his desire withdrew to his owne Dominions.

(4) Edward vndoubtedly was not more tall of personage, then stout of courage, and vpon trust thereof, doing some things, which perhaps a Prince of his hopes, and fortunes, might with good reason haue forborne. His vndaunted courage against those Infidels may be gessed by the like against a domestick Rebell. Among those who were out-lawed for Rebellion and Treason, after the Battell of Euesham for partaking with Simon Earle of Leicester, was one Sir Adam Gurdon a Knight of the parts about Winchester, who with certaine his Complices kept out of the way of the Kings officers, but made the Kings high-way betweene Wilton and Fernham, (which by reason of woods and windings was fit to shelter enemies) very dangerous for such as meant to passe, but doing most mischiefe to the lands and goods of such as were the Kings friends. Edward hearing of this mans singular courage, gets intelligence of a fit time, and comes vpon him with a strong band of followers, but he, nothing terrified, prepares himselfe to fight for his life to the last gaspe. The Prince hereupon commaunds that none of his men should dare to interrupt their combate, and forthwith with equall courage exchanged mightie blowes without winning ground each of other. Edward delighted with the brauery of Adams spirit, and proofe of his man-hood, bad him yeeld, promising him life, and his Lands againe; who presently throwing away his weapons, enioyed the full benefit of Prince Edwards promise. The happinesse of that age, wherein Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much assurance in fight, might somewhat excuse the Prince from the note of temerity, which otherwise, in hazarding his princely person against a priuate Gentleman, he could hardly haue escaped. But here at Acon he refused no occasion of putting forth the naturall strengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreat the most honourable opportunities were subtracted.

Edwards Wife deliuered of a daughter at Acon.

Reade Turkish Hist. pag. 120.

(5) All this while did that renowned and vertuous Ladie, Elenor Wife of Prince Edward, endure with him an inseparable companion of all his fortunes, and was at Acon deliuered of a Daughter, baptized there by the name of Ioan. But if God had not better prouided for him, shee was not likely to haue enjoyed any longer the deare company of her louing Lord and Husband. Amongst that bloudy Sect of Sarazens, called Assassini, who, without feare of torments, vndertake (vpon commaund of their * Superior) the murther of any eminent Prince, impugning their irreligion, was one Anzazim, often vsed by the Sarazen Admirall of Ioppe, as a Messenger betweene him and Edward, whom the Admiral pretended exceedingly to honour for his heroicke parts of minde and body. The desperate wretch by this employment getting credite and accesse, vpon his insinuation of certaine secrets to be imparted, Prince Edward commanded all men to voide the Chamber, when looking out of a window, the Assassine sodainly with a poysoned Knife giues him three wounds, two in the arme, and one neere the arme-pit; whom Edward presently with his foot threw to the Earth, wrung the Knife from the Traytour, (not without wounding himselfe in the hand,) and with the tressell of a Table smote out his braines. Then calling in his people, he commaunds that the body of the Villaine should be hanged vp ouer the Cities Wall, and a liue Dogge with him. The Admirall hearing of this trayterous attempt, is * said to haue sighed for sorrow, for that he neuer knew thereof; but meant himselfe to haue become a Christian. But when the Christians vnderstood of this cursed assault vpon the person of so renowned a Prince, they meant in reuenge thereof, to haue forthwith inuaded the Pagans whersoeuer. But the Prince (whose first care was the safetie of Christians) said, I forbid you on the behalfe of God, that none of you yet presume to infest the Pagans Army, becaus many of our people are gone to visit the holy Sepulchre, who shall euery one of them be murthered by the Sarazens, if they shall now sustaine any (though but small) vexation at our hands. The second care was of the wounds; which by reason of the enuenomed blade were feared to be mortall; wherein the Lady Elenor gaue so rare example of conjugall affection, as her immortall memory doth justly impart glory to that whole Sex. For when no medicine could extract the poyson, she did it with her Tongue, licking daily, while her Husband slept, his ranckling wounds, whereby they perfectly closed, and yet her selfe receyued no harme; so soueraigne a medicine is a wiues Tongue, annoynted with the vertue of louely affection.

Edwards voluntary single fight with Sir Adam Gurdon.

(6) Thus while Edward abode in forraine parts for the generall seruice of Christianity, against the encreasing Enemies thereof, (contending then to that lamentable Greatnesse, wherein our vnhappy times behold them;) his Father King Henrie dyes, and prince Edward had the defect of his presence supplyed by the faith and care of such venerable and noble persons, as his Father left behinde him at his death. Therefore Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury, Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter, with other the chiefe chiefe Prelates and Peeres of the Land, assembling together at the New-Temple in London, acknowledged and proclaymed absent Edward for their Soueraigne Liege Lord; and by the assent of his Mother, the Queene Dowager, prouided for the common affaires of the King, and the good estate of the Kingdome. The first newes of his Fathers death were brought vnto him, when after his returne from the Holy-Land (which seruice he was * enforced to forsake, hauing long in vaine expected the promised aides of Christians, and Tartars,) he rested himselfe in Sicilia, with Charles the King thereof; where to the immortall commendation of his pietie, and filiall affection (rare in Princes) it is recorded, that the death of his Sonne and Heire, comming first to his eare, and afterward of the King his Father, he much more sorrowed his Fathers departure, then his Sonnes: whereat King Charles greatly maruailed, and demaunding the reason, had of him this answere; The losse of Sonnes is but light, becausе they are multiplied euerie day: but the death of Parents is irremediable, becausе they can neuer bee had againe.

* Paul. Aemyl. in Lud. 9.

An.D.1274. (7) Now, whether it were the terrour of such reuenge as followed the captiuation of his valiant Predecessor King Richard, or his owne wiser carriage, or the calmer condition of the times, or all of them together, which secured him in his returne: certaine it is, that hee trauelled in great safetie and honour ouer-Land from Sicilia to Rome, where he was met vpon the way with all the Cardinals, gratulating the honourable succesſe of his Cheualrie against the Turkes, his safe returne, and new Kingdome. At his instance, Pope Gregorie * excommunicated the bloudy-handed Guy Montfort (becausе * his person could not easily be gotten, by reason of his Greatnesse, and power) with all his receiuers, and (vntill amends were made) put their whole Dominions vnder interdict, for that the said Guy, (sonne to Simon, late Earle of Leicester, slain at the battel of Euesham) in reuenge of his Fathers death (* for which he mortally hated all King Henries race,) had most butcherly murthered * Henrie of Almaine, King Edwards neere kinsman, vpon his returne toward England, in the raigne of the late King Henrie, as he was deuoutly seruing God in the Church at Viterbo in Italie; which horrible act induced a * judicious Author to suspect, that Guy also had a hand in that Assassination on Edward, who had slaine his Father. This Guy being afterward taken by the Admirall of Arragon, to gratifie King Edward, was kept in prison, & the death of Henrie reuenged * with his. From Rome hee iournyed through the Cities of Italie, where he was generally entertained with exceeding ioy and honour; and as he was * entring into Sauoy, at the stoope, or descent of the Alpes, very many of the Prelates, and Peeres of England met him, acknowledging their gladnesse for his safetie, and their duties to his Soueraigntie. In his passage, he gaue notable proofe of his great prowesse and strength at a Turnament (or rather * battel) against * the Earle of Chabloun, and his Burgundians: for the said Count being a gallant man at Armes, after many blowes with the Sword betweene King Edward and him, throwing away his weapon, grasped the King about the Gorget, and hung vpon him with the weight of his masse body, in hope to cast him to the Earth; but the King, sitting vpright, without any bending, put Spurres to his lusty Horse, and lifted the Count so hanging about his necke, quite from his Saddle, carrying him away, till he had forceably shooke him off to the ground, who recouering himselfe, & comming to redeeme his disgrace, had such entertainement, as he was contented to yeeld. In our effeminate and degenerous age, to omit such an atchieuement of a King of England in his owne person, had beene hainous and piaculum. Thus his renowne encreasing with his progresse, he had magnificent entertainement in France, of Philip the king, to whom (vpon condition to haue such territories restored, as were promised to his Father King Henrie, when he sold Normandie to the French) he did homage for such Signiories, as he held of the Crowne of France.

(8) And as well to shew his owne moderation & princely temperance, (a vertue which makes euery man a King in himselfe, and Kings like to Gods) as also his reuerence to the Crown of France, whose homager he was for his transmarine Dominions, Guasco de Biern, a valiant man of Armes, being in actuall rebellion against King Edward in his Dutchie of Gascoigne, was admitted to appeale for triall of his pretended causes to the French King, as the superior Lord. Many of King Edwards friends and Counsellors were vtterly aduerse to this fauour; as well becausе the said Guasco had drawne the King to no smal charge, and labor, as also for that now he was brought by strait siege to such extremities, as that he could no longer hold out, and himselfe, hauing all that while put his confidence in walls of stone; and the weapons poynt; there was also little reason to allow him an ordinary ciuill triall of his pretexts for taking armes; and many perhaps, both thought the example prejudicious to King Edward and his Succesſors, by giuing way to such appeales, and distrusted the iustice of the French Court: Contrary to all which, the king decreed, and it was fortunate with him; for Guasco (not long after) was condemned in France, and sent with * an Halter about his necke, to prostrate himselfe to iustice, or mercy, at King Edwards feete in England; who pardoned him the forfeiture of life, & (when hee had for certaine yeeres kept him prisoner at Wincheſter) set him at libertie, and sent him backe to his own, who remained for euer after gratefully firme and loyall.

(9) King Edward (his transmarine affaires thus being setled) arriued in England, where he was after so long desirings most joyfully welcome, and there, in the Church of Westminster (the magnificent new worke of his deceased Father, who had with great cost, and after aboue fiftie yeeres spent therein, almost finished the same) he and his deareſt Elenor were annointed, and crowned by * Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterburie. (10) The finall abolishment of succeſſion of the Welsh bloud in the principality, or chiefedom of Wales now ensued: but yet (as great matters vse) not first without some time, and certaine degrees. The originall was this; King Edward hauing sent for Lewelin Prince of Wales to his Coronation, there to doe him homage; he, excusing the same, was againe (for that cause) admonished to repaire to the Kings Parliament at Westminster: whither likewise he forbare to come, pretending it was danger to his person, but * directing his excuse to the Archbishops of Canterburie and Yorke, and their Suffragans, professed his readineſse, if it would please the King, eyther to send a Commission for taking his oath, and fealtie, (who bare him a deepe displeasure, euer * since Lewelin had put him, being then but Earle of Chester, to the worse) or else, to appoint some indifferent place, or giue to him for hostages the * Kings sonne, & Robert Earle of Gloceſter, with Robert Burnell the Kings Chancellour. But King Edward dissembling the arrogancy of the demand for the present, went forward in his Parliament, where the first Statutes, called of Westminster, and among them the Statute of Mortmain were enacted. But after the Parliament; the King repaired to his city of Chester, being very neere to Wales, and Lewelin fore-slowed his comming thither also; wherefore the King, resoluing (for deniall of

That the Prince ſhould pay to the King for his peace and good-will, fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, the * payment whereof ſhould be in the Kings will and grace; that is (as we conceiue it) how much therof the Prince ſhould pay or not pay, and when. 2. That the ſaid Prince ſhould haue the Iſle of Angleſey in Fee-farme of the King, to him, and to the lawfull iſſue of his body in generall taile, for fiue thouſand Markes ready money, for * greſſom, or a fine in hand payde, and the yeerely rent of a thouſand Markes. The reſt of the Articles (being about eight,) amounted to ſo much as a plain Conqueſt, or diſſolution of the Principality of Wales, after Lewelins death, who was to enjoy the ſame, during his time vpon conditions.

(12) Now whereas the ſaid Lewelin had three Brethren, Dauid (whom King Edward fauoured) Owen, and Rodericke, it was enjoyned to him at this concluſion (made by the Lord Robert Tiptoft, and certaine other * Commiſſioners, vpon eyther ſide appoynted) that he ſhould appeaſe and ſatisfie his ſaid Brethren: but becauſe Dauid was afterward a principall Actor in the calamities which fell vpon himſelfe, his houſe, and his Country, we muſt not neglect to ſpeake ſomewhat particularly of him. This Gentleman for ſome cauſes, * flying into England from his Brother Lewelin, for his faithfull ſeruice to the State of England, was there honoured (contrary to the manner of his Nation) with the order of Knight-hood, and receiued alſo, by the bounty of King Edward, for his maintenance, the Caſtle of Denbigh, with lands to the yeerly value of one thouſand pounds, and the Daughter of the Earle of Derby (being then a Widow) to wife: with all which bounty, the King did but entertaine a reuealer of his ſecrets, as * ſome (not improbably) doe affirme. The State of Wales thus compoſed, and the Caſtle of * Aberiſtwith (which ſeemes to be the ſame, that by * another is ſaid to haue beene built in Weſt-Wales at Lanpader Vaur) being built by King Edward for aſſuring thoſe parts, the King (as he was munificent, and royall) the more to tye Lewelins faith, gaue vnto him the Lady, of whoſe ſurpriſe at Sea we haue mentioned, to be his conſort, honouring the Nuptials with his owne preſence, and his Queenes. And whereas Alexander King of Scots came about the ſame ſeaſon into England to treat with Edward concerning important affaires, and had formerly ſent to the Welſh wars, certaine aides of the Scots, the ſaid Alexander being jealous (on his countries behalfe) that thoſe aides might be interpreted, to haue beene ſent vpon duty, obtayned Letters teſtimoniall from King Edward, declaring that they were not ſent of duty, or in reſpect of ſeruice due.

An.D.1283. (14) But though the old Brittiſh Principality was now to expire, yet it muſt be confeſſed, that as Lewelin had an end vnworthy of his bloud, being rather vnfortunately ſlaine, then otherwiſe, ſo on the other ſide the ſame hapned not without reuenge: for at one encounter in open field, Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter loſt William Valence, (a younger Coſen of the Kings) ſlaine in the fight, and foure other Knights, though at the ſame time alſo, many of the Welſh left their bodies dead vpon the earth, together with the victory to the Engliſh: but the day certainely which they had of King Edward himſelfe, may not be forgotten, in which the Welſh ſlew the * Lord William de Audeley, and the Lord Roger Clifford the yonger, and got foureteene Enſignes from the Engliſh Army, King Edward being enforced to enter into the Caſtle of Hope for his ſafetie. Theſe things, though not contemptible, but rather certaine deceitfull fauours, vſuall when the ruine of a Nation is by God decreed, could not vphold the cauſe. For firſt the Prince, hauing vpon ſome occaſion withdrawne himſelfe with ſome few others from his Army, which then was in the Land of Buelth, was ſet vpon by two principall Gentlemen, Iohn Giffard, and Edmund de Mortumar, with their Forces, and there by the hand of one * Adam Francton was runne through with an Horſemans ſtaffe, who at the firſt being vnknowne, had his head ſtrucken afterward off, and preſented to King Edward, at whoſe commandement it was * crowned with Iuie, and ſet vp for a certaine time vpon the Tower of London.

end of Lewelyn, betrayed by the men of Buelth, who was the laſt Prince of Britaines bloud: and with him (*whom one Verſifier calleth the Captaine, the praiſe, the law, and light of Nations, and another defaceth with as many ignominious attributes) the liberty of that people did alſo dye. For it was not long but that King Edward ſubdued in a manner all Wales, and reſeruing to himſelfe the Coaſt-Townes and ſtrengths toward the Sea, diſtributed the In-Land Countries to the Lords his followers: therein prudently following the counſell of Auguſtus, who thus vnder pretence of defence for the Prouinces, had the brideling of all their forces at his pleaſure. Neuertheleſſe the whole flame was not as yet extinguiſhed, for Dauid the Princes Brother, and * chiefeſt fire-brand in this fatall combuſtion, was at large: who being taken and brought to King Edward at the Caſtle of Ruthlan, could not obtaine admiſſion to his ſight or ſpeech, but was amanded, and ſent Priſoner to Shrewsburie. Thither the King, hauing ſetled the State of Wales, repayring to a Parliament which he had ſummoned, there to bee kept after Michaelmas, cauſed Dauid (hauing firſt had a Legall triall * before certaine Iuſticiars for that cauſe appointed) to be ſeuerely put to death, by * hanging, heading, and quartering, whoſe head was ſet vp at London, and his quarters in foure other principall Cities of England, to the terrour of all ingratefull and diſloyall perſons. The Welſh Line thus thruſt from the Principality, King Edward vpon Saint Markes day had a Sonne borne vnto him in Wales at Caernaruon, who alſo was called Edward, and raigned after him; and that with the birth of a new Lord, the Welſh might be injured to new Lawes, the King eſtabliſhed (by example of King Iohn his Grand-father in Ireland) the Engliſh Lawes and Offices among them.

(16) But the King that he might not ſeeme forgetfull of his French affaires, repaired into France, where hee obtayned ſundry fauours, though they continued not long, and ſate in perſon there with the French King in his Parliament at the Citie of Paris, as a Lord or Peere of that Realme, in reſpect of ſuch Lands as he had in thoſe parts. Nor may here be forgotten an Act of ſingular munificence, and charity in this renowned King, for the redemption of Charles Prince of Achaia, ſonne and Heire of Charles King of Sicilia, who had ſome yeeres before beene taken in a battell at Sea before Naples, by the Gallies of Sicilia, fighting on the behalfe of the King of Arragon: for whoſe ſpeedier enlargement, King Edward diſburſed thirty thouſand pounds Sterling, and gaue his owne Knights in hoſtage, till Charles had ſent in his two Sonnes, Robert and Lewis, as pledges to Alfonſe King of Arragon: which done, King Edward returned into Gaſcoigne, and there tooke vpon him the Croſſe, in full purpoſe to finiſh the journey which once he had vndertaken, and had in part performed againſt the Sarazens.

(17) In the meane time, to purge England (whither he was now returned) from ſuch corruptions, and oppreſſions, as vnder which it groaned, and not neglecting therein his particular gaine, he baniſhed the Iewes out of the realm, confiſcating all their goods, leauing them nothing but money to beare their charges. And whereas they by their cruell vſuries had one way eaten his people to the bones, and his Iuſticiars (like another kinde of Iewes) had ruined them with delayes in their ſuites, and enriched themſelues with wicked corruptions, he (like a father of his Country) put all thoſe from their offices who were found guiltie (and they were * almoſt all) and puniſhed them otherwiſe in a grieuous manner, being firſt in open Parliament conuicted. The particulars whereof, by reaſon of the moſt juſt and commendable example, we will not thinke needleſſe (the order of naming them only changed) to recapitulate here. Sir Ralph Hengham, Chiefe Iuſtice of the higher Bench, 7000. marks. Sir Iohn Louetot, Iuſtice of the lower Bench, 3000. marks. Sir William Brompton Iuſtice, 6000. markes. Sir Salomon Rocheſter, chiefe Iuſtice of Aſſiſes, 4000. M. Sir Richard Boyland, 4000. Markes. Sir Thomas Sodentone, 2000. Markes. Sir Walter de Hopton, 2000. Markes. Sir William Saham, Iuſtice, 3000. Markes. Robert Littelburie, Clerke, 1000. Markes. Roger Leiceſter, Clerke, 1000. Markes. Adam de Stratton (beſide other riches incredible) 32000. Markes. But with one Sir Thomas Weyland the Kings * chiefe Iuſtice, (being found belike moſt falſe) he dealt farre more ſternely, for he not only ſeiſed vpon all his moueable goods and Iewels (which he had done to others) but alſo vpon his immoueable, and baniſht him moreouer out of the Kingdome. At which time the King conſtrayned all his Iuſtices to ſweare, that from thenceforth they would take no penſion, fee, or gift of any man, except only a breakfaſt, or the like preſent. O diuine and ſtill neceſſary ſeuerity, onely able to breake the pernicious combination of men that vnder the profeſſion of Law and offices of Iuſtice, make merchandize of honour, iuſtice, law, & conſcience, which cannot in the end but bring forth ruine, and confuſion.

(18) That tempeſt now, which Thomas Erſilton, a Scottiſh Rimer, is ſaid to haue obſcurely prophecied, alluding to the troubles of Scotland, by reaſon of King Alexanders death; hapned about theſe times; which raiſed ſo great, and bloudy contentions, that it had almoſt blowne vp the regality of that Kingdome by the very rootes. For when, by the violent fal from his horſe, King Alexander had moſt vnfortunately loſt his life, that Realme was wofully deſtitute of any apparent heire, ſundry perſons ſtanding in competition for the ſame. Theſe things were thought to be fore-ſhewed from heauen by many * fearefull preſages, as extraordinary Meteors, Flouds, Fires, and Peſtilence. But King Edward intending to ſway that affaire, and being vpon his way toward the borders, the death of his royall conſort, and Queene, which he lamented while himſelfe did liue, called him backe to the celebration of her funerals: as her excellent vertues did well deſerue: To our Nation ſhe was a louing mother, and (ſaith * one) the Columne, and pillar (as it were) of the whole Realme. In her honour the K. her husband (who loued her aboue all worldly creatures) cauſed thoſe many famous * tropheis, or croſſes to be erected, whereſoeuer her noble Coarſe did reſt, as it was conueyed from Lincolneſhire to buriall in Weſtminſter. Nor could any thing, but the reſpect to other weightie matters, now preſently in hand, with-hold our pen from paying to her memory a farre more copious commendation.

(19) Thoſe mourning offices as mournfully performed, the King repaires into Northumberland, whither the greateſt, and ſageſt perſons of the Scottiſh nation being come, * themſelues hauing ſought to him, Edward makes claime to the ſuperiority of Scotland, and requires that the Competitors would quietly aſſent to his award, alleaging that the Crowne of that Realme was held of him: for more credit to which aſſertion he vouched ſundry * books, and acts, whereunto the Scots replyed, That they were ignorant, that any ſuch ſuperioritie belonged to the King of England: neyther could they make anſwere to ſuch things without a King, the head, vpon whom it lay to heare ſuch a denunciation, and proteſted, that other anſwere they ought not as then to giue, in regard of their Oath, which after the death of* Alexander their King, they had made one to the other, and the ſame to keepe vnder paine of excommunication. Whereupon the King deliuered to them his Letters Patents, in which he acknowledged, that the comming of thoſe Scots, on this ſide the Water of Twede, ſhould not be at any other time vrged to prejudice them, for comming againe into England: that is, That their example ſhould not ſo be drawne to an argument of King Edwards right over them, as if they were to come againe vpon duty; ſo prudently iealous were theſe Patriots of their Countries libertie.

(20) The names of the Competitors were these, according to Walsingham: Erick, King of Norway, who appeared by his Attorneys; Florence, Earle of Holland; Robert le Brus, Lord of Annandale; Iohn de Baliol, Lord of Galway; Iohn de Hastings, Lord of Abergeuenny; Iohn Comin, Lord of Badenaw; Patrick de Dunbar, Earle of March; Iohn de Vesci, on his Fathers behalfe; Nicholas de Sules; William de Rosse. These all peaceably submitted themselues, for so much as concerned their seuerall Titles to the Scottish Crowne, to the finall award and arbitration of King Edward, passing thereof an authentick instrument vnto him; who hauing giuen caution to restore the Realme of Scotland, (within a certaine prefixed time,) to that partie to whom the Crowne thereof should be adjudged, had seisin deliuered to him, the better to put the sentence in execution, or (say the Writers of that Nation) they giuing him power to constraine the parties to stand to this sentence. The whole carriage of which weightie businesse, being so diuersly related and censured by the Writers of both Nations, (though for the present it be not materiall, both Kingdomes now blessedly acknowledging one absolute Superiour) we will so trace the steps of truth in a middle way, as resoluing neither to impeach the action of that glorious Vmpier, not prejudicate the right of our noble Sister-Nation. The State of Scotland now was not without manifest perill; for the *Scots denying that their Kingdome was in any point subalterne to the Crowne of England, and King Edward either perswaded that it was so, or resoluing and plotting now to make it so, would not neglect the aduantage of this * Akephalisis, or want of a knowne head in Scotland.

(21) Vpon full ventilation therefore and scanning of all rights, the maine doubt rested vpon Lord Brus and Baliol, for the residue might seeme rather to affect the honour of hauing pretended title in bloud to a Diademe, then to haue colour to contend with either of them. Great was the aduise, and deliberation (as there was cause) which King Edward tooke therein, for not trusting to his owne judgement, he caused (saith * Hector Boetius) twelue of the best Clerkes or learned men of Scotland, and twelue of England to concurre, as Assessors, with him in that great decision.

(22) While this weightie cause was in debatement; there fell out deadly strife betweene the English and Normans, occasioned by one of them casually slaine by the English; which mischiefe the King of France forwardly nourisht, as thirsting for the dutchy of Gascoigne, which best he might attain by troubling the forreine affaires of King Edward, whom they saw now entangled at home in so weighty employments. Whereupon the Normans slew sundry of the English, and hung vp one vpon the mast of a Ship, whom they had taken at Sea: but, ere long after, threescore English ships encountring with two hundreth saile of Normans, laden with wines, after a most bloudy battell (wherein many * thousands of the French were slaine) tooke, with their whole fleet, their ful reuenge, and brought them into England.

(23) At last yet King Edward returning to Berwicke, hauing with him the said twenty foure Assessors, as it were a Iury of either Nation,* and, with the good will and assent of the Scottish Lords, gaue solemne judgement with Baliol, as being descended of the eldest Daughter of Dauid, Earle of Huntingdon, a yonger sonne of Scotland; whose issue (the line of the elder brother being extinct) was to inherite, without question. But the strife being betweene the descendents of the said Dauid, of which the Lord Robert Bruce was also a principall, reasons of importance were produced, which drew many mens judgement to incline to him, as hauing a neerer interest to the Crowne. But according to the sentence, Baliol was solemnly crowned King of Scotland vpon Saint Andrews day, and, in Christmas following, repayred to King Edward, at New-castle vpon Tyne, and * there (against the minds of many Scots) did homage vnto him for the whole Kingdome of Scotland.

(24) Meane time the French King pursued the reuenge of the Normans, demanding restitution, and citing King Edward iudicially to appeare to answere such wrongs as were done in Aquitaine: who, (desirous to settle his owne affaires at home, or, as some write, * eager vpon a match for himselfe in France) while hee discouered either his vnwillingnesse to appeare in that kinde, or to warre, suffered himselfe by a French deuise, to be merely deceiued, and put out of his possession of Gascoigne, to the great mischeife, and disaduantage of the English: whereupon King Edward highly incensed, called a Parliament at London, where Iohn King of Scotland was present; and had the full consent of the whole Realme, to re-gaine that honestly by the sword, which was craftily gotten away by a cunning tricke, * renouncing to the French his homage for Aquitaine. Wales also was at the same time full of troubles; but the fires of rebellion, there rashly kindled, were, not long after, quencht with the bloud of the Actors, and thousands of their Complices.

(25) Baliol hauing thus obtained the Crowne of Scotland, and finding his party, by the homage which hee had made to King Edward, much empaired among the Scots, who greatly repined thereat; for re-gaining their loues,* attempted a secret combination with the French against the English; which Edward ignorant of, and * requiring him by vertue of his homage to ayde him with all his powers against the King of France, * discouered (by Baliols delayes, and trauerses) the said conspiracie. Wherupon he aduanced forward against the King of Scots with a puissant Armie to Newcastle vpon Tyne: The first bloud which was drawne was of the English, of whom, the Scots * slew almost one thousand in a village vnder the leading of one Robert de Ros, who had fled from King Edward: The City of Carlile likewise was assaulted, and the County of Cumberland spoyled by seauen Earles of Scotland, and their companies, which to Edward was not greatly displeasing, (as was said) for that the first hostile acts were done by them, whom he had a full purpose to subdue, that at last hee might be sole in Albion; which, had not God reserued for other times, wee might wonder hee effected not.

(26) King Edward therefore presented himselfe before the strong Towne of Berwicke with a mighty host, there to auspicate his entrance to a conquest of Scotland; and, after summons sent to the Towne, abode one whole day without offer of violence: The Townesmen refusing to render, had a victory of the English Marriners, who rashly entring, with twenty and foure Ships into the harbour, were repelled, with the losse of foure of their vessels, which was soone reuenged by the forceable taking of Berwicke, where * Hector Boetius saith, there was exercised great cruelty by the English. In the Towne, the Flemish Merchants (who were smothered by the English with fire) had a very strong house in the manner of a Tower, from whence they leueld, at the entring of the English, with darts, & iauelins, one of which casually slew Richard of Cornwall, a gallant Gentleman, brother to the Earle of Cornwall, which, in an army heated with former contumelies, for the Scots vpon the slaughter and repulse which they had made of the English marriners, published certaine rimes in derision, as Towne, and Caſtle was very great, for it was the key, and common Bulwarke of Scotland.

(27) While the Engliſh, at this place, were buſie to caſt a very deepe ditch, to hinder the ſodaine inroades of their enemies, Iohn King of Scotland ſent two religious men to the King of England with * letters; in which, alledging that he was by Oath bound to defend his owne Kingdome, and people, he renounced his homage, and fealtie, as extorted by violence, and void in it ſelfe, being made without aſſent of the three eſtates of his Realme. The reſignation was admitted, King Edward commanding his Chancellor to record the ſame for perpetuall memory, as a iuſtification of his proceedings.

(28) The Scots hereupon, vnder the conduct of the Earles of Bucquhan, Menteth, Strathern, Ros, Athol, Marr, and other of their nobility, made an incurſion into England, whence with the ſpoiles of two religious houſes, and other booties they returned: But Patrick Earle of Dunbarre came to king Edward ſubmitting himſelfe; and the Caſtle of Dunbarre (by this ſubmiſſion being vnder King Edwards protection) was re-gained by Scots: for recouery, or ſur-re-gaining whereof, the King ſent Iohn Earle of Surrey, and Suſſex, & William Earle of Warwick, who were entertained with battell by the Scottiſh Nation, of whom the Engliſh, * after cruell fight, obtained a victory of great importance, the Chaſe holding about eight miles, in which the ſlaughter was not ſmall. The ſiege of Dunbarre being re-inforced, King Edward had it yeelded vnto him, at his comming, wherein were taken three Earles, ſixe or ſeauen Barons, beſides many knights, and Eſquires, which were all ſent priſoners to diuers caſtles of England, and (if ſome ſay true) not put to the ſword (as Hector tranſported perhaps with hatred to Edward writes) contrary to his word, and faith giuen.

(29) King Edward knowing as well how to vſe a victory, as to get it, hauing a preſent ſpirit vpon all aduantages and turnes of fortune, takes the Caſtle of Rocksbrough, and (for a finall end to this affaire) marcheth to Edenburgh it ſelfe (the chiefe Towne of Scotland) which * was ſhortly rendred: Then tooke they Striueling alſo, and draue Baliol to the * Caſtle of Forfar: where Iohn Comin Lord of Strabogie ſubmitted himſelfe to King Edward. About this time there came to the Engliſh campe great numbers of Welſh Souldiers, with whom he releeued many of the Engliſh foote-men, tyred with ſeruice, ſending them back into England. (33) England at this time was not without great diſcontentments, which Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford & Eſſex, Conſtable of England, and Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Marſhall of England, did countenance; for preſent ſatisfaction whereof, the King yeelded (among other things) to confirme "Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta, and that "there ſhould no Subſidie nor taxation bee leuyed "vpon the people, without the conſent of the Prelates, "Peeres, "Peeres, and people. But before this time, and while the King was absent out of the land, the Scots, vnder the leading of William Walleys, put to * flight the Earle Warren, and all the Englisth forces which were with him, taking them at aduantage, as they were passing ouer a narrow Bridge, neere vnto the Castle of Striueling: the slaughter of the Englisth was not small. There Hugh de Cressingham Treasurer of Scotland for King Edward, fell in battell, whose dead body for speciall hatred borne vnto him, the Scots did flea, diuiding his skinne among them. The King hearing of this ouerthrowe, commaunds the Lords of England by his letters to bee ready to assist the said Earle Warren (his Custos or Guardian of Scotland) with their Forces, in the Octaues of S. Hilary at Yorke, and also to proclaime such of the Scottish Lords as came not thither, enemies of the State; but they kept themselues within Scotland, and came not. Whereupon the Englisth Captaines marched to the rescue of the Castle of Rocksbrough, whence William Walleys fled vpon notice of their approach to raise his siege. But King Edward (aduertised of these accidents) hauing taken a truce for two yeares with the King of France, by mediation of Bonifacius the Pope, who interposed himselfe (non tanquam Iudex, sed amicabilis Compositor, saith Walsingham, not as a Iudge, but as a friendly Composer, made hast into England, where his presence was extreamely wanting: but in his way home, at a Towne called * Ardeburgh, all the Scots almost, which hee had brought with him to serue in the Flemish wars, forsooke him, and went to Paris.

(34) After his arriuall in England, he summoned a Parliament at Yorke, giuing the Scots a day to appeare thereat; which they not doing, nor acknowledging that they ought to doe, hee entred with a mighty Army into their Countrey, his Nauy laden with victuals coasting along; which by contrary winds being holden off for a time, put the Scots the rather in hope of victory, by reason of the scarsity of prouisions among the Englisth; but three dayes before the Scots appeared, the shippes came, and plentifully refresht the fainting souldiers. Hereupon the King led forward his people, and vpon the next morning, a terrible showt being heard from the Scottish host the Englisth ranne to armes; but the Kings horse (affrighted with the sodaine tumultuous noise) as hee was putting foot in stirrup, threw him to the earth, and striking with the hinder heeles, brake two of his ribs; who neuertheless vpon the same horse proceeded in person to the battell. William Walleys, who had wonne to himselfe, by many his hardy enterprises a singular opinion among the Peeres, and people, hauing set his Scots in array (whose numbers far exceeded the Englisth) vsed euery where this short speech vnto them in stead of Orations, I haue brought you to the King, hop gif yee kun. For their more security, he had * fixed betweene them and the Englisth, certaine Pales or stakes, bound together with ropes, which the Englisth Vauntguard brake downe, and came to strokes. The first which fled, were the Scottish Horsemen, leauing their Infantery, or battels of foote, open to that great destruction which followed, the victory resting clearely to the Englisth.

* Tho. Walsingh. The bloudy ouerthrow at Fawkirke.

(35) Our Scottish * Author writes, that by reason of emulation against Walleys, the Scots burning in mutuall hatred, made the enterprise easie to their enemies; which as it may be very true, so certainely there was scarse any battell betweene the two Nations, in which more Scottish bloud was spilt then in this, for thereof * Sebastian Munster seemes to meane, saying, that there were slaine threescore and ten thousand, which though we take not to bee the true number, (for some haue * threescore thousand, * others not so many) yet shewes it that the slaughter was vast, as it could not otherwise bee, the Scottish footmen valiantly * fighting as it were to the last man. The Welshmen deserued ill of the King at this iourney, for that they fore-slowed to charge vpon the Pallisado, or fence of the Scots, in hope (the Englisth being vanquished which by the inequality of their numbers, they presumed would happen) that themselues might ioyntly with the Scots, execute vpon King Edward the hatred, which they bare him for the * euils hee had brought vpon their Nation. After this victory the King tooke sundry places, and returned into England by Carlile.

(36) The two yeares truce formerly taken betweene the Englisth and French, was now, by the interceding of Boniface Bishop of Rome, turned to a setled peace, (who among other things) brought it about, that King Edward should marry the French Kings Sister Margaret, and Edward the Kings Sonne, the same Kings Daughter, though (saith Walsingham) he aduanced not the good of his Realme by this match in any point. To this affinity were added the greater strengths of a domesticke quiet, for the King (whom warres had together made renowned, and aged) graciously and wisely yeelded to confirme such graunts of lawes and liberties, as the Earles and Barons (the pretended Conseruators of the Peoples interest) did declare, were by his promise to bee confirmed to them at his returne from Scotland: and which hee accordingly did, in a Parliament holden at London, vpon prorogation, in Quindena Paschæ, where for their fuller satisfaction he * left out this Clause in the end, Saluo iure coronæ nostræ, sauing the right of our Crowne: and what at this time was wanting, he made vp afterward in a Parliament at Stamford.

(37) But that hee might not seeme willing to deny the Pope any iust request, or not to know the sweetnesse of anothers freedome, hee deliuered to the hands of the Popes Nuntios, Iohn the late King of Scotland, (vpon their assuming for King Edwards indemnity,) whom they conueied to his inheritance in France, where (vpon euery side vnfortunate) hee remained as vnder the note of a false seducer, and of a periur'd person in King Edwards iudgement, and without any part of his regall office ouer the Scottish Nation; who found that the peace which King Edward made in other places, did but turne to their more grieuous affliction; for albeit they had gotten Striueling by surrender of the Englisth, and began with an immortall desire of their ancient Liberty, to assemble againe vnder William Walleys, yet the time was not come of their deliuerance; for King Edward (according as it was formerly appointed,) hauing accomplished his marriage with the French Kings sister at Canterbury, made it his whole affaire, to finish the annexation of Scotland to the Crowne of England.

The Baliol set at liberty.

(38) He therefore accompanied with his sonne, and a dreadfull Army, pursued the matter so close, that whereas the Scots had gotten together againe in exceeding great numbers, vnder their seuerall Captaines, (whose * Enuie had caused Walleys to giue vp all such authority, as the Common-wealth of Scotland had formerly granted vnto him, for preseruation of their freedomes,) and flying before King Edward, whose fortune in warre had worthily made him terrible; that day (in Walsinghams iudgement) had been irrecouerably fatall to the Scottish name, if the Englisth had beene able to haue followed them in their Armour, ouer their bogges and mountaines, or that the Welsh had with their naturall nimblenes supplied the same. Sure it is, that Edward held himselfe so fast in possession, that he neither would grant the Scottish Lords their Baliol to raigne ouer them, (which they they requeſted ſaith Walſingham) nor ſuffer them to redeeme ſuch lands of theirs, as hee had giuen to the Engliſh among them.

The Pope interpoſeth his authority for the reliefe of Scotland.

(39) Armes failing, and the Scots hauing made their way in the Court of Rome, procured inhibitory letters from the Pope, which were brought by one Lumbardus into Scotland: but the King ſwearing a * terrible oath, ſaid, that he would not deſiſt. Neuertheleſſe the Scots, after a few dayes, requeſted the King to let them liue in peace till they had taken counſell of the Peeres, and of the King of France, threatning that otherwiſe the Pope would take the matter vpon him. But the King with a diſdainefull "ſmile, anſwered: Haue you done homage to me (as "to the chiefe Lord of the Kingdome of Scotland) "and now ſuppoſe that I can bee terrified with ſwel-"ling lies, as if (like one that had no power to com-"pell) I would let the right which I haue ouer you to "ſlip out of my hands? Let me here no more of this, "for if I doe, I ſweare by the Lord, I will conſume all "Scotland from ſea to ſea. On the other ſide, the Scots did boldly enough reply, That in this cauſe they would ſhed their bloud for defence of iuſtice, and their Countries libertie.

*Per ſanguinem Dei.

The conſtancy of the Welſhmens loue to the firſt Engliſh Prince of Wales.

(40) About this time the King made his ſonne Edward, (who was borne at Caernaruon) Prince of Wales, and Earle of Cheſter, which ſo greatly contented the Welſh, becauſe (in regard of his birth-place) they held him as one of theirs, that when all friends did afterward forſake him (as the following Raigne will ſhew) they alwayes ſtucke moſt loyally vnto him, expreſſing wonderfull loue and affection, and bewayling his heauie fortunes in woefull ſongs, which neither the dread of his enemies, nor length of time could euer make them to * forget.

* Tho. Walſing.

(41) But, in the matter of Scotland, the King not to ſeeme altogether to neglect the Court of Rome, addreſſed thither the Earle of Lincolne, and the Lord Hugh de Spencer with manifold complaints againſt the Scots, and iuſtification of his own proceedings; howbeit at the Popes requeſt, he granted them truce from Hallowmas to Whitſontide. This very yeare, Caſſan King of Tartars gloriouſly ſlew one hundreth thouſand Turkes in a battell vpon the plaine of Damaſcus, and was baptized therupon, as acknowledging the victorie to come from the ſonne of God: the ioy whereof filled England, as other the parts of Chriſtendome.

An. D. 1302.

(42) The iuſtice of the Engliſh Armes againſt the Scots, being now againe directly impugned by the Papall letters, comprehending ſundry arguments on the behalfe of that Nation, King Edward in a Parliament at Lincolne publiſhed their contents, and by conſent of the whole repreſentatiue body of the Realme, returned a copious defence of his whole proceedings, with proteſtation, firſt, that he did not exhibite any thing as in forme of iudgement, or triall of his cauſe, but for ſatisfaction of his holy Fatherhoods conſcience, and not otherwiſe. But whereas the Pope had required the King to ſtand to his deciſion for matter of claime, hee writes, that thereunto hee would make no anſwere, as hauing left that poynt to the Earles and Peeres of his Land: who with one "minde directly ſignifie, that their King was not to "anſwere in iudgement for any rites of the Crowne of "England before any Tribunall vnder Heauen: and "that (by ſending Deputies or Attourneyes to ſuch "an end) he ſhould not make the ſaid truth doubtful, "becauſe it manifeſtly tended to the diſinheriſon of the "ſaid Crowne, which with the helpe of God, they would "reſolutely, and with all their force maintaine againſt "all men. That the reſolution of theſe worthy pillars, thus in caſe of their Countries Crowne, and dignities, may be imitated in their following poſterities, and celebrated in our euerlaſting remembrances. (43) We may not here ouer-paſſe a victory (at Roſſelin) which the Writers of that Nation celebrate, wherein the Engliſh were by them ouercome, howbeit there is in our Writers much variety in that relation. It is the ſaying of Hector Boetius, that the Engliſh were about three for one, our ancient and later Authors ſay, that the Scots had farre the * more people; hee affirmes, that it was in the plaine field, ours, that it was an * Ambuſh; hee, that the Scots did put to flight, and tooke the ſpoiles of three whole battels, in either of which were * 10000. Engliſh, ours, that the Scots by reaſon of their multitudes did onely ouer-beare the Vauntgard, from which the neareſt of the other battels was * foure miles off. All agree in this, that the Lord Iohn Segraue (Ralph Confrey ſaith Hector) who had the poynt or voward of the Engliſh (whoſe Generall hee alſo was) by diuiding his Army into three parts for their better reliefe, weakened ſo his whole force, that thereby, and his vnaduiſed forwardneſſe (impatient to ſtay for his other powers) hee gaue occaſion to the Scots of ſuch a victory. They had alſo taken the perſon of the ſaid Lord Generall, but * Sir Robert de Neuile, who with others was at diuine Seruice, hearing thereof, came with his troupes of Horſe, reſcued Segraue, ſlew many, put many to flight, and brought away backe the reſt of the priſoners, without * the loſſe of any one man of his owne. The ſaid Scottiſh Chronicle makes no mention of William Walleys, at this diſcomfiture of the Engliſh, but giues the whole glory therof to Cumyn, and to Simon Fraſer: whereas we attribute all to Walleys, and make no mention of the other, with farre leſſe wrong to the immortall deſerts of VValleys; for he vndoubtedly, was the onely man, who kept vp Scotland, till neere the time of deliuerance.

King Edward vpon the firſt diſcouery of the plot not crediting the ſame, Bruce, moſt conſtantly denying it, and caſting the accuſation, with good probability, vpon Cumyns enuie, had time, and warning to eſcape. For an Earle (ſaith Boetius) ſent vnto him twelue Striueling pence, and a paire of ſharpe ſpurres, preſently vpon his departure from the King, which he wittily interpreted to be a Symbole of ſpeedy flight. According whereunto he forth-with ſped from London, where King Edward kept Chriſtmas, ſhooing his horſes backward, that he might not be followed by their prints vpon the ſnow, and with his owne hand thruſt his Sword into Cumyn * in the Church of the Friers Minors at Dunfreis in Scotland, whom two of Bruces friends with other mortall thruſts diſpatched. Bruce knowing now no way to anſwere the fact, but by open defection, which he did reſolue vpon, did thereupon procure himſelfe to be crowned King of Scotland about our Ladies day in March in the Abbey of Scone.

(50) Such an attempt as this could not be long hidden from King Edward, who hauing at the Whitſontide next after honoured Edward Prince of Wales, his eldeſt Sonne, with the order of Knight-hood at London, ſent him againſt King Robert into Scotland, attended with a troupe of noble young Gentlemen, Aymery de Valence Earle of Pembroke; Robert de Clifford, and Henry de Percie being gone before with an Armie, and King Edward preparing to come after, appoynting the Rendeuous of his owne hoſt to be at Carleil. Where, in a Parliament, beſides prouiſions for the Warres, ſundry conſultations and courſes were entred, for repelling another kinde of enemy no leſſe dangerous to the State; to wit, the Pope, and his * ſtill continued extortions in this Land, whereof greeuous complaints were made in that Aſſembly; and both the Clergie there * appealed from the Popes Bull, and his Cardinal-Legats exactions: and alſo the Kings Councell was driuen to enact ſome orders for brideling their exceſſiue depilations.

(51) Meane time Aymery de Valence at Perth in Scotland had put to flight King Robert Bruce, and purſued him ſo neere, that he tooke his Wife, his brother Nigellus, and others, but himſelfe eſcaped into the vtmoſt Iles of Scotland. This hanſell taken at the entrance to his Regality, draue his people into ſuch deſpaire of his future better fortunes, that there remayned onely two friends vnto him, the Earle of Lenox, and Gilbert Hay; the reſt, as the Earle of Athol, at London, (who had twice reuolted) and his brother Nigellus at Berwick, were put to death as all others his chiefe partakers were, or elſe kept priſoners in England. In which number was King Roberts wife (daughter to the Earle of Vlſter in Ireland) and his daughter, the Biſhops of Glaſco, and S^t. Andrewes, the Abbot of Scone and others. The Counteſſe of Bucquhan, ſiſter to the Earle of Fife (then abſent in England at his mannor of * VVhitwick in Leiceſterſhire, whoſe office it was to haue crowned the Scottiſh king) was alſo taken; and becauſe (in her brothers abſence) ſhe had ſtolne from the Earle her husband, with all his great horſe, to * ſet the Diadem vpon Bruces head, it was deuiſed that ſhe ſhould be ſet in a wodden cage (made * Crowne-wiſe) vpon the wals of Berwick Caſtle, for all to wonder at. This ridiculous reuenge was held ſufficient, without taking her life, though ſhe were a man-like Woman, and did herein but the part of a noble-ſpirited Lady. Thus was King Robert (ſaith the Scottiſh * tranſlator of Boetius) brought to ſuch miſery, that he was ſometime naked and hungry without meat, or drinke, ſaue only water and rootes of hearbes, and his life perpetually in danger. Howbeit, hee neuer forſooke himſelfe, but as one that had firme truſt in God, cheriſhed an hope in his minde, at one time or other to recouer the Crown. In which condition he exhibited himſelfe ſo noble a ſpectacle as in which euen the * morall Heathen doe teach, that the Gods themſelues tooke pleaſure; how then can Chriſtians looke off? Certainely, all generous ſpirits, whom cruell injuries oppreſſe, haue reaſon to dwell in this patterne of Chriſtian magnanimity and patience.

Which confidence drew him on ſo farre, that now (his turnes being ſerued, as he thought againſt the Scots) he refuſed to ſtand to the confirmation which he had made to his Barons, of ſuch Lawes and Liberties as haue before beene mentioned, pretending that they had forced his conſent: and doubtleſſe, as great was the Kings fault thus to renounce what he had ſolemnly ſworne, (* though indeede it was on ſome neceſſitie and enforcement) ſo the Popes warranting thereof (which certainely encouraged the King thereunto) is moſt execrable, who afterward abſolued him (as other Popes had done to his Predeceſſors) from obſeruance of that oath.

(53) The miraculous deliuerance of Scotland was now at hand; for the noble Bruce, not ſtaying till King Edward were dead (who was now about threeſcore and eight yeares of age,) came forth out of the Scottiſh Ilands with ſuch powers as hee had gotten together, taking the Caſtles of Carricke, Inuerneſſe, and many other, doing many things aboue the opinion of his meanes. To put an end to all which troubles, King Edward reſolued once againe in perſon (notwithſtanding his age,) to enter Scotland with a mighty hoaſt, which he appointed to attend him at Carliel in Cumberland, three weekes after Midſommer day: where God viſiting him with his laſt ſickneſſe, he commanded his Sonne the Prince to repaire with ſpeed vnto him, vnto whom being come, he vttered many admonitions and precepts, the ſumme whereof was * this.

His Iſſue.

(58) Iohn, the eldeſt Sonne of King Edward, and Queene Elenor, was borne at VVindſor, in the raigne of King Henry his Grandfather, before his Fathers voyage into Syria, and in his abſence, was committed to the charge of Richard King of Romans, his great-Vncle, and others, who procured principall men of euery Hundred in each County within the Realme, to ſweare their fealty to his Father and him, but hee dyed ſhortly after, being a Childe, and was buried at Weſtminſter by the wall, betweene Saint Edmunds and Saint Bennets Chappell, Auguſt 8. in the laſt yeare of King Henry his Grand-fathers raigne; there is remaining ouer him a Tombe of Marble in-layed, with his picture in an Arch ouer it.

(59) Henry, the ſecond Sonne of King Edward and Queene Elenor, deceaſed alſo being a Childe, the newes of whoſe death was brought to his Father, being then in the Iſle of Sicill, in his returne from the Holy-Land, not long before the report of his owne Fathers death came to his knowledge: hee was buried in Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter, the twentieth day of Nouember, in the firſt yeare of his Fathers raigne, Ann. Dom. 1272. in the ſame place, and vnder the ſame Tombe where his Brother Iohn lyes, with his picture alſo in the Arch aboue it.

(60) Alphonſe, the third ſonne of Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at the Towne of Maine in Gaſcoigne, as his Father and Mother were in their returne towards England from Ieruſalem, Nouember 23. in the ſecond yeare of his Fathers raign, 1273. hee deceaſed at VVindſor, Auguſt 4. in the twelfth yeare of his age, 1285. and was buried at VVeſtminſter in Saint Peters Church by Saint Bennets Chappell, where his body lyeth vnder the Tombe of his Brothers, Iohn and Henry, his Image alſo there portrayed with theirs.

(61) Edward, the fourth ſonne of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne Aprill 25. in the thirteenth yeare of his Fathers raigne, 1284. at Caernaruon in North-VVales, and after the death of Lewelin ap Griffith, in regard of the place of his Natiuity, was by his Fathers Creation, with the conſent of the VVelſh, made Prince of VVales, the firſt of the Sonnes and Heires apparant of the Kings of England, that bare that Title, which afterward became ordinary to moſt of the reſt: hee was alſo Earle of Ponthieu and Cheſter, and being made Knight by his Father at London on Whitſunday, in the thirtie fourth yeare of his Raigne, 1306. ſucceeded him the ſame yeare in the Kingdome of England and VVales.

(62) Elenor, the eldeſt daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at VVindſor, in the fiftieth yeare of King Henry her Grand-father, ſhe was married with all Ceremonies of Proxie to a Deputy for Alphonſe King of Aragon, ſonne of King Peter, who deceaſed, An. Dom. 1292. before the ſolemnization of marriage, leauing his Kingdome to his Brother Iames, and his new wife to another huſband, who was married at Briſtow, in the two and twentieth yeare of her Fathers raigne, 1293. to Henrie the 3. Earle of Barrie, whoſe Earledome lay in the Eaſt-borders of Champaigne in France. She had Iſſue by him Edward Earle of Barrie, from whom deſcended the Earles and Dukes of that Countrey, whoſe inheritance, by Heires general, deuolued to the Kings of Aragon, and from them againe to the Dukes of Anion that were Kings of Sicill. Henrie another ſonne of hers was Biſhop of Troys in Champaigne. Helen her daughter was married to Henrie Earle of Bloys; and Ioan to Iohn Warren Earle of Surrey, ſhe was his wife fiue yeares, and deceaſed 27. of her Fathers raigne, An. Dom. 1298.

(63) Ioan the ſecond daughter of King Edward, and Queene Elenor, was borne in the firſt yeare of her Fathers raigne, 1272. at a City in the Holy-land ſometime named Ptolomais, commonly called Acon and Acer, where her Mother remained during the warres that her Father had with the Sarazens. She was, at eighteene yeares of age, married to Gilbert Clare, called the Red, Earle of Gloceſter and Hereford, by whom ſhe had iſſue, Earle Gilbert ſlaine in Scotland without iſſue; Elenor, married firſt to Hugh Spencer (in her right, Earle of Glouceſter,) and after to William Zouch of Ricards Caſtle. Margaret, firſt married to Peter Gaueſton, Earle of Cornwall, after to Hugh Audeley Earle alſo of Glouceſter; and Elizabeth Lady of Clare, married firſt to Iohn, ſonne and heire to Richard Burgh, Earle of Vlſter in Ireland, Mother of William Burgh Earle of Vlſter, and Grandmother of Elizabeth, Dutcheſſe of Clarence; ſecondly, to Theobald Lord Verdon, and laſtly, to Sir Roger Damary. This Ioan ſuruiued her husband, and was re-married to Sir Ralph Monthermere a Baron, Father to Margaret the Mother of Thomas Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, of whom the now Viſcount Mountacute is deſcended; ſhee liued thirty eight yeares, and deceaſed in the firſt yeare of her Brother King Edwards raigne, and is buried at the Fryer Auſtines in Clare.

(64) Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at the Caſtle of Windſor, in the third yeare of her Fathers raigne, and of our Lord, 1275. When ſhe was fifteene yeares of age, ſhee was married at VVeſtminſter, Iuly 9. in the eighteenth yeare of her Fathers raigne, An. Do. 1290. to Iohn the ſecond, Duke of Brabant, by whom ſhe had iſſue Duke Iohn the third, Father of Margaret, wife of Lewis of Mechlin Earle of Flanders, and Mother of the Lady Margaret, the Heire of Brabant and Flanders, who was married to Philip Duke of Burgundy.

(65) Berenger, the fourth Daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne the 4. of her fathers raigne, An. 1276. as Iohn Euereſden the Monke of S^t. Edmundsburie in Suffolke, hath recorded in his Booke of Engliſh Annales, but other mention there is none, but onely from him: whereby it is likely that ſhe did not liue to be married, but that ſhe dyed in her Childe-hoode.

(66) Alice, the fifth Daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, is by Thomas Pickering of the Monaſtery of VVhitby, (who wrote the large Genealogie of the Kings of England, and their iſſue) reported to haue deceaſed without iſſue.

(67) Marie, the ſixt Daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at VVindſor, April 22. in the eight yeare of her Fathers raigne, 1279. and at ten yeares of age, An. Do. 1289. September 8. ſhee was made a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Ambreſberie in VViltſhire, at the inſtance of Queene Elenor her Grand-mother, who at that time liued there, in the habite of the ſame profeſſion, although her Parents were hardly induced to yeeld their conſents to that courſe.

(68) Elizabeth, the ſeauenth Daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, was borne at the Caſtle of Ruthland in Flintſhire, in the thirteenth yeare of her Fathers raigne, An. 1284. When ſhe was foureteene yeares of age, ſhee was married at London to Iohn the firſt of that name, Earle of Holland, Zeland, & Lord of Freezeland, who dyed within two yeares after without iſſue, and ſhe was re-married to Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford & Eſſex, Lord of Breknocke, and high Conſtable of England, by whom ſhe had iſſue Iohn and Humfrey, both Earles ſucceſſiuely after their Father; Edward, that died in Scotland without iſſue; and VVilliam, who being created Earle of Northampton, while his Brothers liued, after their deceaſes, was alſo Earle of Hereford and Eſſex, Lord of Breknocke, and high Conſtable of England, and father of Earle Humfrey the tenth of that name, and laſt of that houſe, who dyed without iſſue male. She had alſo by him two daughters, Elenor married to Iames Butler Earle of Ormond, and Margaret to Hugh Courtney the firſt, Earle of Deuonſhire. Shee was this Earles wife foureteene yeares; liued thirty three, deceaſed in the ninth yeare of the raigne of King Edward her Brother, An. Dom. 1316. and was buried in the Church of S^t. Iames, at the Abbey of Saffron-VValden in Eſſex.

(69) Beatrice, the eight daughter of King Edward and Queene Elenor, bare the name of Beatrice Dutcheſſe of Britannie, her Fathers ſiſter: ſhe is by ſome Genealogiſts mentioned to haue liued till ſhee was marriageable, but yet no mention being made of her match, it ſeemeth ſhe died vn-married.

(70) Blanch, the ninth Daughter of King Edward, and the laſt of Queene Elenor, is ſo mentioned by Thomas Pickering, and ſome others, but not at all by Thomas Elraham a Monke, who made a Pedegree of the Kings of England, but ſhe is by the reſt reported to haue dyed in her Childe hoode.

(71) Thomas, the fifth ſonne of King Edward, and the firſt of Queene Margaret his ſecond Wife, was borne at a little Village in Yorkeſhire called Brotherton, Iune 1. in the nine and twentieth yeare of his Fathers raigne, Ann. 1300. hee was created Earle of Norfolke, & Earle Marſhall of England, which Earledomes the laſt Earle Roger Bigod, leauing no iſſue, left to the diſpoſition of the King. Hee had two Wiues, of which the firſt was Alice the daughter of Sir Roger Hayles of Harwich in Suffolke, by whom hee had iſſue Edward, who married Beatrice the daughter of Roger Mortimer the firſt, Earle of March, but hee dyed before his Father, without Iſſue; and two Daughters, Margaret twice married, firſt to Iohn Lord Segraue, by whom ſhee had Elizabeth Dutcheſſe of Norfolke, Wife of Iohn Lord Mowbray (from whom the Mowbrayes and Howards, Dukes of Norfolke, and Earles Marſhall deſcended;) ſecondly, to Sir Walter Manny a Knight of Cambray, and by him had Anne Wife of Iohn Haſtings the elder, Earle of Pembroke, and Mother of Earle Iohn the yonger, that dyed without iſſue; his yongeſt daughter Alice was married to Sir Edward Mountacute, and had by him three daughters, Elizabeth and Ioan married to VValter and VVilliam two of the Vffords, and Maud that dyed vnmarried. The ſecond wife of this Earle Thomas, was Mary the daughter of VVilliam Lord Ros, and widow of Sir Ralph Cobham, who ſuruiuing him without Iſſue by him, ſhee was married the third time to VVilliam Lord Breroſe of Brember.

(72) Edmund

(72) Edmund, his ſixt Sonne by Queene Margaret, was borne at Woodſtocke in Oxfordſhire, Auguſt 5. in the thirtieth yeare of the raigne of his Father, An. 1301. Hee was created Earle of Kent, and married Margaret daughter of Iohn, and Sifter and ſole heire of Thomas Lord Wake of Lydel, in the County of Northampton; by her he had Iſſue two Sonnes, and one Daughter: Edmund his eldeſt ſonne was Earle of Kent after his Father, and dyed vnder age without Wife or iſſue: Iohn the yonger was Earle alſo after his Brother, hee married Elizabeth the Daughter of the Duke of Gulike, and dyed likewiſe without iſſue; His Daughter was Ioan, for her beauty called the faire Maid of Kent, firſt married to William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, and from him diuorced, and re-married to S^r. Thomas Holland, in her right, Earle of Kent, and by her, father of Thomas, and Iohn Holland Duke of Surrey, and Earle of Huntingdon: and laſtly, ſhe was the Wife of Edward of Woodſtocke, the Blacke Prince of Wales, and by him, Mother of King Richard the ſecond. This Earle Edmund was beheaded at Wincheſter the 19. of March, in the fourth yeare of King Edward his Nephew.

(73) Eleanor, the tenth Daughter and ſixteenth Childe of King Edward, and the laſt Child of Queene Margaret his ſecond wife, was borne at Wincheſter the ſixt day of May, in the fiue and thirtieth, and laſt yeare of her Fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord 1306. ſhee deceaſed in her Childe-hoode, and was buried in S^t. Peters Church at Weſtminſter, by her Brother Iohn, Henrie, and Alfonſe, vnder the monument before named, with her picture ouer it.

CHAPTER XI.

THat the Minde is not deriued from Parents, certainely the second Edward (called of Caernaruon) might (if nothing elſe) abundantly ſhew, being of a moſt valiant, wiſe and fortunate father, an vnlike ſonne; yet not to begin our deſcription of his courſes, with preiudice of his perſon, wee will ſo temper our ſtile, that by his owne actions ſincerely related, rather then by any verball cenſures the man may bee iudged. This cannot bee denyed, that whereas from the Conqueſt till his time, England, though it endured (by Gods iuſt iudgements) many bitter, ſad and heauie ſtormes through ſome headineſſe, ambition, or other ſickneſſes of minde in the Princes thereof, yet had ſhe Men to ſway and gouerne her, and thoſe diſtempers were as the perturbations incident to vigorous diſpoſitions; whereas vnder this Edward, who could neither get nor keepe, it ſeemed to endure the leuities of a Childe, though his yeares, being about twenty and three, might haue exempted him from ſo great infancy of iudgement, as his raigne diſcouered.

(2) Neuer came Prince to the crowne with more generall applauſe then hee: ſo great hopes of doing well, his victorious Father, Edward of * VVincheſter had left vpon him, beſides the right of ſucceſſion, whoſe laſt warning and terrible adiurations you haue heard: with the * vtter contempt and breach whereof, to the deſtruction of himſelfe, and his friends, hee in a manner auſpicated his gouernement.

(3) After that Edward had in his beſt manner prouided for the affaires of Scotland, where (at Dumfrees) many of the Scottiſh * Lords did their homage to him, as they had to his Father; the firſt taske which hee gaue of his future behauiours at home, was was a rigorous reuenge taken by him vpon Walter de Langton Bishop of Chester, Treasurer of England, and principall Executor of the last Will of the deceased King, whose body was not as yet interred, but by the care of the Executors, conueyed with funerall pompe to Waltham, and (after sixteene weekes) to Westminster, where vnder a plaine monument the same at this present rests. The Bishops crime was a kinde of good freedome, which he vsed in the late Kings daies, in * grauely reprouing the Prince for his misdemeanors, and shortning his waste of coyne, by a frugall moderation; and particularly, * for that he had complayned of Peirs Gaueston, whereupon ensued Prince Edwards imprisonment, and the others banishment, and therefore comming now to the Crowne, he arrested the Bishop, by Sir Iohn Felton Constable of the Tower, and imprisoned him in * Wallingford-Castle, seised vpon all his temporall goods and * credites, there being not a man in the Realme who durst speake a word on his behalfe, (so great displeasure he had conceyued, seeking vterly to ruine him) till afterward by meanes of the Papall authority, he was restored, and in a faint sort reconciled.

(4) The thing which suited best with his youthfull affections; to wit, the marriage of young Isabel, daughter of Philip the Faire, King of France, he performed with wonderfull magnificence at Bolein, at which solemnity were present besides all others, The King of France, Father to the Bride; The King of Nauarre his sonne; The King of Almaine; The King of Sicill; Marie Queene of France; Margaret Queene Dowager of England, her Daughter; The Queene of Nauarre. (5) This fatall fauourite of this young King was a Stranger borne, but a * Gentleman, and (in regard of good seruice done by the Father of Peirs in Gascoigne, * brought vp (at old King Edwards owne appoyntment) with this Prince: from whom not to derogate in any poynt, as if he had without some appearances of worth and value embraced Peirs, it is certaine (by that which a * Knight and seruitor of this very King hath left written) that he had a sharpe wit in a comely shape, and briefly, was such an one, as we vse to call very fine; Neither yet was he vnhardie in Armes, but of commendable performance, whereof (saith de la More) he gaue proofe against the Scots, (to whom * he was alike hatefull as to the English) till he was recalled to satisfie such as (saith their Courtier) did enuy his graces, and good successe; but of his Christian or morall vertues (which onely make men truely commendable) there is great silence in Authours, though not of his Vices, whereof we shall haue occasion enough to speake hereafter.

(6) At the Coronation of the King and Queene, (which the Lords would haue impeached, had he not promised reasonably to * satisfie them about Gaueston) none was * neere to Peirs in brauery of apparrell, or delicacie of fashion, which (and for that the King gaue him * S. Edwards Crowne to carry in that pompe,) greatly encreased the offence of the Lords against him: But he that (hauing a King to backe him) knew no other meanes to extinguish hatred, but by daring it to the vttermost, spared not afterwardes to scoffe and reproach the principall Peeres, * calling Thomas Earle of Lancaster, Stage-Player; Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Ioseph the Iew, because he was pale and tall; and Guy Earle of Warwicke, the blacke dogge of Ardern: all whom, and others, he at a * Turneament by him proclaimed and holden, handled vilely.

(7) But King Edward was daily more and more possessed with the familiarity of Peirs, who to establish his interest in the vnprudent Prince, by sensualities and riotous practises, filled the Court * with buffons, parasites, and the like pernicious instruments, drawing Edward from the thought of all great enterprises, in accomplishment of his fathers will, or discharge of his particular dutie; to all sorts of vnworthy vanities, and sinfull delights; while himselfe in the meane space reuelled in all outward felicity, wasting the riches of the kingdome, or conuerting them to his priuate vses. For (fearing belike that the time might come againe to vndergoe banishment) he transported much treasure into forraine parts, and much he had to transport; for not onely by the * sale of his fauour with the King, to which there was no speeding approach but by Gaueston, (who vsed to peize the gifts, more then the causes) but also by the Kings prodigality, he had whatsoeuer could be powred vpon him: for (though it might seeme incredible) he both gaue him his jewels and ancestors treasure, and * euen the Crowne it selfe of his victorious father; not sticking to professe, that (if it lay in him) hee should succeed him in the kingdome.

(8) The Lords (who for reuerence of the King sate downe by their priuate injuries, in hope there would be a season, in which their Soueraign might by timely and sweete admonitions recouer the vse of himselfe,) not thinking it tollerable to be now any longer silent, (and the rather, lest that Peirs, farther abusing his greatnesse, should bring * in Forreiners, not onely to the prejudice of the English Lawes and customes, but of their authority also and places,) preuayled so much with the King, in a Parliament holden at London, (where sundry prouisions concerning the liberties of the people, and execution of Iustice, were enacted, and by corporall oath confirmed by the King himselfe,) that among them, the decree of Gauestons perpetuall banishment, was by the King (ouercome with a meere necessity for satisfaction of the Kingdome, to whom the said Earle of Cornwall was odious) vnwillingly suffered to passe; and the King was thereupon re-gratified with a Subsidie of the twentieth part of the subiects goods. The King also tooke his Oath not to reuoke the said Earle of Cornwall from banishment (if it may be called a banishment) wherein * he had the Kingdome of Ireland entrusted to his charge, and for the securing thereof against Rebels, was furnished with men and money by the King.

(9) Yet forgetting, that those affections, which oftentimes deserue prayse in a priuate person, are subiect to much construction in a publike, and neglecting both his deceased Fathers so solemne adiurations, and also his owne Oath, as careless of the sequell, he calls Earle Peirs home, with whose loue he was most fondly, and most passionately transported, and (as if he had receyued some diuine benefit) gaue him most joyous welcome at the Castle of Flint in North-wales, and * bestowed vpon him for wife Ioan of Acres, Countesse of Gloceſter his Sisters daughter, resoluing with himselfe to retaine his Gaueston, maugre all his Earles and Barons, or (for the loue of him) to put his Crowne and life in perill when time should serue. In which, whether the King or his fauourite shewed lesse discretion, it is not at the first sight easily determinable; it being as vnsafe for the one, with so offensiue behauiour to affect immoderate shew and vse of grace, as for the other, to the iniury of his name and Realme to bestow the same.

* Iohn Stow. Tho. Walsingh. Tho. de la More.

(10) The contemptibility and vanity of this effeminate argument detaines vs longer, then for the quality thereof were fitting, did not so much mischiefe issue out of it. For Peirs, (of his owne nature insolent) being thus (aboue reason, or his owne darings) aduanced to alliance with the bloud-royal, was so farre from all amendment, as he rather seemed to striue to out-goe himselfe in his former courses, consuming so much of the Kings treasure and meanes, that hee had * not wherewith to defray ordinary charges.

charges, or to pay for the neceſſaries of his court. The young Queene alſo tooke her ſelfe not to be a little wronged by this vngracious mans predominancy, & thereof ſent her complaints to the king of France her father, which concerned injuries in the higheſt kind, as in her bed (the King being drawne by Gaueſton to * Adultery) and in her honour and * maintenance. Whereupon the Peeres of the Land, animated by the King of France, ſo confidently dealt with Edward, that his Earle now the third time did abjure the Realme: but (the king of France and his enemies making forraine parts vnſure for him to abide in) he returned in Chriſtmas, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, and to his owne certaine ruine, for that the Barons (his aduerſaries) had gotten him baniſhed with this Prouiſo, * that if at any time afterward he were taken in England, he ſhould be forthwith apprehended, and ſuffer death. But an Angell from Heauen could not ſeeme more welcome, then this moſt faithful friend (as that * Courtier cals him) was vnto King Edward, who * forthwith aduanced him to be his principall Secretary.

(11) Vpon report of Gaueſtons returne, the chiefe Lords, as well Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall, (Walter Biſhop of Couentree excepted, * who allowed the Kings affections towards Gaueſton; and procured him to breake the former agreements, which were made and ſworne in the Parliament at London,) conſulted vpon a deſperate courſe of reformation in this poynt, and made choyſe of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter to be their leader. This Thomas was Son of Edmund Earle of Lancaſter, Leiceſter, and Ferrers, ſecond ſonne of Henry the third, King of England, and in right of his wife (after her fathers deceaſe, which hapned about this time) Earle of Lincolne, Salisburie, and (beſides many other great Lands in Yorkeſhire, Cumberland, and Wales) he had the Earledome of * Artoys in Picardy, ſo that without compariſon he was the greateſt ſubiect of the Kingdome.

(12) The Iſſue of which combination before we purſue, we may not here in our way ouer-ſlip a ſtrange alteration both here in England, and in all Chriſtendome, by the vniuerſall extinguiſhment of the Order of the Templars, wrought about this time by the procurement of the French King, who being ſo gracious with Pope Clement, that formerly * he ſent Ambaſſadors to craue of his Holineſſe, with great importunitie, that the bones of his Predeceſſor Pope Boniface, might be burnt, as being an Heretike; ſo now alſo he ſo farre preuayled with him, that in the Councell at Vienna, this ſo highly eſteemed order, was vpon cleare proofe of their generall odious ſinnes, and ſcarſe credible impieties, vtterly aboliſhed through Chriſtendome. The French King * cauſed 54 of that Order, together with their Great Maſter, to be burnt at Paris; and though that King hoped to conuert all the Land of that Societie to his Sonnes vſe, whom hee intended to make King of Ieruſalem; yet the Pope and Councell annexed their poſſeſſions to the Order of the Knights Hoſpitalers, called commonly Knights of the Rhodes. Notwithſtanding, in England (where ſuch Papall commands went not alwaies for Lawes) the heires of the Donours, and ſuch as had endowed the Templars here with Lands, entred vpon thoſe parts of their ancient Patrimonies after the diſſolution of the Order, and (ſaith our * Courtier) detained them vntill not long after, they were by Parliament wholly transferred vnto the Knights of the Rhodes, * or of S^t. Iohn of Ieruſalem.

(13) King Edward was now at Yorke, and Earle Thomas, according to that which had beene concluded among the combined Lords, who reſolued to try all extremities, rather then any longer to endure Peirs Gaueſton, (as being perſwaded while that kingbane breathed, peace could neither be maintained in the Realme, nor the King abound in treaſure, nor the Queene enjoy his loue) ſent humble * petitions by honourable meſſengers to their Soueraigne, requeſting him to deliuer the man into their hands, or to driue him from his company out of England. But the ſelfe-wild King,* preferring the deareneſſe of one ſtranger before the loue of the whole Realme, would not condiſcend.

(14) Afterward, Peirs (whom * the Earles purſued with an Army) being * entruſted for his ſafeguard to Aimerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, was left by him but one night at a Village or Manour called Dathington betweene Oxford and Warwicke, (being a place neither * farre enough off, nor ſtrong enough) pretending to haue conuaied him on the next day to the Caſtle of Wallingford, the ſaid Aimerie in the meane ſpace departing to lodge with his Counteſſe, who lay hard by: but, the ſaid Aimerie conniuing thereat (as our * Courtier chargeth him, who alſo writes, that he tooke a ſolemne Oath before the king to doe his beſt to ſafe conduct Gaueſton, the king purpoſing in the meane time to labour his peace with the Lords * vpon any conditions) Guy Earle of Warwicke with his people, ſurpriſed him the ſame night, and tooke him to his Caſtle of Warwicke, where in a place called Blacklow (afterward * Gaueſhead) his head was ſtricken off, at the commandement * and in the preſence of the Earles of Lancaſter, Warwicke, and Hereford,* as of one that had beene a ſubuerter of the Lawes, and an open Traytour to the Kingdome. In which bold attempt, themſelues (who yet pretended ſo much ſtanding for the liberties of the Land,) did moſt vnaduiſedly infringe a Capitall branch of the ſame Franchiſes, in putting to death an Earle, and ſo deare a friend of the Kings, * without any iudiciall proceeding by trial of his Peeres, which cauſed a laſting hatred betwixt the King and his Nobles.

(15) There wanted nothing now to King Edward but preſent meanes to reuenge the bloud of his friend, or rather of his halfe-ſelfe, the lacke whereof did encreaſe the ſorrow he tooke for his death; which being well knowne to the Lords, they reſolued not to lay downe Armes, till they had prouided for their ſecurity, and the performance of all ſuch poynts, as concerned the temperament of the Regall power, that (vnder colour thereof) the Nobles themſelues might finger ſome part of the Soueraigne gouernment. The King was then at London, and the Lords at Dunſtaple: but by the continuall inter-dealings of the Prelates, and of Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter, who ſtood neutrall, the kindling diſpleaſures were for the preſent allayed, vpon condition that the Lords ſhould reſtore to the King all ſuch things, once belonging to Peirs Gaueſton, as they had taken at Newcaſtle, which they accordingly did.

(16) King Edward neuertheleſſe, as if his Soule were ouer-caſt with ſome blacke Cloud, continued mourning, till it pleaſed GOD to enlighten the World with the birth of a young Prince, whoſe noble Acts did afterward redeeme all the blemiſhes wherewith his Fathers infelicities had darkened the brightneſſe of the Engliſh name, and at this preſent cleared the minde of the ſorrowfull King his father: for * vpon S^t. Brices day, Iſabel his Queene brought forth her firſt Sonne at Windſor, which cauſed great rejoycing through the Kingdome. Her French kindred and friends (which were there in good numbers of either ſex) and among them as chiefe, the Queenes owne brother, Lewis the French Kings ſonne, would haue had the Infant at his Baptiſme named Lewis, but the Engliſh Lords would * not permit, who therefore was after his Fathers and Grand-fathers name, called Edward. This was he who afterward rayſed the honour of Engliſh Cheualrie to ſo high a poynt, by his famous victories in France and elſewhere.

(17) The euill-will which the King bare in his minde againſt the Barons for their ouer-ruling his affections, and the death of Gaueſton, by ſundry bad offices and ſycophancies of the * French at Windſor, was rubd ſo hard vpon, that it grew raw againe before it was halfe healed. Therefore in a Parliament at London, the King ſharpely charged thoſe preſumptuous

(18) The mischieuous effects of the Kings former mis-gouernement, began now most perilously to discouer themselues. For the Scots, his neighbours, who could not be ignorant of all such griefes and maladies as festred in the heart and entrals of England, had long since made their timely vse thereof, adhering so to the vndaunted Bruce, that by degrees he had gotten a great strength, and was againe publikely receiued, and obeied for King of Scotland, from most places whereof hee * draue the English, and (in contempt of Edward) committed great spoyle, by slaughter of People, burning of Townes in Northumberland, and other Acts of Hostility. The principall charge of Scotland for King Edward, had beene entrusted to the Lord Iohn Comin a Scot, Earle of Bucquhan, whom * King Robert had vanquished in battle, and was now (while Edward sate bewitched with most vnworthy languishments) grown potent, sending his brother Edward Bruce to besiege the Castle of Striueling, which was in the hands of the English.

An.D.1314. King Edward with a mightie Army in Scotland.

(19) The King of England awakened out of his slumbers with these Alarums, marched thereupon with a very great Army toward the said Castle. It pleaseth Hector Boetius (putting off, as it were the Historian) to report maruellous things of the numbers of Souldiers which came with King Edward in this journey; for (if he say true) there were not fewer then one hundreth and fifty thousand horse-men, and as many thousand foot-men; and that we may not suspect the multitude to be farre greater then eyther the cause required, or the realm of England could well afford, he informeth vs, that besides the English there were in his ayd at this time, Hollanders, Zelanders, Brabanders, Flemings, Picards, Boloners, Gascoignes, Normans, with much people of many other Regions; and that besides these three hundreth thousand men of warre, there were infinite families with their women, children, seruants, and household-stuffe: but because other Writers doe ingenuously grant, and containe probable matter enough for the honour of the Scottish Nation in this journey, we will as neere as we can, (being things to vs neither vp nor downe, in regard of the long time since these hostilities hapned,) truely and freely, though briefly, informe our selues hereof.

(20) The Earles of Lancaster, Warren, Warwicke, and Arundel (the greatest Peeres of the land) * refused to attend their King in this seruice, for that he had delayed to ratifie the poynts of their desired liberties, and prouisions for the pretended better gouernement of England, by himselfe so often consented vnto. In which as their loyall affection cannot be much admired; so it is certaine, that King Edward hereby vndertooke that voyage with farre the lesse force eyther of men or counsell. Neuertheless his hoast was great enough (if numbers did sway in such affaires, more then religion, discipline, and valour,) to haue effected more then it selfe did suffer. But King Edward and his people rather seemed to goe toward a wedding, or a triumph, then to a Battle, * adorning themselues with all sorts of riches, gold, siluer, and the like toyes, in a kind of wanton manner, correspondent to the humour of the Prince whom they followed.

(21) In this journey it was made manifest, what true and sober valiancie could effect, against light brauery and insolency. King Robert lodged with his forces (being inferiour in numbers to the English) not farre off, where was nothing but a religious, * deuout, and modest care, quickned (after manifold calamities) with a most noble desire to recouer the liberty of their Country, and to settle the same, into the hope whereof they were the rather erected by a fresh victory, which they had obtayned that day vpon certaine of the English * horsemen. King Edward on the contrary part nothing esteeming so sleight a presage, resolued vpon the very next being Midsommer, or Saint Iohn Baptists day) to take a terrible reuenge vpon the Scots: but how to effect the same the care was not excessiue; for in his Campe, * Wassaile, and Drinke-haile were thundered extraordinarily, as accounting themselues sure of the victory: which kinde of impious selfe-trust, if God Almighty did not sometime scourge with just and terrible confusions, what out-rages would not bee executed?

Next to Gods anger against the English, (whom courtly Pride and Sloth had now effeminated) this stratageme was the cause of their ruine: for whereas they reposed much vpon their Cauallerie, in these Pit-falles, the fury of their charge was intercepted and broken, the riders being miserably slaine by the Scots, whom King Robert marching formost on foote, had presented most couragiously to the enemy.

(23) The King of England not altogether careless, neyther yet by his care able to doe much (as one whom God was not well pleased with) had ordered his battels with some aduice, but vpon the dismall and vnexpected discomfiture of his Horse in those mischieuous holes or ditches, was enforced, (after some troubled resistance) to leaue to the Scots the greatest victory that euer they had before or after. * Hardly could King Edward be drawne to flie: the courage which it became such a Monarch to haue then first disclosing it selfe, till by his friends he was enforced to seeke his preseruation by that more necessary then noble meanes, and with him (besides others) the Lord Hugh Spencer) whom our * Courtier cals, A faint-hearted Kite) betooke himselfe to like remedy.

Robert de Clifford, and beſides other Lords, about *ſeuen hundreth Knights, Eſquiers, and men of Armories. Of the reſt the ſlaughter could not be but great, though much the leſſe, in regard the Scots fought on foote. Hector ſaith, that there were not ſlaine fewer then fiftie thouſand Engliſh, no Writer elſe, that hitherto we can meete with, exceedes the fifth part of that number; the Riches gotten by ſpoyles and ranſomes of the Engliſh, were doubtleſſe very great. (29) Meane-while the ſtate of the Kingdome was miſerable, there being no loue betwixt the King and the Peeres, nor any great * care in him, or them, of the common affaires; neuertheleſſe they aſſembled at a Parliament in London, where no great matter was concluded: for the famine and peſtilence encreaſed. The famine was growne ſo terrible, that horſe, dogges, yea men and children, were ſtolne for food, and (which is horrible to thinke) the Theeues newly brought into the Gaoles, were torne in peeces, and eaten preſently halfe aliue, by ſuch as had beene longer there. In London it was proclaymed, that no Corne ſhould be conuerted to Brewers vſes, which Act the King (moued with compaſſion toward his Nation) imitating, cauſed to be executed through all the Kingdome; otherwiſe (ſaith Walſingham) the greater part of the people had dyed with penury of Bread. The bloudy-flux or diſſenterie, cauſed through raw and corrupt humours, engendred by euill meate and dyet, raged euery where, and together with other maladies brought ſuch multitudes of the poorer ſort to their end, that the liuing could ſcarſe ſuffice to bury the dead.

(30) The King was now in ſo great diſlike and diſtruſt with the Lords and Barons, that they would not appeare at Clarendon, where hee held a great Councell. To augment this fatall auerſion, a certaine Knight belonging to Iohn Earle Warren, ſtole away from Caneford in Dorſetſhire, the Wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter (chiefe of the Lords faction) not without the Kings conſent (as it was ſaid) and brought her to the ſaid Earle Warrens Caſtle at Rigate, with great pompe, and in deſpight of the Earle; whom one Richard de Saint Maurice, a wretched, lame, and bunch-backt Dwarfe challenged for Wife, pretending that he was formerly contracted, and had lien with her, which ſhe (the greateſt and nobleſt Inheritrix of her time) did openly confeſſe, to her immortall infamie, incurring alas (ſaith Walſingham) the publike note of a moſt filthy Strumpet. This deformed Elfe (hauing mightie Seconds) durſt hereupon claime the Earledomes of Lincolne and Saliſburie as in her right, and in the meane time, the name and honor of Thomas the great Earle was baffold, as it were, by a light and wicked woman.

An. D. 1317.

(31) The parts of England beyond Humber, were now more and more afflicted; for ſuch as till then had oppoſed themſelues againſt the Scots in defence of the Countrey, perceiuing all things left at large, in ſtead of Protectors became Tyrants, * ſaith our Authour; of defenders, deſtroyers; and of valiant Champions, treacherous Chapmen; ſo that as betweene the hammer and the anvile, the Scots vpon the one ſide, and theſe falſe Engliſh on the other, all was lamentable, and brought in a maner to nothing: and this face of things continued there about foure yeeres.

* Tho. Walſingh.

(32) Neither did the King ſeeme to haue any will or power to relieue the common calamities, but rather to conuert his whole both wits and forces vpon reuenges againſt the Lords, who vnder pretence of their extorted prouiſions, manifeſtly with-drew their loues, ſeruice and dueties from him: wherefore feeling himſelfe thus weake and diſfurniſhed, he beſought the ſpirituall aſſiſtance of Pope Iohn the two and twentieth; who thereupon ſent certaine Cardinals to ſet all things in quiet without bloud-ſhed. Betweene the King and the Earle of Lancaſter, they eſtabliſhed a peace, who, in a *certaine plaine neere Leiceſter met, embraced and kiſſed each other; but when they could not worke the like with the Scots, they put that Country vnder Interdict.

* Tho. de la More.

(33) For they (as it is the manner of proſperity) after the victory at Banocksbourne, which clearely got them Scotland, did begin to bethinke themſelues of gaining new Empire in Ireland. Thither Edward Bruce, Brother of King Robert, had paſſed with an Army, procuring * himſelfe to be crowned King thereof, by fauour of ſome of the Iriſh Nobility, whom neuertheleſſe about three yeeres from his firſt entrance, the Engliſh vnder the conduct of the Archbiſhop of Armagh, and of Iohn Lord Brinningham Iuſticiar of Ireland, valiantly encountred, where together with his late vſurped Kingdome, hee loſt his life. There were ſlaine in that battell many honourable Scots, beſides the new King Edward, and aboue * fiue thouſand others: his head was cut off *at Dundalke (ſaith Walſingham) but Hector Boetius writes that hee was ſlaine in the battle it ſelfe. ſo happy victory ouer the Engliſh at Banocksbourne, was ſowred with this loſſe.

(34) But King Robert (as a moſt expert and vigilant Prince) did not ſuffer this joy to continue long to the Engliſh, for by practiſe with one * Peter Spalding, to whom King Edward had entruſted the keeping of Berwicke, he recouered it from the Engliſh, ſaith * Harding, By treaty, with Peace, Spalding, and treaſon; after it had remained twenty yeeres in their poſſeſſion; which when King Edward thought to haue wonne againe, the Scots diuerted him from the ſiege, with incurſions and ſlaughters of his people in other parts of England, not fayling much of ſurpriſing the Queene in a Village not farre from Yorke, where ſhe ſojourned during the ſiege at Berwicke, the plot being laide, and drawne betweene the Scots and ſome perfidious Engliſh, whom King Robert had monyed for that purpoſe. (35) To giue ſome breathings after theſe ſo manifold troubles, a truce was agreed vpon and confirmed betweene the two Kings of England and of Scotland, for the ſpace of two yeeres, which brought forth confuſion and not refreſhment. For thus it hapned; The King vpon the commendation of the * Lords themſelues, had made Hugh de Spenſer Lord Chamberlaine, who being at the leaſt of equall inſolence, vices, and ambition to Gaueſton, ſo wrought that he ſucceeded in ſhort time to all the graces of familiarity and power which euer Gaueſton enioyed, as in like ſort to all his hatred and enuy. Hugh his father, an ancient Knight, the better to ſtrengthen his Sonnes courſes, was likewiſe imployed, and grew in ſpeciall fauour with the King, who afterward alſo created him Earle of Wincheſter, but the Father in manners vnlike to the Sonne, was ruined rather by a naturall tenderneſſe, then any malicious will. The ſonne, as he was of ſhape moſt louely, ſo the very ſpirit it ſelfe of pride, and rapine, carried him to all ſorts of intollerable behauiours and oppreſſions, that Gaueſton might with good reaſon ſeeme to be wiſhed for againſt. Againe theſe two, who wholly ſwayed the vnfortunate King, Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and in a manner all the Barons of the Kingdome, (who meant the King ſhould loue none but with their leaue, did ſwell with ſuch impatience, that (not contented with the waſt of their lands) they neuer reſted till (by the terrour of ciuill Armes) thoſe two Fauourites (father and ſonne) were baniſhed; they thus reuenging vnder publique pretexts both publique injuries and * their owne.

(36) In all contentions which hapned betweene the King and his Lords, Queene Iſabel had euer hithe to beene a maker of Peace, doing therein worthy offices, but the euill ſtarres of the Earles of Lancaſter and Hereford would not ſuffer her to continue any longer ſo: for the Queene being denyed lodging one night at the Caſtle of Leedes in Kent, which belonged to the Lord of Badlesmere (one of the Earles faction) ſhe with-drew her good conceit, and was an authour to the King of preſently reuenging that diſhonour, who vpon her complaint, came in perſon with many thouſand Souldiers before the Caſtle, tooke the * Captaine, and put both him and all the men therein to ſhamefull death. Moreouer, longing to be righted againſt the Lords for their late inſolencies, marched on to Circeſter, taking many Caſtles, and beſieging others: The Lords (who little ſuſpected any ſuch ſodaine aſſaults) prouiding in the meane time for their defence.

(37) Thither repaired to him (at his commandement) Hugh Spenſer the ſonne, who had houered vpon the Sea, expecting from thence the ſucceſſe of things vpon the Land. The Lords, who had faine from their Soueraignes good conceit, and wanting now their wonted Mediatrix the Queene, lay open to all the miſchiefe which enemies could worke them by the King, who (as taking his Regall power and authority to be in danger) reſolued wiſely & manfully, to die in the quarrell, or to bring the Lords to be at his commandement. (38) The Lords, not all of a like temper, began to miſdoubt, and many of them forſooke their Chiefe, (the Earle of Lancaſter) and rendred themſelues to the King, or were apprehended; among which were the two Rogers Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London, and others to Wallingford Caſtle. The faction weakened by this defection made head in the North, vnder the Earle of Lancaſter, who now was to fight for his life. Thither the King marcheth, and with the onely ſhew of his Armie, made the Earle to flie from Burton vpon Trent, whoſe forces in their retreat or flight behaued themſelues outragiouſly.

(39) But Gods heauie diſpleaſure, and the Arme of the Kings power left them not ſo: for at Burrowbrigge, Humfrey de Bohun was ſlaine by a Welſhman, who thruſt him into the body with a Speare from vnder the Bridge; and the Earle of Lancaſter himſelfe with other principall men, Barons and Knights, to the number of aboue * foureſcore and ten were taken priſoners, by a man of ſmall fortunes, Andrew de Herckley Captaine of the City of Carleil, and Sir Simon Ward, * Captaine of Yorke, who with great forces out of thoſe parts, ſtopt their farther paſſage at Burrowbrigge, as the Kings forces tooke all ſafegard from them behinde.

Neuer did Engliſh earth at one time drinke ſo much bloud of her Nobles in ſo vile manner ſhed as at this, which, whatſoeuer could be pretended (as doubtleſſe their offence was capitall) yet all was taken to be done as in the quarrell of the Spenſers onely, nor was it vnreuenged, as will appeare: in the mean ſpace their enemies not contented with their bloud, procured alſo the * confiſcation of their eſtates and inheritances.

An. D. 1323. King Edward moſt bitterly vpbraids the Earle of Lancaſters death.

(46) Among them who were condemned for riſing with the Earle of Lancaſter, there was one of a meane Family, for whoſe life neuertheleſſe, becauſe he had once ſerued in Court, and was pleaſing to ſome of the Grands, or Potent fauourites therein, many interceded, and preſſed the king ſo farre on his behalfe, that he brake out into theſe * moſt vehement words, A plague vpon you, for curſed whiſperers, malicious back-biters, wicked counſellors, entreat you ſo for the life of a moſt notorious knaue, who would not ſpeake one word for the life of my neere Kinſman, that moſt noble Knight Earle Thomas? Had he liued, wee and our whole Realme ſhould haue had ſpeciall neede and vſe of him. This fellow the longer he liues, the more villanies he will commit, as hauing already filled my Kingdome with his deſperate outrages. By the Soule of God he ſhall therefore die the death he hath deſerued.

* Walſingham cals them verba impetij

(47) By this then it is euident, that theſe tragedies againſt the Lords were exployted by others; in which it is plaine that the King (otherwiſe ſo deuout to GOD, ſo noble and ſo full of naturall good propenſions) was fatally ouer-wrought by wicked counſell; though hee therein be inexcuſable, for good nature (as we call it) cannot ſatisfie for publique errours. But the condemned man was forthwith put to death accordingly; the King being moſt highly offended, that none had entreated him on the Earles behalfe, whom (ſaith Walſingham) he did inwardly loue. Neuertheleſſe, he had not long before created the elder Spenſer Earle of Wincheſter, & deckt the plume of his fortunes with a top-feather taken out of the ſaide late Earle of Lancaſters eſtate, that is to ſay, with the Caſtle and honour of * Donington, parcell of the Earledome of Lincolne. Hauing thus farre ſhewed the originall of the miſchiefe, we will haſten now to the laſt Act or Cataſtrophe of our Edwards Tragedie, onely we will firſt remember ſome intercurring matters.

* Tho. Walſingh.

(48) You haue heard before, how that the Cardinals ſent from the Pope, had (in fauour of the Engliſh) put Scotland vnder Interdict; wherefore King Robert now at laſt diſpatched the Biſhop of Glaſcow, and Thomas Randolfe Earle of Murrey to Rome, for obtayning releaſe and abſolution, but they returned without effecting it. Whereupon King Robert moued to haue a truce for thirteene yeeres, which King Edward accordingly granted, and the Pope * then abſolued the Scots. The matters of Scotland ſeemed thus to be ſufficiently prouided for during that time, and the rather for that ſomewhat before the motion for truce, the King had cauſed the newly created Earle of Carleil, Andrew de Herkley, to be degraded, hanged, drawne and quartered for Treaſon, which hee was conuinced to haue entred into with the Scots,

(50) The Spenſers, both father and ſonne, the one thus created Earle of Wincheſter, and the other Earle of Gloceſter, aſpiring to the fulneſſe of command, and deſirous to leaue nothing in their eye, which might ſtumble their ſway with the King, failed not to beget immortall enmities both againſt themſelues and the King. The Queene tooke their carriage ſo heinouſly, becauſe (beſides other things) they had abridged her meanes of maintenance, (while themſelues abounded in all riches and magnificence) as ſhee complayned; * That the daughter and ſole heire of the King of France was married to a gripple miſer, and that being promiſed to be a Queene, ſhee was become no better then a waiting woman, liuing vpon a penſion from the Spenſers.

*S. Th de la More.

(51) Thus was the matter, and as it were, the Embrion, of their common deſtruction laid, and begun in the impotencie of a womans will, to helpe out the which with ſhrewd drifts and directions, they encreaſe her ſide with Adam Biſhop of Hereford, by ſtripping him out of all his Temporalties as a Traytour, for that he had ſupported the Mortimers in the Barons quarrell. This Adam (ſaith our Knight) was a man of moſt ſubtile wit, and in all wordly pollicies profound, daring to doe great things, and factious withall, who for this cauſe conceiuing deepeſt hate, and therefore eaſily growing deare to the Queene, made a great ſecret party. To which Henrie Burwaſh Biſhop of Lincolne, who (for like cauſes) had beene kept from his temporalties (about two yeeres) joyned himſelfe. Neither would the Spenſers auarice ſuffer them to weaken the multitudes of their enemies, for they ſold the Kings gracious fauour to ſuch as had beene in the Barons quarrell, at ſo great rates that they by graunting away lands and Manours to the ſaid Lords Spenſers for their pardons, &c. very many of the Nobles were impoueriſhed. To be ſhort, the royall power being in the hands of the Spenſers, and Roger Baldock Chancellour, or of their Creatures and Fauourites; this other faction had the generall diſcontentments of the Realme to worke vpon for their aduantage.

An.D.1325.

(52) The King thus guiding himſelfe, and hauing ſent his Brother Edmund Earle of Kent (vpon notice of the firſt troubles) with Forces into Gaſcoigne, who gaue ſome little ſtay for a time to the French proceedings, till they might otherwiſe be prouided for, it came to this poynt at laſt: that whereas the King had a purpoſe to haue gone in perſon into France, the Spenſers, who were afraid to be ſeuered from his perſon, the onely reuerence whereof they knew to be their ſafegard, and yet not daring to attend him thither, or ſtay behinde, * perſwaded the King, contrary to the mindes of all the reſt, that the Queene (who ſought it) ſhould goe and negociate her husbands affaire in France. Shee did ſo; and whereas before her departure, things were in great extremity betweene the two Nations, inſomuch that all the French were baniſhed out of England, not they who were attendant on the Queen her ſelfe in neereſt place being ſpared, all matters by her negotiation and ſuite were quieted; vpon condition that King Edward ſhould giue to his Son Edward of Windſor (afterward King) the Dutchy of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Pontine, for which the King of France was pleaſed to accept his ſaid young Nephewes homage.

*Tho. Walſingh.

(53) This was done, and the Prince ſent ouer for that purpoſe to his mother, to the vtter vndoing of the King his Father, and of all his fauourites. For the heire of England being in forraine parts, among the contrary faction, all the conſultation was (vnder colour of ruining the Spenſers,) to accompliſh farther matters. The Prince, hauing (at Boys de Vincens) done his homage for that Dutchie and Countie to his vncle Charles de Valois King of France, was (as alſo the Queene his mother) ſent for backe by the King about Michaelmas; but the Queenes conſpiracy being not yet ripe, ſhe deferred to obay, detayning her ſonne ſtill.

(54) There went ouer with the young Prince, among many others, Walter Stapleton, Biſhop of Exceſter, who perceiuing into what familiarity the Lord Roger Mortimer was growne with the Queene, which * ſeemed greater then either ſtood with her honour or duetie, and ſeeing both him and other of the Kings enemies, and fugitiues, enioy that priuacie in counſell, which was aſſigned to himſelfe, who was now (as being none of theirs) * excluded, returned ſecretly (though vnſent-for) into England, faithfully (as it became a good man) declaring his knowledge.

transport into England. There her friends expected her arriuall daily, of which the Bishops of Hereford and Lincolne were not meanest: Her men and Naue being now ready, she with her sonne the Prince, the Lord Edmund Earle of Kent his Vncle, * Aimery de Valence Earle of Pembroke, the Lord Iohn of Henault, the Earle of Henaults brother, (a valiant Gentleman) the Lord Roger Mortimer, and many other English-men of name and note, with aboue two thousand and seuen hundred Henowayes and Germans, vnder the leading of the said Lord Iohn, arriued at Orwel in Suffolke vpon the Friday before Saint Michaels day.

The Kings proceedings after the Queenes arriuall.

(58) Her arriuall being reported to the King (who was, poore Prince, not onely destitute of friends and meanes, but as it seemes, of courage, and counsell also) it did not at first seeme credible. The truth appearing, he demaunded assistance of the City of London, whose answere was, That they would honor with all duty, the King, the Queene, and Prince, but would shut their gates against forreiners, and traytors to the Realme, and with all their powers withstand them. In this answere the King and his few friends reposing no assurance, hee committed an errour worse then that former of sending his sonne out of England, by retiring himselfe into the West, with his inseparable fauorites the Spensers, Baldocke and others there, to raise a force against the Queene: but before hee went, hee left his other sonne, the Lord Iohn (called of Eltham) in the Tower of London, with the Countesse of Gloceſter, the Kings Neece, Wife to the younger Spenser Earle of Gloceſter, committing the Tower it selfe to Sir Iohn de Weston, who was well prouided of men and victuals. He commaunded all men also to destroy and kill the Queenes partakers, none excepted but her selfe, her sonne, and Edmund Earle of Kent, the Kings brother by the Father, and that none, vpon paine of death, and losse of all that they might leese, should aid or assist them: and that he should haue a thousand pound, who did bring the Lord Mortimers head. Thus tooke he his last leaue of London, and in a manner also of his Rule or Domination.

(59) On the contrary part, there repaired to the Queene the Earle Marshall, and Henry Earle of Leicester, the Bishops of Lincolne, Hereford, Ely, and of Barons, Knights, and armed Souldiers no small multitude, whom as well to retaine, as to draw more, letters and rumours flew about, declaring (though falsly) that the King of France had in the ayde of his Sister sent so many Dukes, Earles, and others, that England could scarse suffice to feed them. This, for such whom the opinion of warlike strength would winne: but those whom shew of Religion might moue, it was as cunningly, and as falsly spread, that the Pope had excommunicated all such as did take armes against the Queene, and (the more to countenance the fiction) that two Cardinals imployed about the Premisses, were seen in the Queens Campe. Then was it proclaymed, that the causes of her comming were to deliuer the Realme from the mis-leaders of the King, which were named to be the Spensers, Roger Baldock Bishop of Norwich, Lord Chancellor, and their Fautors; all others to be safe, and that nothing should be taken from any other subject without true payment; but finally, that he who brought the yonger Spensers head should haue two thousand pounds. These things first thus ordered, the Queene with her sonne and whole power pursues the King, (as it had beene agreed by the Councell of Warre) taking first her way to Oxford: where the * whole Vniuersitie being called together, in the presence of the Queene, the Prince, Roger Mortimer, and the rest of that troupe, the Bishop of Hereford (the Queenes bosome Counsellor) preaching to them on this Text, *2 King.c.4.v.19 * My head, my head aketh, deliuered to them the reasons of the Queenes comming with her army, concluding (more like a Butcher then a Diuine) that an aking and sick-head of a Kingdome, was of necessitie to be taken off, and not to be tampered with, by any other physicke.

The Londoners for the Queene.

(60) The Londoners, in fauour of the Queene, and hatred of the Spensers, committed sundry outrages, besides bloudy sacriledge in cutting off the bishop of Excesters head, and some others (whom the King had made Guardian of London) in their popular fury, among the which one of them was a Citizen of their owne Iohn le Marchal, who had beene of the yonger Spensers acquaintance. The Tower of London they get into their possession, placing and displacing the Garrison and Officers therein at their pleasure, vnder the name of the Lord Iohn of Eltham, the Kings second sonne, whom they proclaimed Custos of the Citie, and of the Land. They also set at liberty all prisoners, which by the popular Queenes commaundement was done through the whole Realme: and all banished men and Fugitiues were reuoked; who all * flocking vnto London, brought no small encrease to her forces.

* Ex Hist. quæ Brut. dicitur. M.S.

(61) Whither in the meane space doth wofull Edward flye? what force, what course, what way takes he poore Prince? O fearefull condition of so great a Monarches State, when a Wife, a Sonne, a Kingdome are not trusted, and those onely are trusted who had nothing strong, but a will to liue and die with him! The Queene passing from Oxford to Gloceſter (onward to the siege of Bristow-Castle) grew all the while in her strengths like a rowled snow-bal, or as a Riuer, which spreades still broader from the fountaine to the Ocean, * vires acquirit eundo. For thither repayred to her (for the loue of the young Prince) the Lord Percy, the Lord Wake, and others as well out of the North, as Marches of Wales. But Edward (hauing left the Earle of Wincheſter, the elder Lord Spenser, in the Castle of Bristol for the keeping thereof) meditates flight with a few into the Isle of Lundie in Seuerne Sea, or into Ireland, & while he wandreth about not finding where to rest safe, his royall credite, name, and power, (like a Cliffe which falling from the top of some huge rocke, breakes into the more pieces, the farther it rolles) are daily more and more diminisht as they scatter, till now at last they are come vnto a very nothing. After a weeke therefore spent vpon the Sea, Sir Thomas Blunt forsaking him, and comming to the Queene, he came on shore in Glamorganshire, where with his few friends he entrusted himselfe to God, and the faith of the Welsh (who indeed still loued him) lying hidden among them in the Abbey of * Neath.

(62) Now had the Queene and her Sonne (for his name was abused to all sorts of turne-seruings) taken the elder Lord Spenser at the Castle of Bristol, who (without any forme of triall) was cruelly cut vp aliue and quartered (saith de la More our Knight) being * first at the clamours of the people, drawne and hanged in his proper Armories vpon the common Gallowes without the City: but his Grandchild Hugolin stood so valiantly in defence of himself within the Castle of Kerfilli, that he had his life and the liues of all his assistants saued.

The elder Spenser put to death.

(63) The King not appearing, Proclamations were euery day made in the Queenes Army, declaring, * That it was the common consent of the realme that he should returne, and * receiue the gouernement thereof, so as he would conforme himselfe to his people. This (whether Stratagem or Truth) not preuailing, Henry Earle of Lancaster the late Earles Brother, Sir William la Zouch, and Rhese ap Howell a Welshman, who all of them had Lands in those parts where the King concealed himselfe, were sent with coyne and forces to discouer and take him. The Queene and her people lay in the City of Hereford, the Episcopall See of that great * Arch-plotter of her courses Adam de Ortlon, where by aduise and consent of the Lords, her sonne the Duke of Aquitaine was made High-Keeper of England, and they as to the Custos of the same, did sweare him fealty. (67) The Lord Spenſer and the reſt, * on whom William Truſſell the Iudge gaue ſentence of death, being now drawne to Hereford, the ſaid Lord being clad in his coat-armour, was moſt deſpightfully dragged to the place of execution, where, being firſt hung vpon a gallowes fifty foot high, hee was afterward headed, and cut into quarters; they who brought him to the Queene, hauing the promiſed ſumme of two thouſand pounds diſtributed among them for reward. His head was ſet vp at London, and his quarters in foure parts of the Kingdome. Simon de Reding was hanged ten foot lower then hee in the ſame place.

The King being now (we cannot ſay) come to himſelfe, but to the ſenſe of his miſery, the Biſhop of Hereford declares the cauſe of their preſent Embaſſie, and running ouer the former poynts, concludes as before, ſaying, (as in the perſon of the common-wealth) That the King muſt reſigne his Diademe to his eldeſt Sonne, or, after the refuſall, ſuffer them to elect ſuch a perſon as themſelues ſhould iudge to be moſt fit and able to defend the Kingdome.

(3) Vpon the Candlemas day it selfe, the young King receiuing the Order of Knight-hoode, by the hands of the Earle of Lancaster, and vpon the same day the Crowne of England at Westminster, Walter Archbishop of Canterbury performing the offices accustomed therein, iudged nothing to bee sooner thought vpon then to recouer the honour of his Nation vpon the Northerne enemies, whom his vnexperienced youth, and their former happinesse had emboldened; in which preparation while he was busied, the Queene his Mother, and her Mortimer, forgat not other things tending to their owne benefite and assurance.

King Edward prouided for warres with Scotland.

(4) First therefore there was procured for the Queene-mother so great a Dowry, that the young King had scarce a * third part of the Kingdome left for his maintenance; which excessiue estate, in title the Queenes, in the vse was Mortimers, and from this treasonable defalcation and weakening of the royall meanes, hee sinewed his owne deuises with authority and riches; so that his hatred against Spenser was not on behalfe of the Common-weale, but for that any one should abuse it for his priuate but himselfe. Lastly, when they had certaine intelligence, that sundry great persons and others, as the whole order of Fryers-Preachers, tooke pitty of the late Kings captiuity, and seemed to consult for his deliuerance, they knowing that by recouery of his former estate, their iust confusion must follow, they resolued to strengthen (as men supposed) their other impieties with murther.

(5) For albeit the Queene in her outward gestures pretended nothing but sorrow for her Lord and husbands distresse, yet in stead of bringing to him her person (which the deposed Prince did wonderfully * loue) shee onely sent vnto him fine * apparell and kinde letters, but contrary to the lawes of God and man, with-drew her selfe from nuptiall duties, bestowing them (as the fame went, which will blab of Princes as freely as of meaner Dames) vpon the bloudy Adulterer Mortimer, fathering her absence vpon the State, which (she fained) would not suffer her to come vnto him. The desolate Prince was hereupon taken from Kenelworth Castle, by expresse order from the * young King, at their procurement, for that the Earle of Lancaster (Lord of that peece) was suspected to pitty too much his calamity, Hee was deliuered by * Indenture, to Sir Thomas de Gournay the elder, and Sir Iohn Mattrauers, two mercilesse and most vnworthy Knights.

This happinesse certainely the poore Prince had, that after his emprisonment hee reformed his life into so pious and Christian sort, that it gaue occasion when hee was dead of disputation, whether * hee were not to bee reputed a Saint, euen as (say our Authors) there was the like Question concerning Thomas Earle of Lancaster, though beheaded for apparant Treasons. (10) The yong King was now vpon the borders of Scotland with a puissant Armie, where also the Queene mother, and Mortimer, with many other Nobles were present, and hauing enuironed the Scots (who had pierced into England with inuasiue armes) in the woods of Wiridale and Stanhope Parke, made sure account of a certaine victory; but by the treason of the said Lord Mortimer (as afterward was layd to his charge) they were suffered to escape out of that mischiefe, and the young King with griefe returned inglorious, after an huge waste of treasure, and perill of his owne person.

(13) For at this treaty it was, that the King (then in his Minority) ſealed Charters to the Scots at Northampton, whoſe contents were contriued by the Queene, the ſaid Lord Mortimer, and Sir Iames Dowglaſſe, without he priuity of the Engliſh. (15) There died likewiſe about this time Charles the Faire, King of France, (to whom K. Edward had not long before done homage for his Dutchie of Gaſcoigne) the third and laſt ſonne of Philip the Faire, King of France, by whoſe deceaſe the Crown of that noble Kingdome, deuolued to this our Edward King of England, in right of his mother Queene Iſabel: And becauſe vpon this * Title King Edward did afterward claime the ſaid Crowne, wee will here once for all inſtruct you in the iuſtice thereof.

* Polyd. Virg.

(16) Three ſonnes there were of King Philip the Faire (to wit, Lewis Hutin, Philip le long, & Charles the Faire) who all ſucceſſiuely raigned in France one after the other; and none of them leauing any Iſſue, at ſuch time as King Edward made his claime, the whole right ſeemed to be in Iſabel the onely Childe of the ſaid Philip which had any Iſſue, for an other ſiſter which ſhe had died an Infant.

(17) The caſe thus ſeeming plaine, was not for ſuch accepted by the French, who receiued to the Crowne Philip of Valoys, whoſe Father Charles of Valoys was yonger Brother to Philip the Faire, aduancing the Brothers ſonne before the daughters ſonne, not following the propinquitie or deſcent of bloud, but the melioritie of ſexe, vpon which ground they had alſo freſhly put-by Ioan daughter of Lewis Hutin, preferring Philip le long her vncle. The French inbarre her intereſt, pretended a fundamentall law or entaile, by which * no woman was inheritable to the Crowne of France, & in defence of that opinion withſtood King Edward afterward with ſo much loſſe & calamity, though that very law made Edwards title the ſtronger (* as himſelfe truely pleaded) hee being the Male, albeit his right deſcended by the Female.

(18) This Title to ſo glorious a Monarchy though it accrewed to the Engliſh, by this match with Queen Iſabel, yet doth *Walſingham freely pronounce; That neither that affinitie, nor any other contracts with the French, was euer auaileable or brought any benefit to England: which opinion, as it may ſeeme ſtrange, ſo will it anſwere a wiſe Readers paine in the fruit, to obſerue through, the courſe of our ſtories, whether the ſaid graue Writer had iuſt occaſion ſo to ſpeake or no. Another conceit there was of this Edwards marriage with Philippa the Earle of Henaults daughter, which about this time was conſummated, though Philip de Valoys (King of France, by intruſion as our Annales repute him) was her vncle, her Mother being his owne ſiſter.

King Edward marries Philippa the Earle of Henaults daughter.

(19) There ſtood now at home againſt the ſtream of the Queene, and her Lord Mortimers abſolute ſway, ſome great perſonages, who did not wholly allow their doings, among which was the Kings vncle, Edmund Earle of Kent, whoſe death they ſhortly procured. Meane-while, the more to deſpite and dare their ouer-lookers, Roger Mortimer was created Earle of the Marches of Wales, at a Parliament holden at Salisburie: at which time alſo Iohn of Eltham the Kings Brother, was made Earle of Cornwall, and the Lord Butler of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From whence the Lord Henry Earle of Lancaſter, and ſundry other of the Peeres, ſeeing the King * troden (as it ſeemed to them) vnder foot, did abſent themſelues, meditating ciuill armes for redreſſe, who notwithſtanding (by the labour of Simon de Mepham Archbiſhop of Canterburie) was reconciled: This Archbiſhop very worthily alſo excommunicated all ſuch as had any hand in the ſacrilegious parricide of that * noble and loyall Prelate Walter Biſhop of Exceter, or any wayes violated him, their ayders, complices, or abettors whoſoeuer. But after the Coronation of Philippa the yong Queene, in another Parliament at Wincheſter, the ſaid Earle Edmund was condemned for conſpiring to deliuer his brother, late King of England, whom (likely inough by Mortimers practiſe) he was drawne into an abſurd beliefe to be ſtill aliue. Thus, for deuiſing to ſet a dead man at liberty, this noble Earle Edmund the Kings halfe-vncle had his head ſtrucken off, though from * Noone till ſiue at night, he ſtood at the place of death without the Caſtle-gates, none being found to behead him, till a baſe wretch of the Marſhal-ſea was ſent, and did it: ſo little conſcience did the malice and ambition of his potent aduerſaries make of ſhedding the Royal bloud, which by Gods iuſter iudgement was not long vnreuenged.

pace did now approach and ſummon Mortimer to a bloudie account; for the yong King addicting himſelfe to ſerious thoughts, and putting on the Man before his yeeres required, eaſily ſaw his owne perill in the others potencie. The Queene his Mother (to the common diſhonour and griefe of the Kingdome) being generally bruted to be with-childe by Mortimer, hee vpon ripe aduiſe ſodainely and aduenturouſly ſurpriſed the proud man at a Parliament holden in Nottingham; with whom were taken the L. Geofrey Mortimer his ſonne, and Sir Simon de Bedford* Knight, and Iohn Deuerel Eſquier, aſwell for expiation of the late King Edwards death, as in complement, as it were of ſo great a mans fall, whoſe liues doe ſeldome, or neuer periſh ſingle.

(24) Now came Scotlands turne about to ſuffer againe moſt grieuous loſſes and afflictions, an ordinary effect of Childrens gouernment, whether Children in age, or in diſcretion: for the Lord Edward Baliol hearing of King Roberts death, and the tenderage of King Dauid as ſon and heire of that Baliol, to whom K. Edward the firſt had adiudged the Scotiſh crowne, with ſuch voluntaries as hee could raiſe (though his Father the Lord Iohn had * releaſed his claime to king Robert, and though King Edward in fauour of his ſiſter Ioan Queen of Scotland, would not openly at firſt ſupport him) embarkt himſelfe in Yorkeſhire, and inuaded that Realme, where, vpon his landing, he ſlew Alexander Setoun at Kingorn, & about nine hundred others, putting the reſt to flight. Not long after (that no miſchiefe might come alone) neere to the water of Ern, at a place called Dupline, where the Earles of Mar and March, with two puiſſant armies of Scots, for the defence of their yong King Dauid lay encamped, the ſaid Lord Edward (whoſe ſmall numbers, not exceeding three thouſand Engliſh, the Earles as ſecurely and as fatally contemned, as the Engliſh vnder Edward the ſecond had contemned the Bruce and his Scots) obtained of them a wonderfull victory. Boetius (who neuer, or rarely, leaues any ouerthrow purely to the manhood of the Engliſh) will needs haue this diſcomfiture effected by a Camiſado, the Baliol and his Engliſh with others paſſing the water of Erne by a Foorde in the night, when the enemy little ſuſpected it.

(33) The King of England hoping now that all was well there, had newes brought vnto him not long after, at the Parliament at London, that the Scots were out in Armes againe; whereupon he obtaines ayde of money from his Subiects for repressing their attempts, promising to goe against them in person. * The Lord Robert Stewart, sonne of the Lady Marjorie Bruce, daughter of King Robert (vpon whose line the remainder of the Crowne of Scotland had beene estated) was the man that first lifted vp the head of his Country in this dangerous, sad, and desolate condition (though put into action vpon a priuate iniury done vnto him by the Earle of Athol) to whom diuers did adhere, though the quarrell seemed properly to be the said Lord Roberts, for that if the Bruces were cut off, his hopes perished in them. The Earle of Murray, and he, were then chosen gouernours for King Dauids party, but by reason of the diligence and power of Dauid Earle of Athol, they were not able as yet to conuene, or effect any thing against the English: neuertheless it was not long before they slew the said Earle Dauid. At this Parliament the King of England purposed to * goe vpon his owne charge into the Holy-Land, and to send the Archbishop of Canterbury to deale with Philip de Valoys King of France, for appointing a certain time, wherein they two with their vnited forces, might take their voyage thither, from which the desire of obtaining the Crowne of France, vpon the fore-mentioned title, did quickely diuert him.

But about the end of May, the King sent his cosen the Lord Henrie, sonne to Henrie Earle of Lancaster, with a great Army to the aid and seruice of the Lord Edward Baliol King of Scotland, which wasted all the Countries about Perth; where, while they lay, the King with a very small Company came sodainely vnto them, and from thence pierced farther one way then euer his Grand-father Edward had done, suffering fire and death (the common furies of warre) to worke vpon all that might suffer destruction, to establish a Conquest. (37) There was in ſpeciall credite with King Edward, one Sir Robert de Artoys, who being baniſhed by the French King out of thoſe parts, and made (by King Edward) Earle of Richmond, laboured earneſtly (vpon hatred to the French King for his priuate diſcontentments) to draw him to claime the Crowne of France as his moſt lawfull right, and as that which would indeed enrich his people with ſpoyles, and treble his owne greatneſſe by the Conqueſt: The motion though by reaſon of the highneſſe and difficulty of the enterpriſe, it did not at firſt preuaile; yet at laſt by the euill fate of France wrought out to it ſelfe a wonderfull allowance. Many conſultations paſſing of the matter, it could not be ſo concealed, but that the ſmoake thereof diſcouered the breeding fire. This in the preſent was very happy for the ſtate of Scotland, which * (ſaith Hector) was in appearance ſo enfeebled, that if the King of England had continued his warres, it ſhould haue come without any hope of reliefe to vtter ruine. It was alſo a cauſe, why the French (who hitherto had ſupported the Scots, but not as if it ſo neerely concerned themſelues) put in the more fully and roundly, ſeeking by all meanes to weaken and annoy the Engliſh, aſwell in Scotland, as in Gaſcoigne, and where elſe ſoeuer.

(38) That we may with the leſſe confuſion, and fewer interruptions, deliuer our ſelues of the French warre, which now approached, wee will here in one view tender vnto you the Scottiſh affaires, from this time for ſeauen or eight yeares, till about the ſiege of Calis by K. Edward, who was ſcarſe alighted in England from the former expedition, but the Brucean party (vnder their chiefe leader Andrew Murray) iſſued from the Loughes, Mountaines, and other their places of retreat and faſtneſſe, to re-aduance their cauſe. King Edward once or twice ſent Armies, vnder valiant Generals to ſupport the Baliols poſſeſſion againſt their violence, whoſe ſucceſſe was variable till the death of Murray. After whom the Lord Stewart tooke charge for the Brucean ſide, and (vpon the aduantage of King Edwards ſlackneſſe, to finiſh his Scottiſh affaires, the matter of France ſo far preponderating it) endeauoured to prepare a quiet entrance for King Dauid. The aide of the Lord William Dowglas to that purpoſe was very auailable, howbeit not alwayes fortunate, being ouerthrowne in a ſet battell by Sir Thomas Berckley at Blackbourne, hauing there with him King Edwards power. To the vp-ſhot, and as it were deciding ſtroke of theſe late miſeries, there arriued great ſtore of munition out of France, at ſuch time as the Lord Robert Stewart hauing lien ten weeks at the ſiege of Perth, was almoſt ready to haue abandoned the ſame in deſpaire. Perth being rendred, the Baliol (whoſe the quarrell was) betooke himſelfe into England, hauing ſmall ſtrength of his owne in the hearts and affections of the Scots, who reuolted daily from him. Vpon ſure intelligence of all theſe matters, King Dauid, his Queene, and many honourable French, and Scots, returne, and till the quarrell of Philip de Valoys put him into vnfortunate Armes againſt the Engliſh, the afflicted Realme of Scotland enioyed a kinde of reſt and quiet.

(40) But, that the world might take true notice of his iuſt proceedings, the maine cauſes for iuſtification of his deſigne vpon France (whereby the common cauſe againſt the Turke was neglected) himſelfe in a copious Epiſtle, directed to the Colledge of Cardinals, doth * publikely declare to be theſe;

The grounds of King Edwards iuſtification for making warre.

* In that Epiſtle he doth acknowledge the excluſion of women from Soueraignty in France, and therefore claimes as the neereſt Male.

1 His Title to the Crowne of France, which Philip de Valoys vniuſtly detained, for that himſelfe, of any Male liuing, was the neereſt in bloud to the late King Charles his Vncle.

2 That his Agents and Ambaſſadors deſiring to put the cauſe to ciuill triall, were not onely not admitted to be heard, but were driuen away with feare of their liues.

3 That the Court of the Twelue Peeres, in giuing the Crowne from him, (who was then vnder age,) did therein leaue the office of Iudges, and were no better then robbers. And therefore their proceſſe made to his preiudice during his minority, was by all lawes void and fruſtrate.

4 That Philip de Valoys inuaded the Dutchie of Aquitaine, which belonged to the Crowne of England, and added ſuch places and lands as he had ſo wrongfully gotten, to thoſe which he had as wrongfully withholden, detaining all alike.

5 That he had aided and aſſiſted the Scots in their riſings againſt him, when as by reaſon of neare kindred he ſhould rather haue holpen him; and finally declared by his doings, that his honour, power, and life it ſelfe, were hated of him.

(41) King Edward neuertheleſſe (knowing that words were little worth in ſuch a caſe) to ſtrengthen his quarrell with friends, by the aduiſe of his counſell, and of his Father in law, the Lord William Earle of Henault, ſought to confederate and vnite vnto him the High and Low Dutch, Princes and people, which lay moſt commodiouſly for his vſes. But the better to hold them together, he was aduiſed to ſeeke the amity of the Emperour Lewis of Bauare, with whom he made (as by the euent was manifeſt) but an * vnprofitable confederation, though for the preſent it ſeemed to ſerue his vſes with the countenance: more to his aduantage were the ſingular endeauours of ſome other his priuate inſtruments, as chiefly of Iames de Arteuile, a wealthy Burger of Gaunt, one of a rare dexterity of wit, and ſo popularly acceptable among the Flemings, that he ſeemed to ſway Flaunders more by far then the Earle thereof, whom they had expelled. By the ſpeciall diligence of this Iaques van Arteuile, and of one * Sigar de Courtray, a Nobleman of Flaunders, there was prepared among the Artizans of thoſe parts (whoſe chiefe enrichments depended vpon the handling of Engliſh-wooll, as Cloth-workers, Weauers, and the like) a mighty party for the Engliſh againſt the French. This amity with England (as moſt profitable for the common benefite, and weale of his Country) the ſaid Iames moſt conſtantly ſupported to the death.

This victory was atchieued, in the quarrell of the King of England, by the Earle of Derby, the Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Reynald Cobham, the Lord Walter de Manny (an Hennoway) and other of the Engliſh Captaines: Of the fame and lucky fortune whereof the ſaid D'Arteuile, and other of the Kings friends, made ſo wiſe and ſeaſonable vſe, by letting them ſee the Engliſh were able to protect them, that the Flemings (without any great ſtay) became his firme confederates; in preſence of the Earle of Gelder, at Gaunt, notwithſtanding that at the ſame time the great K. of France, and their owne naturall Lord, the Earle, laboured all they could to the contrary.

King Edwards care for the common-good, aſwell as for the warre.

(43) But as King Edward was (in the mean ſpace) wholly intent, vpon furniſhing himſelfe with all conuenient things fit for his warre, (hauing Captaines and Souldiers, ſuch as his owne noble heart could wiſh,) ſo when he found that the induſtrious Dutch by their manuall labours, grew to ſo great ſtrength and opulencie, that their friendſhip bred riuality in puiſſant Monarches, he, like a father, regarding the publike weale of his Country, ordained that all Cloth-workers, who would repaire hither out of forraine parts, and exerciſe their Trades, ſhould haue free acceſſe and ſundry priuiledges. By which inuitation as very many were drawne, ſo was it the principall cauſe of aduancing that honeſt, beſt and moſt beneficiall Trade in the Kingdome, to the great enrichment, ſtrength, and honour thereof. The Engliſh Nation was very deſirous to ſet forward this Warre, and therefore contributed plentifully, and the King made bold with Lombards, and the moueable goods of ſuch Priories in England, as were Cels to Monaſteries in France, thereby to make his coffers fuller.

Notwithſtanding, King Edward for auoyding Chriſtian bloud-ſhed, gaue inſtructions to the Cardinals, that vpon certaine equall conditions, he was willing to make an euerlaſting peace with the French, and would haue beene very glad (the hazards of warre conſidered) to haue taken any honeſt or proportionable offers; one impediment whereof was this, that the French would include the Scots within the Treatie, whom King Edward would not admit thereunto, as purpoſing (when he had ſingled them from ſupplies) to make a full and abſolute annexation of their obediences to the Engliſh Scepter: ſo the labour and hopes of the Cardinals proued vaine.

The French kings reaſons for reſiſtance.

(46) Philip de Valoys, in poſſeſſion king of France, had ſundry great and high motiues to embolden his ſtanding-off. Firſt, the regard of honour, and profit, and the abundant meanes which he had, hauing the whole puiſſance of France (the faireſt Kingdome vnder Heauen) at his commandement. Then a confidence which he reaſonably conceiued ſo to diuert, or diſtract the Engliſh forces, by the aſſured aid of the Scots, as that it ſhould finally ruine the whole enterpriſe, if not alſo the principall Actor Edward himſelfe. Againe, conſidering the vaſtneſſe of the enterpriſe, hee judged King Edwards wealth not to be proportionable, but did well hope, that a ſhort dalliance would conſume his treaſures. Moreouer, he judged perhaps, that the very thought it ſelfe of conquering France, was no better in Edward then a young mans dreame, conſidering the Realme of England was farre inferiour in bigneſſe, and multitudes of Subjects, and that there was a Sea betweene, the croſſing whereof muſt double the charge. Laſtly, for the friends which King Edward had procured in Dutchland with wonderfull largeſſe, he knew, would not be held together but with infinite coſt and expence, and that by ſome good meanes or other, he ſhould make them in whole, or in part vnprofitable.

Arguments for juſtification of his reſiſtance.

(47) For juſtification of his cauſe, he had no ſlender colours, or reaſons. As the before alledged law or cuſtome of France, which they call the Salick, by the which the French exclude * Gyneiocracie, or Womens Gouernement in chiefe. Then an Act of the whole French State, by which his right was acknowledged and eſtabliſhed. Thirdly, king Edwards birthplace, by which he ſeemed to them a ſtranger, and for that cauſe was farre the leſſe capable, or rather was directly incapable of popular good-will among the French. Laſtly, for that King Edward in the * beginning of his raigne (though when he was as yet vnder age,) did in his owne perſon, both doe his Homage to this very Philip de Valoys, as to the King of France, for his Dutchie of Aquitaine, and alſo * by his Letters-Patents vnder ſeale did teſtifie as much. This homage, (the more to be remembred becauſe * ſome attribute much of King Edwards diſcontentment to the hautie manner of Philip in taking the ſame) was performed at Amiens in Picardie. It troubled King Edward greatly, to ſee himſelfe making ſubmiſſion to the vſurper of that Soueraignetie, which he thought belonged to himſelfe; but to let the French ſee what kinde of Prince he was, he came in ſo royall manner appointed, as if he meant to haue ſtrucken them with feare or admiration: Earles, Barons, and 1000. Horſe he had in his retinue. At the day, his robe was of Crimſon Veluet, powdered with Golden Leopards, his Crowne on his head, a Sword by his ſide, and Golden ſpurres on his heeles. To receiue this Duke for the Dutchie of Guyen, and Earledome of Ponthieu, Philip de Valoys ſate crowned in violet Veluet, ſemined with golden lillies, with all the other Enſignes of royall Majeſtie, but the homage was done only by word (if * one ſay true) and not in that full manner which Serres mentioneth. Probable it is, that the haughty carriage of Philip did greatly incenſe the Spirit of King Edward, being one of the moſt gallant in the World.

(50) The Flemings, being the moſt neceſſary part of this aſſociation, in regard of their neereneſſe to the French, would not engage themſelues in an offenſiue warre againſt the Crowne of France, vnleſſe King Edward would firſt aſſume the Title and Armories of that Realme, as the onely lawfull King thereof. This Propoſition was throughly debated, and the law of Armes allowing it, he with the common aſſent of the Flemings and others, tooke the Stile, and quartered the Flower de Lize with the Leopards, or Lions of England, as here we ſee annexed; albeit we ſee his former Seale alſo adorned with two Lize or Lillies; whether in token of his mothers French deſcent, or as a couert note of his own right to the French crown it is vncertaine.

Others againe may ſuppoſe, that we haue not heere deſcribed them according to their right bearing, as certainly according to their preſent bearing we haue not; but the truth is, the golden Lillies of France, which now are borne in triangle, were in thoſe daies borne, and aduanced Semi.

The Armes of England ſet before thoſe of France at the firſt. Sir Robert Cotton hath ſuch a Seale of Qu. Iſabel.

(52) And whereas the Armories of France are placed here in the dexter and more honorable quarter, yet there are probabilities, that it was not ſo at this their firſt conjunction. For in the * Seale of Queen Iſabel (this King Edwards mother) the Armories of England, as being the Armories of the husbands line (and therefore to haue precedence) were marſhalled where now the Flower de Lizes ſhine. But whether to gratifie the French, or becauſe that was the more ancient and greater Monarchie, they were in this Kings raigne diſpoſed as here we ſee.

(53) When King Edward had thus aſſumed the Title and Armes of that Realme, he publiſhed the ſame vnder his ſeale, ſetting the name of England firſt, and ſent his Letters Patents to the Frontiers of the enemies Dominions, fixing them vpon the doores of Churches, as well to declare the right and reaſon of his doings, as to exempt ſuch from the daunger of the comming ſtorme, who vpon this notice would acknowledge him their Lord and rightfull Soueraigne. Theſe Proclamations or admoniſhments thus diuulged, he burnt and ſpoyled the North parts of France vp as farre as * Turwin, though the time of the yeere were very vnſeaſonable, and contenting himſelfe therewith for a beginning, gaue place to the ſharpeneſſe of Winter, returning to the Queene his Wife at Antwerpe, where he kept a royall Chriſtmas. In which City this yeere was Lionel (afterward Duke of Clarence) borne.

(54) His affaires growing ripe in thoſe parts, he leaues his Queene and Children in Brabant, as an aſſured pledge of his returne, and about Candlemas Ships himſelfe for England; where, in a Parliament at Weſtminſter, he obtayned liberall aydes for ſupportation of his intended Conqueſt. In lieu of which louing aſſiſtances, he granted a generall large pardon both for treſpaſſes, and of all Aides for making his ſonne Knight, and for marriage of his daughter during all his time; forgiuing alſo all arrerages of Farmers and Accountants till the tenth yeere of his Raigne, and all olde debts due to any of his Predeceſſors. Finally, he confirmed that famous Magna Charta, and of the Forreſt, with ſome other.

For the French Army comming before her, ſhe to abuſe their hope, ſet open her gates, and diſplayed vpon her Towers the golden Lillies, as if ſhe were theirs; but the French which ſecurely entred, found little good hoſpitality. Sir Oliuer de Ingham was Captain and Lord Warden there for King Edward, who with his Garriſon-Souldiers, and ayde of the inhabitants, ſlew of them great multitudes, and preſerued Burdeaux. But in the oppoſite parts, William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke, * after many honourable deedes performed for aduancement of King Edwards affaire, were by the French taken Priſoners, while preſuming too much vpon their courages and fortune, they * ran too farre into their danger, at the Towne of Lile in Flanders.

(56) But King Edward being ready now to repaſſe the Seas, had certaine intelligence that the French lay in waite about Sluice in Flanders, to intercept him, with a mightie Nauie of 400. He ſet ſaile from Harwich vpon Saint Iohn Baptiſts Eue, toward the Coaſt where his enemies attended, ſtrengthning himſelfe with the Northerne Nauie of England, which the L. Robert Morley brought vnto him, ſo as he had in all about two or three hundreth ſayle. His battels hauing the aduauntages of windes and ſunne, he ſet on the French with incredible fury and force, in the very mouth of the Hauen of Sluice vpon Midſommer day, where began a moſt bloudy and terrible fight, the end whereof ſet the Garland vpon King Edwards head. Himſelfe was * wounded in that fight, and loſt * foure valiant Knights (Monthermer, Latimer, Boteler, Poynings) with ſundry other of his Engliſh ſlayne therein. But the ſlaughters of the French party were lamentable, for thirty thouſand are confeſſed to haue periſhed, not halfe of their ſhips eſcaped vntaken or vnſuncke. A greater glory then this, the Engliſh are ſcarſe found to haue atchieued at any battle at Sea.

* Serres. Hollinſh. * Rich. Southw.

(57) The Crowne of France ſeemed already to be placed vpon King Edwards Temples, ſo much was attributed to this great victory; but ſuch a Conqueſt was not the worke of one day. Which King Edward well vnderſtanding, refreſhed his victorious Armie, and augmenting it with his Confederates forces (which repaired to him on all ſides) marched forth, hauing one of the moſt puiſſant hoſts that euer any King of England led, as wherein were neere an hundreth thouſand Souldiers Engliſh, and Dutch. He had alſo in his Company the Dukes of Brabant and Gelder, and many other potent members of the Empire, and (as * ſome write) the imperiall Eagles diſplayed in the head of his Army, as he that was Vice-gerent of the ſacred Roman Empire. In this wiſe he approached the Northerly parts of France, where expoſing all to ſpoyle and fire, he ſate downe with his whole Forces about Tourney, meaning to take in the ſame, as well to be a ſeate of Warre, as place of ſure retreat and refuge.

* Serres.

(58) Philip, though juſtly grieued with his wofull loſſe ſuſtained at Sea, yet to encounter, and cruſh ſo great an euill in the firſt approaches thereof, had prouided ſuch an Army, as beſeemed the Majeſty and greatneſſe of that renowned Kingdome. Writers ſpeake of an hundreth thouſand fighting men aſſembled vnder his commaund, and that beſides Princes, Dukes, Earles, and other illuſtrious Perſons, there was the valiant olde King of Bohemia, and * Lewis King of Nauarre. King Edward hearing the ſame, drew forth his people into the open field, with purpoſe to giue battle.

* Polyd. Virg. l. 19.

(59) It may ſeeme a thing greatly tending to King Edwards glory, to remember the * offer which he ſent to King Philip before he laide his ſiege to Tourney. In which, without ſaluting him by any other title then of Philip of Valoys, he challengeth him, for auoyding the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, to fight with him hand to hand in ſingle battle; or (if that miſliked) then each to bring an hundreth to the Field, and try the euent with ſo ſmall an hazard; or otherwiſe, within ten dayes to joyne full battle with all their forces neere to Tourney. Whereupon Philip made no direct anſwere, neither with his honour could, alledging that the letters were not ſent to him, the King of France, but barely to Philip of Valoys. Neuertheleſſe, he gaue him to vnderſtand, that his meaning was to beat him out of France, hauing hope in Chriſt (from whom hee deriued his power) ſo to doe.

* Thom. Walſing.

(60) The honour of the warre in thoſe ages cannot be enough commended, in which the noble olde formes of hoſtility were put in practiſe, by defiances, Heraldes, and publique aſſignations of day and place of fight, and not by skulking ſurpriſes and vnder-hand ſtealthes, more neerely reſembling highway robberies, then lawfull battle.

(61) Theſe two huge hoaſts (which had they beene vnited for the good of Chriſtendome, might haue worthily made the Turke looke pale) being now in ſight, and the Cloud of Warre ready in a manner to diſſolue it ſelfe into ſhowers of Bloud, doe neuertheleſſe without one ſtroake fall off, and returne to their ſeuerall Countries, not without the wonder and rejoycement of peaceable men, but not of the Engliſh and German Souldiers, who propounded to themſelues death with glory, or riches by Conqueſt and victory, who now had ſcarſe their wages.

(62) It is not meete that the name of that perſon who did performe ſo bleſſed an office, ſhould be concealed. It was a woman of honour (but at that time a profeſſed * Nunne in the Abbey of Fontenels) the Lady Iane of Valoys, ſiſter to this Philip, widdow of William late Earle of Henault, and mother to King Edwards wife; her charitable endeauors were ſtrongly holpen by * two Cardinals, who ſolicited peace together with her. Great intereſt of mediation ſhe had in either reſpect, heere a brother, there a ſonne in Law, and ſhe fayled not to ply them both. The Truce was concluded; the rather for that King Philip was aduiſed from all parts, not to ſet his whole fortunes vpon the Die and chance of a Battle. And Edward (on the other ſide) meaning nothing leſſe, then not to haue proſecuted the warre vpon the encouragement of his late Sea-victorie, was ſo deſtitute of money through the fault of his Officers in England, as he was the ſooner drawne, if not enforced to embrace ſo honeſt a colour of returning from the ſiege of Tourney; which neuertheleſſe did but deferre the miſeries of France, not determine them: and whereas that glory, which the vpper hand in this journey would haue brought, could not haue beene pure and meere vnto him, becauſe the Dutch (whoſe ayde he vſed) would haue claimed no ſmall ſhare therein, the Engliſh Cheualry onely had the name and burthen of ſuch great Acts as after followed.

* Serres.

* Ypodig. Neuſtr.

(63) The chiefe Articles of the Truce were; That it ſhould endure till Midſommer day then next enſuing, and that the Priſoners ſhould be ſet at libertie without any ranſome on both ſides, vpon condition to render themſelues againe, or pay their ſeuerall ranſomes, if peace were not in the meane time concluded. By vertue of this treaty and Truce, the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke were deliuered. Heere it troubled our * Walſingham, that King Edward ſhould be left ſo deſtitute, and needy, by the auarice or fraud of his Officers at home, as for that reſpect to giue ouer ſo faire an opportunity, by which he might as it were by a continued line, and by inſiſting and preſſing vpon the ſteps of his late ſucceſſe,

(64) King Edward greatly diſcontented with ſuch of his officers, through whoſe default he was thus in a manner conſtrayned to let ſlip the preſent proſecution of his deſigne, returned with his Queene into England, to take reuenge of their miſdemeanors, where he committed * ſome to priſon, put others from their places, and ſo beſtirred himſelfe, that by occaſion thereof much diſpleaſure grew betweene the King and Iohn Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who complained of manifeſt violences done againſt the Liberties of the Church and Engliſh Nation, comprehended in Magna Charta. And whereas the King did openly charge the Archbiſhop to haue beene a principall perſwader of his entring into league with the Almaines, againſt the French, willing him to take no care for treaſure, becauſe himſelfe would ſee him abundantly furniſhed from England, out of the leuy of granted Subſidies, and profits of the Crowne: and that through defect of the Archbiſhops performance, he was not onely conſtrayned to giue ouer his hold for the preſent, but alſo to embogge himſelfe in the Bankers and Vſurers bookes, the Archbiſhop thereunto made anſwere: That he deſired in open Parliament it might appeare, through whoſe default the city of Tourney was not taken, and directly laide the whole blame from himſelfe, and from his, vpon ſuch as were daily Courtiers, (whom Walſingham cals Anglici regij, Engliſhmen for the king) who ſeruing their own turnes with the generall abuſe, would expoſe him, and his, vnjuſtly to the enuy of their fact. Yea, ſome there are, who more then ſo, will haue the Archbiſhop ſeeme to practiſe againſt the Kings farther good fortunes in France; which, if it be true, it is no hard matter to finde out the principall motiue thereunto.

(65) For certainely the Pope (Benedict 12.) was nothing pleaſed with the ſucceſſes of Edward, at leaſtwiſe with the war it ſelfe, as pretending it was pernicious to Chriſtendome; the blame wherof the French charged vpon the Engliſh, as vnlawfully clayming, as the Engliſh did vpon the French for vnlawfully detayning. This Pope therefore interpoſeth himſelfe, and puts * Flanders vnder Interdict, as hauing diſloyally left their owne Earle, and their chiefe Lord Philip King of France, contrary to their Oath and Allegiance; but they for their defence and iuſtification anſwered, that Edward was the onely lawfull King of France, and Philip (to whom they had ſworn) a meere vſurper, and therefore notwithſtanding that Interdict, or the Papall deciſion of the controuerſie, they perſiſted ſtill in their adherence.

* Typodigm. Neuſtr.

(66) But the more to draine and weaken the mightie ſtreame of the Engliſh ſupportations, Lewis of Bauar the Emperour, ſodainely (by ſuch practiſes as were vſed on behalfe of the French) re-called his Vicar-ſhip or delegation, which he had made to Edward, to exerciſe imperiall power in lower Germany, offering his beſt helpe notwithſtanding, (as hauing power from Philip to that purpoſe,) to procure him honourable conditions, as a Mediatour betweene them. The pretence of his falling from King Edward, and concluding amity with his enemy, was for that King Edward without his priuity, had conſented to a Truce at the City of Tourney with Philip.

An. D. 1342.

(67) To theſe reuocatorie lines King Edward "made this wiſe and noble anſwere; That the Em-"perours zeale to make attonement, he could not but "greatly commend, wiſhing, that at the inſtance of "ſo potent a Mediator, an honourable Peace (if that "were poſſible) might be made; but his Title being "cleare enough, he meant not to make doubtfull by "putting it to any arbitration. That it could not but "be admired, why he ſhould now enter amitie with "Philip de Valoys the wrong-doer, ſith, hauing ſeene "his apparant right, he had entred with him into "league, againſt the ſaid Philip: That it was alſo a-"greed, that he might conclude any temporary Truce "(though not a finall accord) without his conſent, if "neede ſhould be, as in this caſe at Tourney it was. "That this reuocation ſeemed to be made ſomewhat "abortiuely, for ſo much as the Imperialiſts had "promiſed the Vicar-ſhip ſhould ſtand good till hee "had conquered France, or the greater portion there-"of. Dated thus; Londini, Anno regni noſtri Franciæ, 2. Regni verò noſtri Angliæ, 15. But Lewis of Bauar to Edward thus * inconſtant, and faith-breaking, continued toward Philip ſtedfaſt, without either amending Philips fortunes thereby, or himſelfe increaſing in Iuſtice or honeſtie, that it might eaſily be ſeene he was endued with qualities, which ill became the Imperiall height.

* Typodig. Neuſtr.

(68) You haue heard a part of great king Edwards victorious fortunes in battle, both by land and ſea; be not ignorant of his Pietie (the ſoueraigne ornament and ſafetie of Soueraigne Princes,) whereof in one act of his, we will tender vnto you in the ſtile of that age an Eſſay and taſte. He hauing a purpoſe to purſue his enterpriſe for France, after ſundry Chriſtian and holy conſiderations of Gods judgements, and of his owne eſtate and rightfull cauſe, he turnes his ſpeech to his Biſhops in theſe words: Cum "igitur conſtituti ſitis, &c. Seeing therefore you are "ordayned of God, on the behalfe of men, that you "ſhould offer gifts and ſacrifices for ſinne, liſten we "beſeech you to the premiſſes, and not to our one-"ly, but to the publiqué dangers, powring forth "prayers to the moſt High for our happy ſucceſſe, "ſupplying the place of Moſes, ſo that we and ours "may preuayle againſt aduerſaries, in the lifting of "your hands to heauen; and that God would be "the rather pleaſed to enlarge his fauour towards "vs, (the number of Interceſſors being multiplyed,) "cauſe preachings, and proceſſion, and other offices "of appeaſing his diſpleaſure, to be mercifully exer-"ciſed through our Cities and Dioceſſes, that the "God of mercies would extend ouer vs, and our Ar-"mies, the hand of his Benediction, and ſo direct our "Acts in his good pleaſure, that they may redound "to his glory and our profit, and to the commodi-"tie and quiet of all our faithfull ſubjects. This, O Edward, was indeede to begin at the right end; for euen the Heathen taught, * to begin with God, and thy following ſucceſſes declared that thy prayers were acceptable.

Publike interceſſions required of the Biſhops by the King.

* Ab Ioue principium.

(69) And now once againe the French and Engliſh powers were at poynt to try their fortunes by battle, vpon ſiding with other Claimes, as erſt they had done for their owne. The quarrell was founded vpon a title to the Dutchie of little Britaine. Arthur Duke thereof had two Wiues; by Beatrix his firſt wife, he had two ſonnes, Iohn (afterward Duke) and Guy; and by Iolant his ſecond Wife, he had Iohn of Montfort. Duke Iohn liuing without Iſſue, aſſured to Iane (daughter of his brother Guy, who dyed before him) the Ducall Crowne of little Britaine: vpon which entaile, Charles of Bloys (Nephew to Philip King of France) marrieth the Lady Iane, who in the life time of Duke Iohn, was (by agreement) put into full poſſeſſion: but Duke Iohn being once dead, Iohn of Montfort raiſeth warre, as the ſuruiuing heire male. Philip king of France took part with Charles of Blois, and Edward king of England, with the Lord Iohn of Montfort.

(70) Great and bloudy miſchiefes ſprang out of theſe ſtrongly ſupported factions, which had now drawne king Edward thither in perſon; and little Britaine (which may well in a ſort be called Wales in France, the Britons, chiefly the Britons Britonant, or ruder Britons, declaring at this preſent by the language, and ſundry locall Names, as Lanion, Triguier, &c.

A kinde of Wales in France.

&c. That their kinſmen are in Wales and Cornwal) was become the field of Mars and martiall Furies. But the powers of thoſe two mightie Kings being vpon poynt, before the Citie of Nants in high Britaine, to cut out their diuers ſhares in fortunes Patrimony, with the edge of the Sword, loe againe God inclined their hearts (as if he would faine haue done nothing but ſhew his vengeance in the Scabbard) by the carefull diligence of two Cardinals, to accept of a truce, which was concluded Ianuary the 19. at the Priory of Maleſtret, vpon ſundry poynts, whereof theſe (as to the purpoſe of our Story) are the principall.

(71) That the two Kings of England and France ſhould ſend certaine of their Bloud-royall to the Court of Rome (by a day certaine) there to argue their ſeuerall titles, and rights to the French Monarchy, not as before a Iudge, but as a friend * indifferent to both, and that the King of Scots, and the Earle of Henault, ſhould likewiſe ſend to giue their aſſent for ſo much as concerned them.

* How was he indifferent, who interdicted Flanders for ſiding with Edward?

(72) That eithers friends, adherents, and ſequels, ſhould be comprehended in the Truce, and that the truce ſhould extend it ſelfe to the titlers in Britaine and their ſides; and that the Cardinals ſhould doe their beſt to obtaine abſolution from the ſentence of Interdict executed vpon the Countrey of Flaunders.

(73) That the Truce ſhould continue for three yeeres; that priſoners or moueables taken on eyther ſide ſhould be mutually diſcharged; that traffique and paſſages ſhould be open; and that all other things ſhould ſtand as they did at the time of the Truce made: which being fairely engroſſed in an * Inſtrument, two great Peeres of each part, tooke oathes vpon perill of the Soules of their Kings, to obſerue the contents ſincerely.

(74) The poſſeſſion of the Citie of Vannes in baſe Brittain, the Engliſhmen ſtill kept, that (if ſetled peace followed not vpon this Truce) they might haue ſome hold and certaine footing-place, from whence to make head againe, and march into the heart of France. In this Warre Robert de Artois Earle of Richmond, a principall inſtigatour of King Edward, died of a wound, and Iohn of Montford did not long ouer-liue this truce, after whoſe death moſt part of Britaine came into the hands of * Charles of Bloys.

(75) King Edward returning home after the Truce, neglected not his domeſticke affaires, but enacted the Statute of Prouiſors, vpon this occaſion. Pope Benedict being dead, Clement the 6. ſucceeded; a man of * ſingular learning, but * extreamely profuſe in giuing, who, by way of Prouiſion, had beſtowed ſundry choyſe Benefices in England vpon Forreiners. For preuention whereof (as of a thing which the King and Peeres would not endure,) it was made high Treaſon by law, for any to bring ſuch Papal prouiſions into the Kingdome. And for juſtification of his ſo doing, he directed that * letter vnto the Pope which was ſo * excellently pen'd, as did not onely moue admiration, but aſtoniſhment; and indeede this pruned age affords few ſo graue and ſolide. (76) His noble father King Edward (who had ſtill his eye fixed vpon France, as the marke of his Conqueſt) hauing notice among other things, by a meſſenger from the Pope, that Lewis of Bauar had wholly ſubmitted himſelfe, and was fully abſolued from all cenſures, with confirmation vnto him of the Imperiall Diademe: the King, that you may by his courage know him worthy of ſuch a Sonne,) brake irefully forth into theſe words. Though Lewis take the French Kings part, I will fight with them both. And whether he were inuited with the fame of King Arthurs Table, and the Knights aduenterous thereof, or for that he knew honourable Company and exerciſe in Armes, to be the naturall parents of excellent Souldiers, it is agreed, that he erected a building at his Caſtle of Windſore; which ſhould be called the Round Table, whoſe circumference was ſixe hundred foote, where Knights and men of warre ſhould haue their entertainement of dyet, at his charge by one hundred pounds by the Weeke, though afterward, through occaſion of his Warres, he abated that ſumme to twentie pounds weekely. In emulation whereof, Philip de Valoys (knowing that all this tended but to preparations againſt him,) erected the like in his Court, to inuite the Knights and men at Armes of Almaine, and of Italie, from repayring to King Edward. One thing Philip did ſhrewdly and politiquely, in giuing leaue to his ſubjects to fell downe his woods freely for building of Ships, whereby his Nauy was greatly augmented, and the rather wrought much miſchiefe afterward. About this time one of the chiefe ſtarres in the Firmament of the Engliſh Cheualry fell into the Graue, William Montacute King of Man, and Marſhall of England, of * whoſe noble acts to write worthily were a commendable matter.

(77) But the French King, perceiuing that a terrible tempeſt was likely to fall vpon him from forth of England, waxed cruell in his jealouſie, and * put ſundry principall men of Normandy, Picardy, and Guyen to death, for no other crime, but that they were Engliſh in affection; among whom are reckoned Sir Oliuer de Cliſſon, * Bacco, Perſie, and Geoffrey of Maleſtroict, Knights of the beſt note; Sir Godfrey of Harecourt, brother to the Earle of Harecourt, being alſo ſummoned to Paris, appeared in England, whither hee fled, and became a ſpeciall fire-brand in the approaching combuſtion.

(78) It was not Pope Clements mediation, or diligence in diſcuſſing the Titles and Pretences of theſe two puiſſant Monarkes, which could preuent the fatall puniſhment of France, yet according to the Articles of the Treatiſe at Maleſtroict, eyther Prince ſent his particular Orators, where the difficulties roſe ſo thicke and intricate, as Clement * diſpairing to cleare them, put ouer their farther view till another time. But King Edward affirming the truce to be manifeſtly broken, * by the beheading and perſecuting of his friends in Normandy & elſwhere, ſignifies ſo much to the Pope, that Battle and not Parlance ſhould determine his right, and title. His prouiſions of Men, of Ships, of weapons, of victuals, of treaſure, of all things, needfull to ſo braue and daring an enterprize, were worthy of the greatneſſe, courage, ſtrength, riches, and majeſty of a King of England. Into Gaſcoigne he ſends that valiant great Lord Henry of Lancaſter, Earle of Derby, with a gallant company of leaders and troupes of ſouldiers, where he atchieued many great things, for the defence and enlargement of that Dutchie, taking Cities, Caſtles, and Townes, of which Iohn the French Kings eldeſt ſonne recouered diuers not long after; and diſcomfited the enemy in battle. The Scots attempting againſt the Weſt Marches of England, by the vigilancy and proweſſe of ſuch as were in truſt for thoſe parts, as the Biſhop of Carleil, the Lords Percie, Neuile, and Lucie, very gallant gentlemen, were forced to * retire into Scotland. It was the practiſe of either Prince to diuert and diſtract eithers puiſſance, we Philips in Gaſcoigne, and he ours, by his perpetuall, and conſtant confederates, the Scots. friend to life, gaue life notwithstanding about this time to an inuention, which as for the present it serued (he hauing so great vse thereof for his French enterprises) as a vehement Incentiue to martiall valour, and a golden band of vnitie, so the same is continued with likelihood of perennity, and multiplication of splendor in these our daies. It was the foundation of the English Order, worthily called the most noble Order of the Garter. The causes why our Edward erected it, are not euident, though there could none be greater or better, then those before recited; Honour expressed by externall and illustrious ensignes, deuised by a victorious Author, and appropriated to a fellowship of most exemplar and eminent persons, being in nature like a flame, to kindle in the apt and worthy, all heroicke affections. The vulgar opinion is, that whatsoeuer the remoter causes were which moued to this foundation, the neere cause, or the occasion was, a Garter of his owne Queene (or as * some say) of the Lady Ioan, Countesse of Salisburie (wonder of that age for shape and beautie) which slipping off in a dance, King Edward stooped, and tooke vp. Such of the Nobles as were present, smiling, and * playing in sport with that action of the Kings, as amorous, hee seriously said, it should not be long before there should Soueraigne honour be done to that silken tie. Whereupon he afterward added the French Motte, or Symbolicall word,

HONI SOIT QVI MAL Y PENSE,

as well in complement of the whole inuention, as in retort or checke of his Courtiers sinister suspition. Polydor Virgil troubleth himselfe to make an Apologie for the coursenesse of this Originall, if (without injurie) an office of honourable loue in so renowned a Monarch, may vndergoe the note of coursenesse; but the same Polydor among his other defences therof truely saith;

Nobilitas sub amore iacet.

There want not some who conjecture, that hee entituled it the Order of the Garter, for that in a battle wherein he was victorious, he had giuen the word Garter, for the word or signe. But if credite may be attributed to the originall * Booke of the Institution, the inuention is deduced from times more ancient, "and that when Richard the first King of England, set "forward against the Turkes and Sarazens to Cyprus "and Acon, and waxed weary of longer delay, while "the siege of Acon was with wonderfull care protra- "cted, courage at the length (by the comming of St. "George among them as it was thought) quickning "in him, it came into his minde to tie about the legs "of certaine his choyse Knights, a Garter or small "thong of Leather, the onely stuffe fit for such a "purpose, which he had then at hand, to the in- "tent that they (as it were by joynt consent) being "mindfull of future glory, if they were victorious, "might be stirred vp, to demeane themselues nobly, "after the example of the Romans, with whom "that varietie of Crownes or Garlands giuen for "sundry causes as honourable Ensignes to the Soul- "dier was in vse; to the intent, that by such incite- "ments, they might shake off sloath, and the spirit "of courage might rise, and breake forth the more "feruently.

* Vt militarem virtutem honoribus, præmijs, atque splendore decoraret.

(81) There was in the Castle of Windsor (the ordayned seat of the Order now first to be consummated) before King Edward did accomplish his intention, in honour of God, * our Lady, and S. George, a * Chappell erected by King Henry the first, and other Progenitors of Edward, with an allowance for eight Canons, to whose Colledge this Prince added a Deane, fifteene Canons more, and twenty and foure poore impotent Knights, with other officers and seruants, as appeareth by his Charter. These were to pray for the good estate of the Soueraigne and Brethren of the most noble Order. The Soueraigne and Knights themselues had their particular lawes and constitutions, which they were by solemne oath bound to obserue, of which one * was, That they should defend and assist one the other: which afterward made Alphonse Duke of Calabria receiue the habite of that Order with so exceeding reuerence at Naples, as erroniously thinking himselfe secured therby from the French, who claimed that kingdome. But that custome of mutuall assistance (saith * Polydor) was then worne out of vse, and discontinued euery-where; for those Italian Potentates who (within the memory of Polydor) being driuen forth of their Country, and imploring aide of those orders, whereof themselues were companions, found no supporture, either from the French or Burgundians, who had formerly elected them. Besides Lawes and Officers, King Edward also deuised particular Ceremonies and distinctiue habites and ensignements, whereof the principall was the azure Garter, wherein the French Motte of the Order was wrought in letters of Gold, and the Garter it selfe fastned a little vnder the left knee with a buckle of Gold, in * token of Concord. There are speciall Manuscript-Bookes of the Constitutions, and other things peculiar to this Order, to which (this place being not aptly capable of their re-capitulation) we must referre the curious. Saint George the * esteemed patterne of Christian fortitude, is intituled to the Patronage of this Order, and the beauteous Chappel in Windsor-Castle (where his * day is yeerely celebrated) consecrated by King Edward to his memory. The fortune of this inuention hath beene such, that the most mighty Princes of the Christian World haue thought themselues most highly honoured, in being chosen thereunto, so that there haue beene about two and twentie forraine Emperours and Kings (besides many others of most noble quality) since the first institution thereof, elected and admitted Companions of the Garter. The Kings of England are in their seueral times Soueraignes of the Order, and the whole number of Knights is circumscribed in twenty and six, whereof the Soueraigne is one. The names of the first twenty and sixe (who are also styled Founders of the Order) you shall finde intabled in our Map of Barkeshire.

(82) Our Edward * hauing thus honoured S. Georges memory, assigned to his Image, mounted in Armour vpon horse-backe, a siluer Shield with a crosse Gules (* the deare remembrance of his dying Lord) and * appoynted his Souldiers to weare white Coats or Iackets, with a red Crosse before and behinde ouer their Armor that it was not onely a comely, but a stately sight to behold the English Battles, like the rising Sunne to glitter farre off in that pure hew; when the Souldiers of other Nations in their baser weedes could not be discerned. The glory therefore of this Order seemed such to one, no * vnlearned Poet, that in an Apostrophe to Windsor, speaking of the Garter, he breakes forth into these scarse Hyberbolicall Verses.

(83) Let vs not dwell too-long in the lesser things: It was the moneth of July, and King Edward was now vpon the Sea with about a thousand Saile,

* Saile. No man is ſaid to know whether he bent his courſe, ſo well he could truſt himſelfe, and ſo wiſely free his Councels from the poſſibilitie of diſcouery. He went not to warre by rote, but by book; wiſdome was Herbenger and marſhall of his valour; who ſhall ſay hee knew not how to conquer? It was not long but hee came to anchor in the Hauen of Hogy Saint Vaſt, in Conſtantine, a great cape of Land or penile in Normandy. His * land-forces did muſter twenty and fiue hundred horſe, and thirty thouſand foote, moſt of which were Archers. The lights, and glories of his Armie, were the Prince of Wales (then about ſixteene yeeres old, who was then by his father knighted) many braue Earles, Lords, Knights, and expert Chiefs, the Engliſh going cheerefully, as hauing gotten ſuch a King as anſwered their warlike diſpoſitions. The Earle of Huntington had charge of his Nauy: himſelfe takes ſeuere reuenge for the bloud of his friends vpon the Norman Townes and people, proteſting he ſacrificed them * to Cliſſon, Baro, Percy, and the reſt. Their heads were ſet vpon the chiefe Gate of Carentine, for which cauſe hee ſlew all that could be found therein, and turning the whole towne into Cinders, gaue it to their funerall. He tooke the populous and rich City of Caen, & with his dreadfull Hoſte burning and ſpoiling round about, marched vp almoſt as farre as the very Walls of Paris, brauing King Philip ſo neere.

(74) Who had not ſlept all this while, but was * purueyed of one of the fulleſt Armies which euer were ſeene in France. King Edwards people rich with ſpoile ſeemed not vnwilling to return. They were now in the enemies Country between the two good riuers of Sein & Some, for they had paſſed the Sein at Poiſſie, whoſe Bridge (as all other betweene Roan and Paris) had beene broken downe by the French, and now (notwithſtanding any oppoſition) in a ſhort ſpace repayred. It was thought fit to ſeeke paſſage out of theſe ſtraights, which could not be by Bridges, for they were broken by the French. This ſearch for paſſage, was by the enemy interpreted a kinde of flight, and Edward could not but be willing to nouriſh their temeritie, to draw them on ſecurely to deſtruction by ſuch a ſeeming feare.

(85) The riuer of Some, betweene Albeuille and the Sea, at a low water hath a paſſable and grauelly foord, knowne by the name of Blanch Taque; this was diſcouered to him by one Gobin a priſoner. But the French King (beſt acquainted in his owne Countrey) to empeach this paſſage, had before ſent thether a Norman Baron of ſpeciall note, one Godmar du Foy, and a thouſand horſe, with at leaſt 6000. foote; but Edward (whom as obſtacles made impetuous, ſo nothing could diſmay,) enters himſelfe into the Foord, * crying, He that loues me, let him follow mee, as one that reſolued either to paſſe, or die. Who can tell the efficacy of ſuch a Generals ſpirit, but they, who haue had the happineſſe to follow vnder the conduct? This paſſage wanne, and Du Foy defeated in a manner, before he was almoſt fought with, (the incomparable courage of his enemies appalling him,) hee brought to king Philip fewer by a paire of thouſands, then he carried forth, beſides terrour, and an euill ſigne of that which followed. The Engliſh, who knew not what it meant to runne away, but were before reſolued to liue and dye with ſuch a Soueraigne, had reaſon now much more to reſolue the ſame.

(86) King Edward was neere to Creſcie in the County Ponthieu, lying betweene the riuers of Some and Anthy (which vnqueſtionably belonged vnto him in right of his Mother,) there moſt vigilantly prouides hee for his defence. King Philip, ſet on fire with this diſaſter, precipitates to battell for accompliſhment of Gods anger againſt France; being the rather drawne, by the vnruly vanitie of his huge multitudes, (for by what other words doe * an hundred or ſix-ſcore thouſand men deſerue to be called?) who neuer left ouer-taking one the other, till the view of the Engliſh banners and battles put them to ſtand. We profeſſe that the nature of our vndertakings will not brooke deſcriptions at large; you ſhall haue it as we may, that is, as remembring, that innumerable great atchieuements reſt behinde, ſomewhat impatiently attending their relation.

(87) Therefore, the holy name of God firſt ritely inuocated, King Edward, without ſhewing the leaſt ſigne of perturbation, but full of an Heroicke aſſuredneſſe, had ordered his people in three battles, with their wings and ſuccours. The Vaward diſpoſed into the forme of an Hearſe, where the Archers ſtood in Front, and the men of Armes in the bottome was vnder the young Lyon of Wales, Prince Edward, and with him many of the prime and ſageſt Captaines: Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, Godfrey of Harecourt, The Lords, Stafford, Laware, Bourchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, &c. In the ſecond Battle were, the Earles of Northampton, and Arundell; the Lords, Roſſe, Willoughby, Baſſet, Saint Albine, Multon, &c. The third and laſt battle was commanded in chiefe by King Edward himſelfe, with the reſidue of his Nobles and people. In euery one of theſe battels, beſide the wings, were a juſt proportion of men at Armes and Archers, but nothing ſo thin and few as ſome of our * Writers alledge, who mention not aboue 9000. all together, who were at leaſt thrice as many in their whole numbers, and not without neede.

(88) King Edward cloſed his battles at their back, (as if hee meant to barricado them from flying,) by felling and plaſhing of Trees, placing his carriages there, and other impediments whatſoeuer, hauing commaunded * all men to put from them their Horſes, which were left among the carriages. Thus all waies of ſafetie by flight being preuented, the neceſſitie did vndoubtedly double their courages. Thus placed to the beſt aduantage, King Edward viſiteth the rankes in perſon, riding vpon a pleaſant * Hobby, (hauing onely a white rod in his hand, as if hee would chaſtiſe fortune,) betweene the two Marſhals of his Field; whoſe very preſence, with a few ſeaſonable and vn-enforced words on behalfe of God and his right, in ſteed of long Orations, did inſpire the fainteſt hearts among them with freſheſt vigour and alacritie.

(89) Our writers deſcribe not vnto vs the quality or face of the ground of Creſcy where this battle was determined (though very much doth depend vpon choyſe of place,) neyther the exact figures, or ſeuerall numbers of euery ſeuerall battle, their diſtances, wings, or other warlike formes, nor finally what Palliſado, Trench, or other deuiſe was in this or that quarter vſed, to keepe off and breake the furious charge of Men of Armes, before they came at the Archers, principall worke-men at this bloudy journey. But thus lamely are things commended to Poſterity, where the Actors themſelues take no care to ſee the particulars orderly and according to the truth delineated; but eyther are vnlearned, or giue themſelues to the bodily fruition of their paſſed trauels', rather then to exerciſe their mindes in profiting themſelues and others by ſuch relations as are made with life and art. This wee finde, that the place of the Engliſhmens battles was the Towne of Creſcie, and Foreſt, and therefore apt with ſmall labour to be made in-acceſſible, or at leaſtwiſe difficult for horſe to enter vpon; that alſo the Engliſh Battles were marſhalled to the moſt aduantage for giuing ſuccour one vnto the other; and that there were * Shields, or Pauiſes, to ſhelter our Archers from the Genowaies ſhot.

(90) By this time King Philip (whoſe countenance is * ſaid to haue changed thereat,) was in ſight of the Engliſh. He had with him the two Kings of Boheme and Maiorca, and almoſt innumerable other great Princes, Dukes, Earles, Barons, and Gentlemen of inferiour marke bearing Armes; nor thoſe only French, but very many of them Almains and Dutch, leſt you ſhould ſuppoſe, he had drawne away Lewis

(92) That is almoſt ridiculous, which *one writes of the etymologie of the Oiliflame (as he cals it) aduaunced at this battle, as a ſigne of taking none to mercy, no more (as he ſaith) then Oile doth vſe to extinguiſh fire; when indeed it was an hallowed * Banner of red-ſilke, whereof the French had a wonderfull high conceit, as of that which was ſent from heauen, and called Oreflame or Auriflames. King Edward on the contrary ſide, is reported for ſigne of like rigour, to haue erected there his vnconquered Standard of the Dragon-Gules. Lewis of Luxemburg, the moſt valiant old King of Bohemia, being either blind or very badly ſighted, hearing in what goodly order the Engliſh (like ſober Spartan Souldiers) attended the charge, ſaid plainly (contrary to their ouer-weening iudgements who had giuen out of their flight,) Here will the Engliſh end their daies, or conquer. And euen as the firſt wounds were ready in a manner to be giuen and taken, behold, God, to let them know he was awake, and that there was one aboue to whom ſo many thouſands ſhould within a few minutes appeare, to giue an account of their whole liues till that preſent; he cauſed the blacke cloudes to poure downe vpon them ſtore of funerall teares, enarching the ayre with a ſpatious * Raine-bow, and diſcharging ſundry tire and peales of Thunder: the Sunne alſo, at the ſame time drawing neere to ſet, would gladly haue hid his face, by thruſting it vnder a partill * Eclypſe; but God (who meant good to the Engliſh) would not ſuffer him to withdraw his more neceſſary office, ſo that freed from that temporary ſhadow, he ſhone directly into the Frenchmens eyes. At the ſame time alſo * ſholes and cloudes of balefull Rauens, and other birdes of prey and rauin, as foreſhewing the harueſt of carkaſes at hand, came flying ouer the French hoaſt.

(93) The ſigne of battle being giuen by King Philip, and entertained with ſhoutes and clamors, all things ſhewing the horror of war, Drums and Trumpets ſounding to a charge, Banners flying in the winde, and euery-where ſhining weapons, menacing braue extremitie, reaſon her-ſelfe acknowledged it onely ſafe to leaue them to their brute faculties, paſſion, and furie, and the euent it ſelfe to God. The French calamities began at their Genowayes, who vnder Carolo Grimaldi, and Antonio Dorta their Coronels, being all of them Croſſe-bowmen, were to open a way for the French horſe with their ſhot. This was the ſucceſſe of their ſeruice: Their Croſſe-bow ſtrings wet with the late raine, their bodies weary with a long march, their rankes (after the Engliſh had intercepted vpon * Targets their firſt volue,) filled with innumerable gaps, occaſioned by the fall of their fellowes ſlaine, or ouerthrowne with home-drawne Arrowes, were laſtly moſt outragiouſly ſcattered by Charles Earle of Alanſon, at whoſe commandement (deriued from King * Philip himſelfe) his Horſe gaue in among them, to driue them by plaine murther from the honour of hauing the point, vpon onely pretence that they hindered their race. This hot young Count (contrary to good diſcipline,) had alſo otherwiſe vniuſtly diſcontented and diſgraced them, euen when they were ready to ioyne in battle, whoſe bodies (being as moſt write about twelue thouſand) by bearing the firſt brunt might haue beene of great vſe, if in nothing elſe, but in ſeruing as Buts and Quiuers, to take into them the chiefe firſt ſtormes of the Engliſh Arrowes. Whereas now they themſelues were not onely thus moſt miſerably troden vnder foot, and put to the ſword, but many of the French Gallants by that occaſion mingled among them, were ouerthrowne by the Engliſh Arrowes, who equally purſued the deſtruction both of French and Genowayes, ſhooting thickeſt where the tumult and confuſion were greateſt. Some * raſcals alſo following the Engliſh Armie, as they ſaw opportunity, ſtept in among them, and holpe to cut throates, ſparing neither Lord nor lozell.

(94) The French men of Armes halfe out of breath with head-long haſte, and terribly diſordered with the perpetuall ſtormes of ſinging arrowes, were now at hand-ſtrokes with the Princes battle; neither was it long, but that the ſhining Battle-axes, ſwords, lances, and other weapons of our Nation had loſt their ſplendor, being couered with humane gore, which hauing thirſtily drunke out of enemies wounds, they let fall in bloudy teares. The fight was ſharpe and fierce: but to what purpoſe ſerues writing, if the high reſolution of the King of Bohemia ſhould be vnremembred? hee (as onely ſeeking an honourable graue for his old age) put himſelfe into the firſt ranke of his owne horſemen, and with full randome charging the Engliſh, was ſlaine with Sword in hand, the troupe of his faithfull followers with their ſlaughtered bodies couering him euen in death. There lay this Trophea of the Engliſh Cheualrie, by whoſe fall (euidently ſeene in the ruine of the Bohemian Standard,) his noble ſonne, the Lord Charles of Boheme (lately elected Emperour, whilſt King Lewis was as * yet aliue) was wiſely warned to prouide for himſelfe, the matter appearing deſperate. For now was Philip himſelfe in perſon, with the full power of his Armie, come to the reſcues of his brother and friends, who were hard at worke (while they had breath) about their dreamed victory, but finding the mettall infinitely more tough which they had to deale vpon, then they could poſſibly haue ſuppoſed, were beaten to the earth in great numbers. The young Prince neuertheleſſe was not without danger, though now the ſecond battell of the Engliſh, for preſeruation of their Prince, daſhing in among the enemies, fought moſt couragiouſly.

(95) Therefore King Edward himſelfe was ſent vnto, whoſe battle houered like a tempeſt in a cloud, ouer which, vpon the hillocke of a Wind-mill, with his Helmet on, (which neuer came off till all was done) he iudiciouſly watcht, beholding the whole field, and ready to enter into the conflict when juſt neceſſitie ſhould inuite. You ſhall heare a moſt noble anſwere: The meſſenger diſpatched from the Earle of Northampton and others *vpon a tender reſpect to their young Princes ſafety, hauing declared to the King, that the Lords required his preſence, for that his ſonne was in danger, *he bad him returne and ſay; Let them ſend no more to me for any aduenture that may befall, while my ſonne is aliue; but let him either vanquiſh or die, becauſe the honour of this braue day ſhall be his, if GOD ſuffer him to ſuruiue.

(96) The Meſſenger returned, and though hee brought not Men to their ſuccours, hee brought ſuch acceſſion of courage and ſpirite, as hee that ſhould ſay that King Edward fayled them at their neede, ſhould neyther vnderſtand what belongs to magnanimitie, nor the effect of ſuch a checke from ſo excellent a Generall: who neuertheleſſe, was maturely watchfull ouer the good of his Childe and people: On the other ſide King Philip (whoſe quarrell it was) did not forſake the duetie of a noble Chiefe: but ſo long contended in his owne perſon, till his horſe was * ſlaine vnder him with arrowes, himſelfe * twice diſmounted, and wounded both in the necke and thigh: but then the Lord Iohn of Henault, Earle of

*King Philips perſon farre engaged, eſcapes by flight.

* Serres. Ypodig. Neuſtr. Adam Merim.

Serres saith, that King Edward came at last to the battell, and with his comming made an end thereof. The former words sent to his sonne (which are also in Serres) insinuate nothing lesse.

of Beaumont, (who had long since quit King Edwards seruice) sets him againe on horsebacke, and the French (out of a loyall desire to his preseruation) cried to retire him out of the fight, who rather seemed willing to end his dayes in so noble companie: which voyce was as it were the vp-shot and last Gaspe of that most cruell conflict, where none as yet were taken to mercy vpon any termes.

After their King had preserued himselfe, the whole power of the French gaue away, and sought to saue it selfe by flight, whom the English, warely fighting vpon the defensiue, and loath to hazard such a victory, by breaking their rancks to pursue the enemie too farre in the night time, (which now was come vpon them,) suffered them to be holden in chase by their owne iust feare, contented to make good their ground, by standing still vpon their guard according to true discipline. For they saw not as yet the bottome of their danger, and knew that there were so many escaped, as might well serue to ouerwhelme their Army with their multitudes.

King Edward and the Prince meet.

(97) King Edward seeing the coast for the present cleare of all his enemies, aduanceth with his vntoucht battell towards his victorious sonne, & most affectionately embracing and kissing him, said; Faire Sonne, God send you good perseuerance to so prosperous beginnings; you haue nobly acquit your selfe, and are well worthy to haue the Gouernance of a Kingdome entrusted vnto you for your valour. To which the most cheualrous of young Princes replyed in silence, most humbly falling on his knees, before his triumphant father.

The modest and wise behauiour of the English.

(98) Here there may be some controuersie, whether the exemplary manhood of the English, or their singular piety, were more to be commended: but who will not infinitely preferre the latter, chiefly in Souldiers, among whom it is vsually most wanting? Great was the victorie, great was their prowesse, and great the glory; but they like true Christian knights and Souldiers, forbare all boast, referring the whole thankes and honour of their preseruation to God the true Author thereof. The night was so very darke, as if it had mourned for the day-times bloudshed, therefore they made * store of fires, lighted torches, and candles, carefully tending their wounded companions, and modestly reioycing in their owne faire aduenture.

* Grafton.

(99) But the next morning presented new worke; for such a mist hauing ouer-spread the earth, that they could scarse see hard at hand, yet were * new swarmes of French abroad, who came from sundry Cities and good townes, as Roan, Beauois, &c. to haue ioyned with King Philip in the designed spoile of the English; these being mette-with by King Edwards people, were in sundry places ouerthrowne and slaine, and multitudes of such as had lost their way in the last flight, were seuerely put to the sword, as the English chanced vpon them, * where they lay lurking in hedges, bushes, and by-wayes: The Earles of Northampton, * Suffolke, and Norfolke, * had the execution of the French which fled from this last ouerthrow, for the space of about nine miles English from the ground where they encountred.

The field viewed by Heralds.

(100) There was leasure now to take an account of the slaine; which vpon the enemies side amounted, not onely in the number to very many, but in their qualitie to very great. For search hereof King Edward caused certaine principall commanders, and three Heralds, (who by the Coat-Armours might iudge of the persons, it being then a thing perpetuall and solemne not to fight without those signes of Noblesse,) to take an exact view of the field, who about supper-time returning, made report to the King, that they found the dead bodies of * eleauen great Princes, and of Barons, Knights, and men of Armes, aboue * one thousand, and fiue hundreth. Among the owners of such bodies as were beaten to the Earth vpon the first day, these are worthily reckoned chiefe: The * King of Bohemia, the King of * Maiorca, * Charles Earle of Alanson, brother-German to King Philip, the Duke of Lorain, * the Duke of Burbon, the * Earle of Flanders, the * Earle of Sauoy (both great Princes,) * the Dolphin of Viennois, son to Himbert, the Earle of Sancerre, and Harecourt, (whose brother Godfrey in pittie of his house, his two Nephewes being slaine with their father, forsooke the King of England after this battell, and returned into Grace with the French,) the * Earles of Aumarl, Neuers, &c. sixe Earles of Almaine; beside others of great account of all sorts. Vpon the second day, the Grand Prior of France, who with his Archbishop of Roan, had on the behalfe of their Prince and Countrey put on Armes. Of the Commons, in * both of these blacke dayes, there fell about thirty thousand, and some say, foure times more in this last, then in the other.

(101) We finde not one man of honour, or note slaine vpon the English side, so that this victorie may safely bee accounted among the wonderfull. The * spoiles of the Enemies bodies and carriages, King Edward gaue wholy to his well-deseruing souldiers. The rule of their safety (they being in a most opulous enemy Countrie) would not permit them to vse much curtesie to others, as that which might haue proued cruelty to themselues, but vpon the second day they tooke many * prisoners, though none of great name, for they were spent in the day before. It pleased the conquerour to proclaime a truce now for three dayes in the Countrey about, that the people might come in to burie their dead; but the bodies of the most Noble, hee himselfe caused to be conueyed to Monstreal, and there (in his March towards Calis) enterred.

* Will. Northb.

(102) Thus by Gods fauour, and the vnresistable force of the English Archers, (who in a manner did * onely fight) was King Edward put into a full and peaceable possession of a perfect victory; which after hee had one night onely enioyed in the Forrest of Crescie, hee dislodged with his conquering hoast, & marched straight toward Calis, which hee * presently inuested, hauing decreed neuer to rise with his Armie from before it, till without assault hee had carried the same. For which cause he entrenched and fortified his Campe on all sides, built vp * Sheds couered with Reed and Broome, and other places and offices as to dwell in, and stopping all reliefe by Sea, (whereof he was Master) with his Nauie. There commanded in Calis for the French, Sir Iohn de Vienne, * Marshall of France, and the Lord Dandreghan, with a very strong Garrison, who concluded, like good men of war, to trie all extremities, rather then to surrender the Piece, which was so strong, that to assault the same, otherwise then with famine, had beene friuolous. These great Captaines seeing King Edwards resolution, thrust forth of the Towne (for sparing of food) their poorer people, aboue fifteene hundreth; whom hee, like a true Christian Prince, turned not backe vpon the Towne, but releeued for Gods cause with fresh victuals, and two pence sterling each; permitting them freely and securely to passe through his Campe, to his great glory, and (vndoubtedly) profit also, hauing their hearty prayers for his happy successe, and God for pay-master, and rewarder of such his Beneficence.

Both in their seuerall times, were put into execution: That of the Scottish inuasion was first, but with such successe, as well declared it was Gods will (all people hauing their encreasings, zeniths, and declinations) that the English name should now be brought to the verticall poynt thereof without any thing being able to resist it.

The Scots inuade England, and are vanquished in battell.

gratifie his most deare friends the French, comming with a very great armie of threescore and two thousand into England, as far as Durham, supposing none but Priests and Shepheards were left at home, (considering what great numbers were abroad vpon seruice in Picardie, Britaine, and Gascoigne,) was (vpon * Saint Lukes Eue) vndertaken and fought withall, his whole armie by faire force vanquished, and himselfe taken prisoner at a place by Durham called Neuiles Crosse. Cheiefes among the English at this triumphant iourney were, * the Archbishop of Yorke, Gilbert Vmfreuile Earle of Angos, William Lord la Zouch, with eight other Lords, Percy, Mowbray, Neuile, Deincourt, Mauley, Leyburne, Scroop, & Musgraue. Sir Robert de Bertram Sheriffe of Northumberland, and other noble Banerets. In this battell also were many * Priests and Clergy-men of England, to whom necessity for defence of their Countrey, made the bloudy vse of Iron and Steele warrantable: nor could the Scots be accused to haue lost any thing for want of manhood, specially the King himselfe, who had two speares hanging in his body, his leg almost incurably wounded with an arrow, his sword and weapons beaten out of his hand; who disdeining captiuitie, inuited the English by opprobrious words to kill him, and when Iohn Copland (an Esquire of the North-country, * Captaine of the Castle of Roxborough in Scotland,) aduised him to yeeld, he stroke him on the face with his Gantlet so fiercely, as that two of his great teeth were smitten out therewith: but seeing he could not force a death but must be Prisoner, Iohn Copland conueied him away with eight of his owne seruants out of this field. There lay dead vpon the ground the * Earles of Murray and Stratherne, the Constable, Marshall, Chamberlaine, and Chancellour of Scotland, with many other Nobles. There were taken Prisoners (beside the King) the Earles of Dowglasse, Fife, Southerland, Wigion, and Menteith. Thus the fortune of King Edward, by the vertue of his valiant subiects, preuailed in euery place.

(105) It could not be excused, if we forgat the Offices of Queene Philip in her Husbands absence; who * being then in England, and great with-Childe of a Daughter (afterward called * Margaret) rode in Person about the battels of the English, encouraging them with so wise, princely and gracious words, as did not a little sharpen and assure their otherwise feruent courages: which done, shee retired her selfe to Newcastle vpon Tine, there to attend the successe which God would send. After the battell, vnderstanding that King Dauid was taken, shee by letters willed the Esquier to render vp his royall Prisoner; which he refusing, she (impatient) sends ouer a complaint to King Edward: At * whose commandement, repairing to the Campe before Calis, he so discreetly answered, that he was sent back into England with the reward of * 500. pounds land by the yeare, (to lie * where Copland himselfe should chuse, neere to his owne dwelling,) and warrant to deliuer vp his Prisoner to the Queene, which he accordingly did at the City of Yorke, with so sober and honest an Apology, as both she, & the Lords of the Councell were satisfied. This Copland (who had lands of King Edwards gift at * Vlnerston in Lancashire) was also aduanced, for this most valiant atchieuement, to the dignity of a Knight Baneret, which writers corruptly call a Baronet, Honour hauing at that time no such kinde of creature. (106) Wonder it is to consider, with what golden linckes one good hap was annexed to another, in this full moone as it were of King Edwards raigne. For within a small compasse of time, all these great atchieuements fell. Sir Thomas Dagworth like another * Machabee (saith an Author) with 8. hundreth men of Armes, and one hundred Archers, in Britain ouerthrew the Lord Charles of Bloys, who hauing twice in one day with incredible ods in the numbers, (as of aboue thirty for one,) assailed that braue knight, was beaten out of the field with maruellous losse of Nobles, and others slaine or taken. Not long after that, the same Sir Thomas also hauing onely three hundred men of Armes, and foure hundred Archers in his company, assailed the same Lord Charles, lying at siege of Roch-Darien, with twelue hundred Knights and Esquiers, sixe hundred other armed men, two thousand Steel-bow-men, & of other Infantery great store; and tooke Prisoner the said Lord Charles of Bloys (who as you haue heard claimed the Dutchie of Britaine against Montford) driuing his whole forces with admirable manhood and great destruction out of the field. (107) In Gascoigne the magnificent and noble Henry Earle of Derby, and now (by his Fathers late death) Earle of Lancaster also, pursuing his faire fortunes in Aquitain, Xanctoing, &c. draue Iohn Duke of Normandy, eldest sonne of King Philip, vnfought with, from the siege of Aquillon; though it is said, he left it, as * commanded to repaire to his father for the reliefe of Calis; hee also tooke sundry places of speciall importance, some by render, some by assault, many profitable prisoners, and rich spoiles, and with triumph returned safe to Burdeaux. Not long before this, at the taking of the good Towne of Brigerac by assault, he had permitted euery souldier to seise any house, and conuert all therein to his proper benefit. Hereupon it hapned, that a certaine * knight or souldier called * Reth, had broken into a Tenement, where the moniers had for safety stowed the money of that Countrey in great long sackes, who (thinking it was not the Generals intention that such a treasure should come to a priuate share) acquainted the Lord Henrie therewith: what was his answere? he with a kingly magnificence told him; "That the House, and "all therein were his, according as he had at first pro- "claimed, let them be worth (saith hee) what they "would. The party returnes, and while he is busie in counting his new riches, behold, he finds so much more pure siluer in Coine, that hee could not but once againe acquaint his Generall therewith. (108) Iohn Duke of Normandy, comming into Picardy, had two repulses and foiles, being driuen from the Towne of * Cassels, and Lile, so that King Edwards fortune was auailable, aswell to his Confederates as to his owne People: and now, to consummate his glory, the whole power of France, led forth by King Philip to preserue that eye of his Empire, Calis, returned without doing any thing. For when mediators could effect nothing, and Philip would not set vp his trust vpon battell, least while hee sought to saue a Towne, he should leese a Kingdome, hee mournefully retired himselfe with losse-full hast into the bosome of France, leauing his desperate Captaines and people in Calis to the Conquerours mercie. So Edward had the Towne deliuered vnto him, when he had almost abidden in leaguer before it one whole yeare. The piety of Queene * Philip toward the prisoners selected to die, and the worthy deuouement of some Calisian Townesmen, to that certaine perill, for satisfaction of King Edwards incensed minde, declaring themselues thereby to bee good, true and loyall French-men, are by all Authors celebrated, finding both pitty then, and honour for euer. King Edward hauing as wisely taken order for safe-keeping of this pretious piece, as he had constantly endured to carry it, drawing ouer a substantiall Colony of English-men into it, set saile at last for England, whether with much trouble at Sea (tempests sodenly rising) he at last arriued safe: It is * obserued, that hee had alwaies faire weather at his passage into France,

An.D.1348. (109) Neuer was the Engliſh Name ſo great, and glorious as at this time, nor did England her ſelfe in any fore-going age enioy a King more renowned for wiſedome, chiualry, and felicity in actions; the iuſt brightneſſe of his irradiant vertues, not onely adorning her with Garlands, conquered Spoyles, and Trophees, but ſeeming alſo (ſuch was the abundance of all things) to infuſe fertility into the earth it ſelfe, like ſome * new-ſhining Sunne. Meane-while faire France (whoſe wofull turne it was) ſate mournefully weeping, and with great anxietie of mind prouided the beſt ſhee could againſt ſuch a deluge of calamities. Neither yet was King Edwards glory at the higheſt, for God was inclined to make him yet more bounden and beholden. Howbeit as it is a mighty worke to aſcend to ſuch an eminencie of renowne, yet when the moſt of man is knowne and done, let none therefore loue themſelues, or admire others, for neither hath this world any thing permanent to truſt vpon, and to God alone belongs the honour. This was found and felt when the celeſtiall Maieſtie ſaw the abuſe of his good gifts. It rained from Midſommer till Chriſtmas, and ſo terrible a plague ranne through the world, that the earth was filled with graues, and the aire with cries: which was ſeconded with murren of Cattle, and dearth of all things. The plague began among the Turkes, and pierced by degrees into France, where it mowed downe many thouſands. In London it had ſo quicke and ſharpe an edge, that in one yeares ſpace, there were buried in * one Church-yard (commonly called the Ciſtertian, or Charter-houſe) aboue fifty thouſand. The French notwithſtanding practiſe to recouer Calais by bribery, but treaſon being not true to it ſelfe, King Edward came ſodainely in perſon, and preſerued the ineſtimable Iewell by policie, and princely manhoode, killing many of them who came vpon that blinde aduenture.

In England alſo ſwarmed another ſort, no leſſe burthenous to the Common-wealth and Church, which were the foure orders of Franciſcan Friers, whom the * Engliſh Clergie found to be ſo pernicious to the regiment of the Church, that they ſelected that renowned Clerk, Richard Fitz-Ralph (who was Chancelour of the Vniuerſity of Oxford, Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland) to appeare in perſon before the Pope, and there alleage the * intollerable harmes by them accrewing to the Laity, the Clergy, and the Vniuerſities, together with their diſobedience to Gods word, their auarice, and pride. All which that noble Prelate learnedly performed, as appeareth by the handling of his 9. propoſitions againſt them, which are extant. In his ſecond propoſition, he ſheweth, how ordinary a matter it was with them, to allure youth, without conſent of their parents, to enter their Orders; which made men withdraw their ſons from the Vniuerſities, leſt the Fryars ſhould ſo ſteale them away; wherby (ſaith he) it came to paſſe, that * whereas in his owne time there were thirty thouſand Students in Oxford, ſoone after there were left but ſixe thouſand. But how infinitely theſe Friarly ſwarmes encreaſed in all lands, may appeare by that * ſtrange offer made by the Generall of this one Order, to Pope Pius, who promiſed to bring him (being then about a Turkiſh Expedition) thirty thouſand cunning warriors, out of the number of Saint Francis Fryars, & yet enough ſhould remaine at home to performe the deuotions. But the Pope had ſuch vſe of thoſe Fryars, that Armachanus preuailed not in the matter, * though he proued the cauſe ſtoutly and manifeſtly againſt them, becauſe (ah for pitie, ſaith our Authour) the Clergy ſtucke not cloſe as they promiſed, and the Fryars had great ſtore of money to procure fauour in the Court of Rome. But here in the Engliſh Court, two Cardinals, (one of them, he of Pierregoſt, who had ſo diligently trauelled for a concluſion at the battell of Poictiers) could not with two yeares labour, draw any thing to ſuch an head, as the French would, for their Kings deliuerance, performe; which put King Edward into a new reſolution againſt France.

(121) King Edward (holding himſelfe deluded by the French) with a fleete of eleauen hundred Saile paſſeth ouer from Sandwich to a new inuaſion. Hee arriued at Callis, from whence he ſet forward in three great battels, whereof the firſt, being leaſt, was vnder Henry Duke of Lancaſter, the ſecond being greater, vnder the braue Prince of Wales, and the laſt which was greateſt, was led by King Edward himſelfe. They marched through * Artois to the Citie of Rheims in Champain, where the kings of France vſe to be crowned and annoynted. The City of * Sens (an Archbiſhops See) and Neuers doe yeeld without reſiſtance. The * Duke of Burgundy, for two * hundreth thouſand florens of gold, obtained that all Burgundy was ſpared from ſackage or ſpoile. It was told the King, that the Normans had landed at Winchelſea in the time of diuine ſeruice, and among other their moſt impious outrages, a like execrable villanie, as that which the Gibeonites, (ſons of Beliall) are recorded to haue committed vpon the * Leuites wife, was more wickedly perpetrated by them in the Church it ſelfe, where the woman, being of ſingular beauty, was by their inſatiable violations murthered; and they got backe to their Ships before the Countrey could riſe vpon them to take due vengeance. Hereupon * King Edward preſently raiſed his Standard, and ſet forth out of Champain, (where not farre from the City of Rheims he had * kept his Chriſtmas) toward Paris.

(122) Hee came before it with his armie diuide into * nine Battalions, where hee honoured foure hundred Eſquiers and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dolphin, Regent of France, was within Paris with a great force, but could not by any meanes bee drawne to hazard battell. There were ample conditions in humble manner tendred to Edward, but hee was yet inflexible and deafe againſt any other, then ſuch as himſelfe (like a Conquerour) propounded. Paris (vp to whoſe * very wals King Edward ranne) not being feſible, he * retires into Britaine to refreſh his Army, but vpon his returne finding it ſtronger then before, hee turnes his wrath into the very bowels of France, exerciſing hoſtile Actions vp as farre as * Charters, and Orleans, and as yet continued inexorable. God was diſpleaſed thereat, and to let Edward know ſo much, he cauſed the Miniſter of his wrath, a terrible tempeſt, to aſſaile his Hoaſt, and * to kill therein many both men and horſes. King Edward is * ſaid, vpon this occaſion, to be ſo wounded with remorſe, that repairing to our Lady-Church of Charters, hee proſtrated himſelf to God, and ſorrowing for the bloud-ſhed and waſt-full burning which hee had made, vowed to giue quiet to the Chriſtian world vpon equall conditions. This, and the Duke of Lancaſters perſwaſions, ſofined him ſo, that finally (by mediation of the Popes * Legat, one Simon de Langres) a peace was concluded at Bretagnie neere to Charters vpon the * eight of May; and in Nouember following K. Iohn himſelfe was tranſported to Callis, and there by King Edward (according to the Capitulations of the Treatie) ſet at liberty, after hee had beene a priſoner aboue foure yeares.

(123) Articles of this accord, ſo neceſſary for the diſtreſſed Eſtate of France were theſe. 1. *That (to the intent theſe conditions which the French condeſcended vnto, ſhould be more forceable, & not ſeeme to be extorted by aduantage, ods, or iniquitie of the times) the two Edwards, Father and Sonne, ſhould for euer releaſe to King Iohn, and to his heires, all the right and claime which they had to the * Crowne of France, * to the Dutchy and Eſtates of Normandy, Aniou, Turain, & Main, as alſo to the homages of Britain, Armorick, and the Earledome of Flanders.* 2. That King Iohn and his ſonne, for them and their heires, ſhould by a day certaine reſtore, and releaſe to K. Edward and his heires, &c. the whole Country of Aquitain, enlarged with the bordering and ſpacious Countries of Santoin, Poictou, Pierregoſt, Limoſin, Quercie, Angoleſme, Rouergne, &c. with all the Cities, Caſtles, and appurtenances, to be holden free, without any dependency but of God. 3. *That the * County of Ponthieu* (the proper inheritance of Iſabel late Queene Dowager of England mother of King Edward) the Townes, Countries, and Lordſhips of Callis, Guines, Mountril, Haim, Wale, Oye, Merck, S. Valary, &c. and all the Ilands which either the Engliſh then held, or which lay before any of the Premiſſes, with onely certaine limitations concerning priuate mens intereſt, ſhould remaine in like freedome as the reſt of the premiſſes to the Crowne of England. 4. That King Iohn ſhould pay for his ranſome (part thereof to be in hand, & part vpon dayes) *the ſumme of * thirty hundreth thouſand ſcutes of Gold, euery two of which ſhould be * ſixe ſhillings and eight pence ſterling. And that for aſſurance there ſhould be aſſigned a certain number of Hoſtages (by King* Edward named) to remaine in England. 5. That the French ſhould not aid, nor aſſiſt the Scots againſt the Engliſh, nor they the Flemings againſt the French. 6. That it ſhould be lawfull for either King notwithſtanding to aide the Titlers for the Dutchie of Britaine at their pleaſures. There were ſundry other Articles, as in caſes of ſo tranſcendent quality muſt needs happen, but, as theſe were principall, ſo the moſt of them might haue beene well left out here, vnleſſe they had more exactly beene obſerued by the French. Yet were they ratified with hands, ſcales, and Oathes at * Callis, where the two Kings, in ſtead of kiſſing the Pax at Maſſe (either hauing for honours-ſake refuſed to take it firſt) * ſaluted each the other with a

Therefore to make the memory of his birth-day acceptable by acts of gracious gouernment, as in a yeare of Iubile, he granted his generall and ſpeciall pardon to offenders without fine or Fee-paying for the Seale, ſet Priſoners at liberty, reuoked ſuch as were in baniſhment. Moreouer, vpon the grieuances of his people, peſtred with the doublings of Lawyers, hee commaunded, that * Pleas ſhould from thenceforth be made in Engliſh, not in French, a neceſſary Law, if it had beene as carefully obſerued, eſpecially, if withall hee had ordered the ſame ſhould not be written alſo in French, that his people might know their owne duties. It is obſerued that the Law of Magna Charta (confirmed alſo in this Parliament) was about a dozen ſeuerall times confirmed by this King during the yeares of his raigne. That which * another notes by occaſion of this Iubile, we would not omit; for the famous cuſtome of our Kings, who vpon Maundy Thurſday in imitation of Chriſt, waſh, feede and cloath as many poore, as themſelues are yeares olde, is referred to this celebration which King Edward made of his fiftieth yeare, in regard of the number fed, which number hee cals the Iubile of their ages: but as he imparted Grace to his people, ſo hee alſo tooke order to repleniſh his purſe. (128) That King Edwards fortune was not onely auaileable to himſelfe, or to his Lieutenants, but alſo to his friends and fauourites, appeared in the great quarrell about the title of Britaine Armoricke, which about this time was determined by the death of the Lord Charles Earle of Bloys, head of the one faction, (but willing to haue ended it by word, not by the ſword, if hee could haue preuailed with his wife) who was ſlaine in an encounter made againſt the Lord Iohn de Montford, head of the other ſide, where the * Lord William Latimer, * Sir Iohn Chandoys, Sir Hugh Caluerley, with other of the Engliſh, which ſtucke to Montford, wanne much honour. Padilla his concubine, who (calumniously * charging the Queene with that which her selfe acted,) by meanes of a Iew so enchanted a rich Girdle of King Peters, which Queene Blanch had giuen him, that the next time he ware it, the same * appeared to himselfe and the beholders like a snake. This cursed disciple of * Iannez and Iambrez hated the vertuous Queene, for that she had so preuailed with Don Pedro her husband, that no Iew was suffered to beare office, or enioy any fauours in Court, neither wanted shee much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine. But by this practise Maria de Padilla (who * some erroneously say was a Iew) got al the king to her self, and so persecuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before she dyed, the Popes intercessions failing to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine, who laboured to haue brought her againe into deserued grace, are by him pursued as fautors of her supposed witchcrafts. Other things also whetted him to sauage and Turkish Butcheries, as thirst of Gold, and somewhat which had by diuellish arts beene fore-told him concerning his end. His brothers, kinsfolke, Nobles, and others, he causelesly massacreth or forceth to seeke their safeguard by flight, among which the Lord Henry, his foresaid bastard brother was one. Peter notwithstanding was in the truth and right of bloud King of Spaine, but his said brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to be taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthily popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King and possession of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, so soon as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childlesse, * married his late Concubine Maria de Padilla, a woman of a noble house, though not so rarely honest, as to refuse the vnlawfull loue of a King: who hauing issue by her Alfonso a sonne (who dyed yong) and three daughters * Constance, Beatrix, and Isabel, made to her and them the best amends he could for what was passed. It is the fitter this truth should appeare, for that within a few yeares after, Iohn Duke of Lancaster, one of the sonnes of England, married Constance the eldest sister, claiming the Crowne of Castilia in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * some (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through hast or misinformation) haue in many points foully erred, and in particular, vntruly leauing vpon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was honested by lawfull matrimony. Diuers notwithstanding of * the Spanish Lords, like good subiects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a most violent Prince) nor could the vsurper Henrie, but by deepely impairing the reuenewes of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne any of them. Peter thus driuen from his kingdome, with his Wife, Children, and (if * some say true) but one seruant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (at * Bayon) that is, to honour and humanity it selfe: who seeing it a dangerous president against all lawfull Kings, that any one should be so dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; signified the same to his father: who enioynes him to aid Don Peter, so that now the Prince, (burning with desire of renowne) (vpon trust of pay for his Armie and of other commodities by King Peter, when hee should be re-established in his throne) is ready to passe into Spaine.

(133) Hee makes his way through the famous straights of Rounceuallux in Nauarre by permission of the King thereof, who * yet suffered himselfe (as most men write) to be taken prisoner by the French, and carried into Castile, that he might not in person seeme to crosse the French Kings designes on the behalfe of the vsurper Henry. The Prince of Wales had with him an armie of about thirty thousand men, and in his company, besides most of all the prime Captaines of the English, there were in person two Kings, Peter of Castile, whose the quarrell was, and the King of Maiorca, & Iohn Duke of Lancaster, who some while after Don Pedro his death writ himselfe King of Castile and Leon. On the other side K. Henry for defence of his new Diadem, had assembled a very great number, aswell of French (vnder Glequin their famous Captaine) as of Castilians and other, both Christians and Sarazens, not fewer then foure-score, or an hundreth thousand. Vpon the Borders of Castile it came to a battell; where the Prince of Wales obtained a very great victory, killing many thousands of his enemies. Henry himselfe * was wounded in the groine, but escaped. There were taken the Earle of Dene, * Bertram de Glequin himselfe (who shortly after by paying a great ransome had liberty) the Marshall Dandrehen and many others. King Peters falshood and death.

(134) But his falshood and ingratitude were monstrous: For the Prince notwithstanding his so great goodnesse extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdeaux without mony wherewith to pay his army, which was the cause of exceeding great mischiefe to himselfe, and to the English dominions beyond the Seas; as if God had beene displeased for succouring such a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his souldiers (who were not able to tarry King Peters leasure) coyned euen his plate, and when all would not serue, sought to lay vpon his Subiects in Gascoigne and thereabout, a new taxation, which bred a most dangerous reuolt. God notwithstanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his bastard brother Henry returned with new forces, and by the aid of Glequin and the French, hee both thrust him againe from the Throne, and * murthered him also with his owne hand. The Prince of Wales himselfe was in this iourney poisoned (as * was thought) for he neuer after had his health. Duke Iohn his brother is not freed * from the suspition of hauing hastened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of any practise at this time or no, appeares not.

(135) Now began the peace betweene England and France to vnsettle and vntwine. For while King Edward reioyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his sonnes and people; Charles the fifth, king of France, warned by so manifold calamities, as his Dominions had sustained by the English in faire warre, and yet most earnestly coueting to recouer the honour of his Nation, betakes himselfe wholly to other arts and traines; neuer aduenturing his owne person, but executing all his designes by Deputy, wherein the seruice of Bertram de Glequin Constable of France stood him most in stead: neither neglected hee before hand to lay vp colours wherewith to ouer-paint his * collusions and deuises for sauing his honour; insomuch that when it came to scanning, the losse was clearely vpon King Edwards side, and the cause of the breach made at least-wise doubtfull. His practises notwithstanding were palpable, and it must be confessed that our truely noble King (without suspition of craft) reposing himselfe vpon the rules of * magnanimity, did not reape the stable effects of so great and important victories, nor of a peace so ceremoniously made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might neuer bee infringed without the manifest breach vpon one side of all bonds both diuine and humane. The Prince of Wales by letters aduiseth his father not to trust to any faire words, nor ouertures of farther amity made by the French, because he said they entertained practises vnder-hand, in euery place against him. But the Prince was * iudged to speake out of a restlesse humour, delighting in warre, and therefore preuailed not. The effects disclosed that his words were true.

(136) For now king Charles surnamed the wise, hauing by quicke paiments, and by one meanes or other gotten home all the hostages which had bin empledged for performance of the Articles of peace before mentioned, sets all his wits on worke to abuſe the King of Englands credulity, till he had gotten before-hand as farre as diſſimulations could aduance: He courts the good old Prince with louing letters and preſents, while in the meane time his plots ripen abroad, and the County of Ponthieu (the King of Englands vndeniable inheritance) was firſt ſurpriſed before King Edward heard thereof. And whereas the Prince of Wales had at a Parliament in Gaſcoigne propounded a demaund for fowage, or of money to be leuied by the Chimney, the Earles of Armignac and Cominges, and other Lords the Princes ſubiects, bearing no ſound affections toward the Engliſh Empire (the leſſe for that by the pollicy of Glequin, and the Chancellor of France Dourmauns*, all or moſt of the Countries and Townes (which by vertue of the peace made at Bretigney) were annexed thereunto, were cunningly wrought to returne to their olde Lords) repaire to the French Court at Paris, there to purſue an appeale for redreſſe of this oppreſſion againſt the Prince (who was not ſo happy as to follow the counſell of Sir Robert Knols, and other wiſeſt Captaines, who diſſwaded this impoſition,) pretending that he was to anſwere before King Charles as before his ſuperiour Lord, of whom (they ſaid) hee held by homage and fealtie. This practiſe of the diſloyall Lords (for what could they be elſe? ſeeing King Edward and his heires were abſolutely freed (by vertue of the ſaid Treaty) from all manner of ſeruice for any of their Dominions in France) King Charles did openly at laſt entertaine, and vpon hope to recouer by ſurpriſe, and plot, what the Engliſh had wonne by dint of ſword and perfect manhood) proceeded to ſummon the Prince of Wales to Paris, there to anſwere ſuch accuſations as his ſubiects made againſt him.

* Inuentory of France in Charles the 5. Serres.

(137) To encreaſe the indignity of theſe deuices, you ſhould heare the French kings Orators before the Pope and Emperour, to whom king Edward had ſeuerally ſent Ambaſſadors, full of complaints againſt King Charles, laying wholly vpon the French the blame of the new warre, as vpon open breakers of faith, and violaters of the league, moſt confidently on the contrary part charge the Engliſh.

Paul. Aemyl. in Char. 5.

"We had ſuffered the French hoſtages to viſit their "friends at home vpon the French Kings word, that "they ſhould come back by a day, contrary to which "word, they, nor any of them, either were, or are "returned. That not ſo much as the Law of Nations "was kept with vs, which tyes Princes to demaund "reſtitution by their Officers of Armes, or vpon "deniall to defie them, but where (ſay wee) are "the * Heralds which King Charles did ſend? We "ſay, that without notice hee ſurpriſeth by ſtealth "the Earledome of Ponthieu, King Edwards vnque-"ſtionable right, and hath diſſeiſed vs in Aquitaine, "which doth no leſſe belong vnto vs then Ponthieu. "That * Margaret the Inheritrice of Flanders, which "had beene promiſed to the Lord Edmund, one of "our Kings Sonnes, was by their iniurious practiſe "wonne away, and beſtowed in marriage vpon Phi-"lip Duke of Burgundy. Finally, we ſay, that Lewis "Duke of Aniou, one of the pledges, making an "eſcape by that, contrary to honour, and the league, "was by them receiued, and not returned, which "poynts being all of tranſcendent qualitie, are (ſay "wee) directly contrary to the Treatie and ſworne "agreement at Bretigny.

* Serres raſhly affirmes he did.

* Pol. Virg. in Ed. 3

The French hereunto anſwere, and charge vpon vs, to ſhew the fault of firſt breach, not theirs, but ours.

"That we by vertue of the ſaid Treaty were bound "immediately to withdraw our Armie out of France, "which yet (they ſaid) we did not during all the raign "of Iohn their King.

"That the peace was made thereby more noyous, "and hurtfull then the warre, and that they were "faine to purchaſe the departure of our Souldiers "with a greater charge then would haue maintained "a very gallant Armie: That this breach was ours,

The poynts charged vpon the Engliſh.

"becauſe the Souldiers were ours. That King Ed-"ward was bound in an open aſſembly of the States "of both Realmes, to renounce his right in the "Crowne of France: when (ſay they) was this done?

In Charles 5. Serres.

Thus they, and Serres addes that the Eſtates of thoſe Countries which had beene aſſigned by the Treatie to the Engliſh aſſeuered, that it was againſt the fundamentall lawes of France to alien any part, & that they neither could, nor would ceaſe to be members of that Crowne.

(138) So ye behold that the fortune of the great is neuer to want friends to ſpeake for them, nor occaſions to ſlip out or in, whenſoeuer profit and aduantage doe inuite. Memorable (if true) is that part of the Frenchmens defence, in that polite and learned Italian, P. Aemylius, where it being obiected with what honour and clemency King Iohn was vſed by vs, they breake out and affirme, that wee (being their Beneficiaries or Free-holders for ſuch Countries as wee held in France) tooke more gold for the onely ranſome of King Iohn, then they payed to redeeme S. Lewis their King, & his brother, the Peeres, and whole French Army captiuated in the Chriſtian warres by the barbarous Souldan. But (good Aemylius) ſay that were ſo, yet cannot you ſay, that the ſumme wee tooke was worth the leaſt Countrie in France, and when all France was ours, was it not great bountie to take ſo ſmall a pittance? If you replye that wee had many Countries beſides, wee reioyne and truely ſay, that wee quit more then we acquired. But let vs proceed: for now all claimes and quarrels were as open, as if no obſtacle had euer beene interpoſed: the ignominie of their late terrible foyles wounded all true French hearts, and they deſire (king Edward growne aged) not to ſeeme by ſitting ſtill vpon ſo many thornes of diſgrace, & loſſe, to haue beene out-warred, though ouer-warred, and though in two or three battels inferiour, yet not to haue beene clearely debellated.

The dealings of the Engliſh defended againſt Paul. Aemylius.

(139) What doth our King Edward now? Hee * cals a Parliament, declares the breach, prayes aide, obtaines it, and claimes the crowne of France afreſh. Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, are ſent ouer to Calis with a great force, to inuade France. No great matter as then enſued. * Thomas Beuchamp Earle of Warwicke comming ouer in hope to haue worke for his Curtelax, for the French affronted our armie vnder the conduct of Duke Philip le Hardy (though at this time ſcarce ſhewing himſelfe worthy that ſurname) but roſe vpon the Earles arriuall, and retyred, accuſed the Lords for ſloath, and ſware he would abroad among them to find fighting, while Engliſh bread was as yet vndigeſted in his Souldiers ſtomackes. Somewhat he did, but death by a peſtilentiall dart preuented the reſt. This Earle had with him a learned man (as Scipio had Polybius) to regiſter the acts which he ſaw done: A worthy example ill followed by poſterity. The * Duke of Lancaſter pierced vp with his army ſo farre as Roan. The ſame Polydor wondering why they of Ponthieu hauing for an hundreth and twelue yeares (that is, euer ſince King Edward the firſt had it giuen to him with his wife) beene ours, ſhould reuolt, onely daring the greatneſſe of the Engliſh, can finde no other reaſon for their doings but this pleaſant one, that as diſperſed cattell gather to their owne heard, ſo Frenchmen flock to the French, and Engliſh follow Engliſh.

(140) Stirring Princes cannot containe themſelues within their owne quietly poſſeſſed rights: Otherwiſe, who ſees not how much better it is for the people, that their Princes ſhould manage well that which they haue, rather then graſpe at more? For King Edward (notwithſtanding his continuall manifold victories) comes backe to the Subiect (who yet had gained hugely by the warres, and therefore might the better doe it) for ſupportation: and they yeeld it, but his age was abuſed, for the money was not expended as the pretences were made. turnes were serued with publicke loanes. Neuertheleſſe, *after Midſommer day, that renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knols, whom martiall vertue had rayſed from the loweſt rancke to the higheſt reputation (though ſome alſo affirme him * borne noble) was ſent by King Edward into France with an Armie, where (while obedience laſted to his direction) all things proſpered. But by the inſtigation of one Sir *Iohn Menſterworth the yong Lords Grand-ſonne, and Fitzwalter, and other, vainely ſcorning to be vnder Knols, for that they held themſelues his betters, and thereupon diuiding themſelues after they had done ſundry exploits, marching vp euen to Paris, were beaten and foild by the French vnder Glequins conduct, but Knols wintred ſafe in Britaine. Menſterworth comes into England, and knowing accuſers haue the vantage, complaines to King Edward of Knols: but not altogether beleeued; he ads treaſon to vntruth, and turning French becomes a wicked enemy to his King and Countrey, * promiſing the French to procure the Caſtilian Nauie to inuade England, for which being in the laſt yeere of King Edwards raigne taken, he by due courſe was condemned and cut in pieces, dying the death he had deſerued. He was laide hold vpon in the Citie of Pampeline in Nauarre, and from thence conueighed to London, vpon whoſe bridge his wicked head ſtood Sentinell.

(141) * Pope Vrban the fifth, comming from Rome to Auinion with purpoſe to vnite theſe two mighty Kings, their wils, and mights, againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendome, put off mortality at Marſils, and ſo that holy intention ceaſed for the preſent: but the ſame being * continued by his next ſucceſſor Gregory 11. yet tooke no effect, no more then that which the Emperour to like cauſe would haue vndergone: which the * French impute to King Edward, who confident by reaſon of his former atchieuements, would trie it out by the ſword. Wherein he ſeemed to forget the mutable condition of warre, the ſearneſſe of his body, and the greenneſſe of his Grand-Childe young Richard, who was to ſucceede, if the Prince of Wales died, as ſhortly after he did. Neither did God ſeeme to approue his opinion herein, for that croſſes came faſt vpon him, both at home and abroad. There is no greater wiſdome nor happineſſe then to know when we are well, and then to preſerue without hazard or empairement, that honour, wealth, or quiet which we already haue.

(142) Among the States and Townes (aſſigned to the Engliſh by vertue of the treatie at Bretigny) which had reuolted to the French, was the Citie of Limoges in Limoſin, whither the Prince marcheth, & ſits downe with his armie before it. Thither * came vnto him out of England his brethren the D. of Lancaſter & the Earle of Cambridge, with a freſh ſupply of valiant Chiefes and Souldiers. The City ſtood it out to the vttermoſt, and was forceably entred, where mercy had nothing to ſaue nor ſpare, the ſword and fire for terror to other killing and defacing in a manner all. Hee * who writes that the Prince flew vp neere to Paris, and ſcarſely, by reaſon of Glequins valour, got backe to Burdeaux, ſeemes to haue miſtaken therein, as in many other things concerning vs of great importance. After this ſeruice, the Prince, (health failing him more & more) leaues his Brethren in Aquitaine, and ſailes into England.

(143) The French in the meane time wonne townes & places in Aquitaine, gathering new hopes after ſo long and perpetuall infelicities. The loſſe of that expert Captaine Sir Iohn Chandoys (vnfortunately ſlaine) was a great aduantage to their deſires, whoſe whole care for warre reſted vpon Glequin, not long before aduanced for his military vertue from low eſtate to ſo great eminencie, as to be Conſtable of France, the chiefeſt officer for warre which that Kingdome hath) and he a man of much proofe, in good and euill fortune, ſo tempered his courage with diſcretion, that he onely firſt bad his Country riſe againe, and endeauour in deſpite of euill fortune to re-flouriſh.

(144) The Prince of Wales (wanting health) vpon comming to his fathers ſight, rendred vp the Dutchie of Aquitaine, to be diſpoſed of, as to his roiall pleaſure ſeemed good. While King Edward was at Clarendon, there repaired to him the factious king of Nauarre, whoſe errand was to make an ouerture of aſſociation againſt the French; but as his offers were acceptable, ſo his cautions not ſeeming ſufficient, he returned (after great entertainement) without concluding.

(145) Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and his brother the Earle of Cambridge, doe now returne out of Aquitaine, with the Ladies Conſtance and Iſabel, daughters of Don Pedro late King of Spaine, whom they married: The Duke thereupon inſtiling himſelfe King, and his wife Queene of Caſtile and Leon. Nor was the Engliſh name onely encreaſed in titularie honours; for about this time, the Flemings (who had prouoked vs) were vanquiſht by the * Earle of Hereford at ſea in a ſharpe fight, * about twentie and fiue of their Shippes being taken, and all the men ſlaine. The ſweete of this victorie was ſowred not long after with a grieuous loſſe: for the French hauing beſieged the ſtrong City of Rochel in Santoin, with the ayde by Sea of Henry King of Caſtile; to relieue the Engliſh, Iohn Earle of Pembroke was ſent with about fortie Shippes, men, victuals, munition, and mony, to the value of twenty thouſand marks, for the vſes of the Warre; but being ſodainely aſſailed with the Spaniſh Armado, which conſiſted of many great Shippes, vnder the commaund of Ambroſe Buccanigra and others, the Engliſh after a long and cruell conflict were vtterly diſtreſſed, the Earle taken priſoner, and almoſt all the reſt either taken, or put to the ſword. * Rochel held out notwithſtanding, to whoſe relieſe while King Edward himſelfe in perſon, with an extraordinary force ſet ſaile, the winde (alwayes till that time fauourable to his voyages for France) came Eaſterly, and draue him backe into England with great griefe, and the waſte (they write) of * nine hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. Neither did hee ſo giue ouer the care of that ſtrong Peece, which the Engliſh moſt manfully made good againſt the enemie.

(146) * Rochel thus perſiſting in loyall reſolution, Iohn Duke of Britaine, (who had married the Lady Marie daughter of King Edward) a Gentleman of much gratitude toward the Engliſh, the authors of his fortunes, reſolues to aduenture his ſtate in their quarrell; ſhips away for England: hath ayde miniſtred vnto him: hee returnes, and warres with various euent. But Iohn Duke of Lancaſter with a very great Armie comes to Callis, and from thence marcheth ouer the whole face of France, and (though with loſſe of many thouſand * Horſe in the deſert countries of Auuergn through famin) came ſafe, but with an almoſt-hunger-ſtarued Army to Burdeaux. Not long after he drew into the field, and a day was appointed betweene him and the Duke of Anion, the French Kings brother, to haue tried the quarrell of their Nations by ſet-battle, before the city of Tholouz in Languedoc, but by an vntimely and a pernitious ſhort truce (to which King Edward yeelded, becauſe his ſon the Prince lay dangerouſly ſick) the hoped victory not onely ſlipt out of the Engliſhmens hands, but almoſt all aduantage alſo of doing any thing elſe ſeaſonably. The French boaſted * themſelues as of a Conqueſt, who notwithſtanding did helpe out their valiancy with policie. Glequin makes his vſe of all occaſions, and workes much harme to the Engliſh partie in Guien and Britaine: But in Britaine Sir Robert Knols did ſo nobly acquit himſelfe on the behalfe of his Soueraignes ſonne in law the Duke, that he onely ſeemed a fit parallel to Glequin, like as hee ſtopt the current of his fortune.

Neuertheleſſe the doings of Glequin are ſo extolled by the French, that Tillius enters them into his Chronology with theſe words, victoriæ, &c. the victories, fortunes, and triumphes of Bertram Glequin in Aquitaine and Britaine, though their owne ſelues make no mention of any defeate of the Engliſh, which afforded them matter for the ſhadow of ſuch gloriations.

An.D.1374. (147) The next yeere the Duke of Lancaſter returned into England, after whoſe departure all Aquitaine almoſt reuolted, and fell to the French, who by the aduantage of King Edwards age, the Princes pining maladie (which ſome ſay was not poyſon but a * dropſie) and the ſucceſſe of their practiſes more then of their valour, were growne braue againe: A treatie of peace was holden at Bruges, all was but painted: for euen then the French moſt of all prepared vnder-hand for new attempts. Chiefe commiſſioners for the Engliſh at that conference was Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and for the French the Duke of Anion. The effects hatched nothing but a ſhort truce for our euils to breed in.

An.D.1375. (148) Among the parties which were preiudiced by this hurtfull truce, the Duke of Britaine was chiefe. He had obtained great aſſiſtance from King Edward, & was now with * the Earles of Cambridge, March, Warwicke, and Stafford, with many other noble gentlemen and ſouldiers returned into Britaine, making to themſelues a faire way for their maine enterprize, which was to ſettle the Duke, and by the commoditie of his Dutchies ſituation to annoy the common enemy, and the better to recouer the Engliſh dominions in Aquitaine: But this treatie did that which Glequin, their indeed braue Generall, had not as yet in any ſort effected: for the Duke of Britaine had * driuen the French Kings army out of his territories. But who wonders at this truce? The Prince of Wales was likely to die; plots on foot at home; the Duke of Lancaſter had an eye to the Succeſſion; things grew troubled: the Kings age was abuſed by dame Alice Peirs (a moſt buſie Court-flie) who (after Queene Philips death) kept the old man warme, and the French ſaw all theſe matters and ſlept not.

An.D.1377. An.Reg.51. (152) About this time the famous Doctor Iohn Wiclef, a man of ſharpe wit, profound learning, and great iudgement, did in the Vniuerſitie of Oxford publiquely maintaine ſundry propoſitions and dogmaticall points againſt the Church of Rome, of which the Pope (fore-ſeeing the hazard hanging ouer his Triple-Crowne) condemned * three and twentie as hereticall; whereupon the Arch-biſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London hauing attached the body of the ſaid Wiclef, did in the preſence of the Duke of Lancaſter and the Lord Henry Peircy (* his great fauourers,) declare the iudgement of the Pope concerning Wiclefs Doctrine, which had then taken deepe roote both in the Vniuerſitie, Court, and Countrey. So for a while all was quiet. But (vpon ſome ſecret encouragements) hee held not peace long. His followers were, in the phraſe of thoſe darke dayes, called * Lolards, whereas, in truth, they endeauoured to extirpate all pernitious weedes, which through time, ſloath, and fraude, had crept into the field of Gods Church. The Duke of Lancaſter (the rather, ſome thinke, vpon priuate emulations againſt Courtney Biſhop of London) was engaged ſo farre in his protection, that he and the Lord Peircy hardly eſcaped the fury of the Londoners, who would without queſtion haue hewed them in pieces in reuenge of ſome diſgracefull ſpeech vttered by him againſt their Biſhop. He notwithſtanding diſſwaded all violence, and kept them from firing his Palace of the Sauoy, but they neuertheleſſe did in moſt deſpitefull manner reuerſe his Armories in the open Market: A diſhonour not to be borne, as that in which the dignitie dignity of his royall bloud was empaired. By this outrage the people (a moſt dangerous and heady water when once it is out) made knowne, what he, and the Lord Percie were to haue hoped, if they could haue fingred them, before they had gotten to Kenington to Prince Richard, who there remained with his mother: The Duke for this bare the Londoners much euill-will; neither reſted till (for a commencement of reuenge) hee had procured the Major and Aldermen to be thruſt from their places, and ſubſtituted others in their ſtead.

(153) France in the meane time erected with new hopes, breathes nothing but warre. Prouiſions in that reſpect were not neglected here. One of the laſt publique acts of the old Kings life, was the triumphall celebration of Saint Georges Feaſt at Windſor, where himſelfe had founded the Order of the Garter; and at this ſolemnitie hee beſtowed vpon his deareſt Grandchild Prince Richard the dignity of Knighthood, which onely thing in all the patrimony of honour could not diſcend vnto him.

(154) Not long after enſued the ſentence of diuorce which God pronounced betweene the Soule and Body of this mighty and martiall King, who left the World in the moneth of Iune, at his Manour of Shene in Surrey: his Acts may giue you a perfect Character of his minde: few Princes that had ſo great and heroicke vertues, had fewer vices: therefore it was a fault of thoſe times, which abounding in learned men, and among them Geffrey Chaucer Prince of Poets) afforded no better an Epitaph then that which we are faine with pitty to reade vpon his Monument at Weſtminſter: the ſtuffe neuertheleſſe is worthy, though the forme be rude.

His minde (by ſundry great checkes of Gods prouidence) re-called to conſider of the foure laſt things; Death, Iudgement, Heauen and Hell, made him betake himſelfe to Acts of benignitie and deuotion. The Chappell at the end of the Abbey-Church at Weſtminſter, (ſince moſt magnificently enlarged by King Henrie the ſeauenth) was of his building. The holy quiet of ſtudies, and aduancement of good Arts, hee ſo proſperouſly fauoured, that beſides other great priuiledges granted to the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, * where himſelfe had in his youth beene trained vp vnder the learned Walter Burley) *he conferrred the chiefe rule of that whole Citie vpon the Chancellor of the Vniuerſitie, ſubordinating the Maior and Citizens to his gouernement, in regard of their iniuries offered to the Students. This moſt mightie Monarch that euer ware the Crowne of England, in many other felicities excelled his Anceſtors, as in the victorious valour of his Children, their obedience to him, and loue among themſelues. A Ladie to his wife (their mother) of ſuch excellent vertue and gouernment, as that then King Edwards fortunes ſeemed to fall into Eclypſe when ſhe was hidden in her Sepulchre. Such and greater was this Edward, whoſe name among the ſuruiuing ſplendors of his actions, is iuſtly tranſmitted with honour to all poſteritie. Hee raigned almoſt one and fiftie yeeres, and *liued about threeſcore and fiue.

His Wife.

(155) Philip, wife of King Edward, was daughter of William Earle of Henault and Holland, ſiſter of Earle William the laſt of that houſe, and of Margaret the Empreſſe that ſucceeded him; her mother was Ioan*, ſiſter of Philip of Valoys king of France, daughter of Charles Earle of Valoys, who was ſonne to king Philip the Hardie. Shee was married vnto him at Yorke, Ianuary 24. crowned at Weſtminſter the firſt Sunday of Lent following, 1327. Shee was a Ladie of great vertue, and a conſtant true-hearted louer of our Nation, was his wife two and forty yeeres, died Auguſt 15. Anno 1369. of her husbands raigne, 43. and was buried at Weſtminſter, where ſhee hath a faire Tombe, at the foote of her husband, of blacke Touch ſtone, with the garniſhing about it, and the portraiture ouer it of Alablaſter: but ſhee built to her ſelfe a Monument of more glory and durability, by founding, and richly endowing, the Colledge, called of her the Queenes in Oxford, which, if it had beene finiſhed according to the proiect, had beene a foundation of marueilous ſtate and magnificence.

His Iſſue.

(156) Edward, their eldeſt ſonne and firſt childe, borne at Woodſtocke, Iuly 15. in the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, Anno 1329. was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter; hee was alſo Earle of Kent in right of his wife Ioan (the moſt admired Ladie of that age) daughter of Edmund Earle of Kent, brother, by the fathers ſide, to King Edward the ſecond. Shee had beene twice married before, firſt to the valiant Earle of Saliſburie, from whom ſhe was diuorced, next to the Lord Thomas Holland, after whoſe deceaſe, this Prince paſſionately louing her, did marrie her: by her he had Iſſue two ſonnes, Edward the eldeſt, borne at Angoleſme, who died at ſeauen yeeres of age, and Richard borne at Burdeaux, who, after his father was Prince of Wales, and after his Grand-father King of England. This Prince had alſo naturall Iſſue, Sir Iohn Sounder, and Sir Roger Clarendon Knights; the latter being attainted in the raigne of Henrie the fourth, is thought to haue beene anceſtor to the houſe of Smythes in Eſſex. He died at Canterburie on Trinity Sunday, Iune 8. ætat. 46. of his fathers raigne 49. and was buried at Chriſt-Church there, 1376.

(157) William their ſecond ſonne, and fourth child, was borne 1335. the ninth of his fathers raigne, at Hatfield in the County of Hertford, taking his Chriſtian name from William Earle of Henault his Grand-father, and his ſurname from the place of his Natiuitie; is reported to haue deceaſed in his childehood, and to be buried at Yorke.

(158) Lionel, their third ſonne and fift childe, was borne at the Citie of Antwerpe, 29. Nouember, the twelfth of his fathers raigne, Anno 1338. he married firſt Elizabeth, the daughter and heire of William Burgh Earle of Vlſter in Ireland, in whoſe right hee was firſt created Earle of Vlſter; and becauſe he had with her the honour of Clare in the counties of Townmond, as parcell of the inheritance of her Grand-mother Elizabeth, (the ſiſter and co-heire of the laſt earle Gilbert Clare,) he was in a Parliament, An. 1362. created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Country about the Towne Caſtle and honour of Clare: from which Dutchie the name of Clarentieux (being the Title of the King of Armes for the South parts of England) is deriued. This Duke had Iſſue by her one onely daughter, named Philip, afterward wife of Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, mother of Earle Roger, Father of Anne Counteſſe of Cambridge, and ſhee was the mother of Richard duke of Yorke, Father of King Edward the 4. The ſecond marriage of this Duke was in Lumbardie at Millaine, with the Lady * Violanta Daughter of Galeacio the ſecond Duke thereof; but through intemperance, he liued not long after.

(159) Iohn, their fourth ſonne and ſixt Childe was was borne at Gaunt the chiefe Towne of Flaunders, Anno 1340. and foureteenth of his fathers raigne. In his Childhood hee was created Earle of Richmond, which title was afterward re-called in, and bestowed vpon Iohn Duke of Britanny, who married his sister, to whose Dutchy it had formerly belonged. He had three wiues; the first, Blanch, daughter and Coheire, and in the end the sole heire of Henry Duke of Lancaster (sonne of Edmund surnamed Crooch-back) in whose right he was at the first Earle, and after Duke of the same, and with that Dutchy also Earle of Leicester, Derby, and Lincolne, and high Steward of England. He had issue by her, Henry of Bullingbrooke Earle of Derbie, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crowne in the house of Lancaster; Philip, wife of Iohn the first, King of Portugall; and Elizabeth, married first to Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, (brother of Thomas Duke of Surrey) and after him, to Sir Iohn Cornwall Baron of Fanhope. His second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time he entituled himself King of both those realmes; by her he had issue one onely daughter, named Katherine, married to Henrie the third, sonne of King Iohn, in possession before, and in her right, after, King of both the said realmes. His third wife was Katherine, the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnshire, eldest daughter and Coheire of Payn Roet a Gascoigne, called Guien King of Armes, for that Countrey, * his yonger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had issue (borne before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament holden in the twentieth yeere of King Richard the second,) Iohn Earle of Sommerset, Thomas Duke of Excester, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinall; and Ioane, who was first married to Robert Ferrers (Baron of Wemme and Oueſley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwicke) and secondly to Ralph Neuil the first, Earle of Westmerland. Shee and all her brethren were surnamed Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France * where they were all borne,) and in regard thereof bare the Porculleys of a Castle for the Cognizance of their family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeere of his Nephew King Richard, at a Parliament holden at London, was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the sixt yeere after, he was called home, and this Title re-called, in the third yeere after, the sixtieth of his age, An. 1399. he died at Ely-house in Holborne, and lyeth honourably entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul.

* Idem ib.

Edmond, their fift sonne, surnamed of Langley, was created Earle of Cambridge Anno 1362. in the same Parliament, wherein Lionel was created Duke of Clarence. Hee was afterward made Duke of Yorke, Anno 1386. and married Isabel daughter and Coheire to Peter, King of Castile and Leon. His sonne Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, tooke to wife Anne Mortimer heire of the foresaid Lionel, elder brother to Edmund Langley.

William, another of their sonnes, surnamed of Windsor where he was borne, died young, and is buried at Westminster.

Thomas, the youngest sonne of King Edward and Queene Philip, surnamed of Woodstocke, (where he was borne) was first Earle of Buckingham, created by his Nephew King Richard the second on his Coronation day, An. 1377. by whom, after also he was made Duke of Gloceſter, 1385. The Earledomes also of Essex and Northampton, and the Constableship of England, fell to him by right of his wife Eleanor, the onely daughter and heire of Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex. He was a man of valour, wisdome, and vigilancy, for the behoofe of the King his Nephew and the State, but those noble vertues (distempered with too much wilfulnesse and froward obstinacie) bred him, first Enuy, and after ruine. For the King surmising him to be a too seuere obseruer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolke how to make him away; whom Mowbray vnawares surprizing, conuaied secretly to Callis, where he was strangled 1397. the twentieth of his Nephews raigne. Himselfe in his life had prouided a goodly Tombe at Playsie in Essex, (his owne Towne, and * the vsuall seat of the great Constables of England) * where he founded a Colledge; whither his body was brought, and layde with all funerall pompe, but afterward it was translated to Westminster, where also lyeth Eleanor his wife, who dyed 1399. Their issue was Humfrey Earle of Buckingham, * who dyed at Chester of the pestilence, An. 1400. Anne (married first to Edmund Earle of Stafford, by whom she had Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, secondly to William Bourchier Earle of Eue, by whom she had Henry Earle of Essex,) Ioane married to Gilbert L. Talbot, and had issue by him a daughter, who died young; Philip and Isabel both dying issueless.

Ioane, their second daughter and third childe, was borne the ninth of her fathers raigne, An. 1335. Being foureteene yeeres of age, she was desired in marriage by solemne Embassage, from Alphons the eleauenth King of Castile and Leon, sonne of King Ferdinando the fourth, was espoused by Proxie, intituled Queene of Spaine, and conueyed into that Country, where she presently deceased of a great plague that then raigned; so as the King comming to meete her to solemnize the espousals, with great griefe accompanyed her to Church onely at her funerall the two and twentieth of her fathers raigne, An. 1348.

Blanch, their third daughter, died young, and lieth buried at Westminster.

Mary, their fourth daughter, was married to Iohn Montfort Duke of Britaine.

Margaret their youngest daughter, borne in Callis, was the first wife of Iohn de Hastings Earle of Pembroke, but she died without issue.

CHAPTER XIII.

An. D. 1378.

RIchard of Burdeaux, ſonne to that Great Starre of Engliſh Cheualrie, Edward, by-named the Blacke Prince, and grand-Childe to the moſt renowned Edward the third, (both of them lately deceaſed) was crowned in the eleuenth yeare of his age, and vpon the ſixteenth day of Iuly. Seldome hath beene ſeene ſo magnificent a Coronation, as that of this yong King, but the thing which gaue a better luſtre of hope at his beginning, then the ſhine and maieſty of that publike Act, was the wiſe courſe which in this his child-hood was taken; to wit, the reconciliation of the Lord Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, and the Citizens of London, with the reſtitution of Sir Peter de la Mare knight, Speaker in the late Parliament (whom King Edward had committed to priſon, at the inſtigation of Dame Alice Pierce now baniſht, and confiſcated) not onely to former libertie, but likewiſe to fauour and honour extraordinary.

The Coronation of the King.

(2) At this Coronation, (which, as matters not vnworthy to be kept aliue, we following the immethodicall order of the Record, haue here for perpetuall memory thought good to abridge out of authentike Monuments) Iohn the Kings eldeſt vncle, vnder the ſtile of Iohn King of Caſtile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaſter, by humble petition to the King, claimed to be now Steward of England, in right of his Earledome of Leiceſter; and as he was Duke of Lancaſter, to beare the Kings chiefe Sword called Curtana; and as Earle of Lincolne, to cut and carue at the royall Table before the King. His petitions being found iuſt, were confirmed to him, and to his Aſſignes, the two Earles of Derby and Stafford, the firſt to beare the Sword, while the Duke ſhould be buſied about other offices as Steward, and the other to cut and carue. The Duke then in great eſtate, held this the Kings high Court of Stewardſhip in the White-hall of the Kings Pallace at Weſtminſter, where neere to the Chappell of the ſaide Palace, vpon the Thurſday, before the Coronation, which was alſo vpon a Thurſday. There Thomas of Woodſtocke the Kings Vncle, was admitted to exerciſe the office of Conſtable of England, in right of his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Humfrey de Bohun, late Earle of Hereford, and Conſtable of England. Henrie de Percie (Lord Percie) was by the Kings conſent and writ authorized to exerciſe the place of Marſhall of England for that time, ſauing to euery one their right, for that by reaſon of the times ſhortneſſe, the claime, which Margaret daughter and heire to Thomas of Brotherton, late Earle of Norfolke, and Marſhall of England, laid thereunto, could not bee diſcuſſed. Robert de Veere Earle of Oxford, though then in minority, being notwithſtanding found to haue right in Fee, was by the Kings ſpeciall conſent allowed to haue, and vſe, the office of Chamberlaine. Hee was alſo admitted to his right of powring out water for the King to waſh with, when he went to meate, at the Coronation. Iohn Wiltſhire, Citizen of London, by reaſon of certaine tenements (heretofore the poſſeſſion of Iohn Picot) being a Mo tie of the Mannour of Heydon, and holden in Serjeantie, had his right, to hold a Towell for the King to wipe with, when hee went to meate, found and allowed, and Edmund Earle of Kent appoynted to ſerue as his Deputy. Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke was found to haue right, and admitted thereupon to beare the third ſword of eſtate before the King at the Coronation, as alſo to exerciſe the office of Pantler, and to enjoy all ſuch fees as to the ſame appertayned. Sir Iohn de Argenthem Knight, by reaſon of the tenure of his Manour of Wimondley in the County of Hertford, was admitted to ſerue the King at his Cup, vpon the day of the Coronation, and for his Fee to haue that * Cuppe of Siluer wherewith hee then ſerued the King in his royalty. William Lord Furniuall, for his Mannour of Farnham and Hamlet of Cere, was proued to haue right to ſupport the Kings right arme, when it held the Scepter royall therein, at the day of Coronation; which ſeruice, beeing firſt * honourably knighted by the King at Kenington, hee was admitted accordingly to performe. Anne, late wife of Iohn de Haſtings earle of Pembroke, for her Manour of Aſhele in Norfolke, was admitted by her Deputy Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, to vſe the office of Naperer, and to enjoy the fees thereof. Edmund, Earle of March, was aſſigned to carry the Kings great gilt Spurres, ſauing to euery one their right; for Iohn, the ſonne of Iohn de Haſtings late Earle of Pembroke, claimed that office to be his, as William le Marſhall his Anceſtor held the ſame at the Coronation of King Edward the ſecond; but by reaſon he was vnder age, and in Wardſhip, the King for that time diſpoſed it to the Earle of March: Who alſo, with the ſaide Spurres was aſſigned to beare the ſecond Sword before the King; for which, the ſaid young Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Arundel (in the right of his Anceſtor the Earle of Surrey) contending, it was adjudged to Pembroke, for his Caſtles and Townes of Pembroke and Tenby, &c. but the execution of that honourable place was aſſigned by the King as before. Richard Earle of Arundel, for the Manour of B. in Kent, was admitted to bee chiefe Butler at the Coronation, for that (after the ſale thereof) the Earles Anceſtors had exerciſed that office at Coronations, and the claime of Edmund Staplegate, who then had that manour as ſonne & heire of Edmund Staplegate (ward to Ieffrey Chaucer, who had freed him for one hundreth and foure pounds) for that time put off his right to him, in the meane time ſaued notwithſtanding. The Lord Maior and Citizens of London (ſuch as were choſen for that high daies ſeruice among themſelues) were found by good Record to haue their ſeuerall rights. The Maior to attend in his owne perſon as chiefe Cup-waiter, (charged with the Cupbord-royall) aſwell in the Hall at dinner, to ſerue the King in a cup of gold with ſpices, and for his Fees to haue the ſaid Cup, and a * Water-ſpout-pot of gold thereunto belonging, when he tooke his leaue at night. The Citizens, to helpe their Lord Maior in his office of chiefe Pincern or Cup-waiter, and to miniſter or ſerue the Lords aſwell at Dinner in the Hall, as in the Chamber after dinner. Whereupon the King, (ſaith the Record) perpendens gratitudinem magnam & ſubſidium quæ Progenitores ſui, &c. weighing with himſelfe the great gratitude and ayde which his Progenitors had heretofore abundantly found in the Citizens aforeſaid, and hoping himſelfe to finde in them the like gratitude and aide hereafter, and to the intent that they might with the more ioyfull hearts performe loyall obedience to the King, and more earneſtly helpe him in his occaſions, he being heartily deſirous to content them, did will and ordaine that the ſelected Citizens ſhould exerciſe their ſaid attendance. Sir Iohn Dymmocke Knight, in the right of Margaret his wife, for the Manour of Scryuelby, and Sir Baldwine de Freuile Knight, as couſen and next heire to Philip Marmion, by Lionneſſe daughter of the ſaid Philip, for the Caſtle of Tamworth in the Countie of Warwicke, contended each of them to haue the office, and Fees belonging to the Kings Champion vpon that roiall day; but becauſe the ſaid Iohn ſhewed better Records then Baldwine, and for that King Edward and the late Prince of Wales, were often heard to ſay that Iohn ought to doe that ſeruice for the ſaide manour of Scryuelby, he was admitted for that time, and day was giuen to Baldwine to ſhew farther cauſe of his claime within three Weekes after the Feaſt of Saint Hilarie next, or elſe for euer to bee vtterly excluded.

This Champion is to haue for accompliſhment of that ſeruice (and the ſame alſo for his Fees) one of the beſt Horſes of warre and Capariſons, which the King hath, one ſaddle plated with Iron, and one compleate armour with the whole furniture, in ſuch ſort as the King himſelfe vſeth, when hee is to goe into a mortall battle (Sil deuſt aler, ſaith the Record, en une battaile mortele) in which ſort being mounted, he is to ride before the King in proceſſion to his Coronation, and to crie thrice to the people before all the world; That there is no man of high or low eſtate, who will ſay, that our liege Lord Richard, Couſen and heire of Edward, late King of England, ought not to be crowned King of England, againſt whom he the champion is not ready with his body to maintain, and will maintaine that he doth falſly lie as a Traitor. William de Latimer, and Iohn the ſonne and heire of Iohn Mowbray of Axholm, the Kings Ward, ioyntly petitioned at the ſame Court, to be admitted in the right of William Beauchampe of Bedford (whoſe Lands the King held in right of the ſaide Wardſhip, and William de Latimer in his owne right,) to haue the office of Almoner at the Coronation, and to enioy the Fees thereof. And becauſe in the redde Booke of the Exchequer it appeared, that the ſaide William Beauchampe, (late deceaſed) vſed the ſaide office; William de Latimer was there admitted, aſwell for himſelfe, as for the ſaide heire, to exerciſe the ſame, and for his Fee to haue the Siluer-platter of Almes which ſtood before the King as he ſate at the Table vpon that day; and if afterward it ſhould reaſonably appeare, that they likewiſe ought to haue an * Hogſhead of wine, they ſhould haue it.

William Bardolf ſhewed by petition (as all the reſt did) to the right noble, and right redoubted Lord, the King of Caſtile and Leon, Duke of Lancaſter, & Steward of England, that certaine of the ſaid William his Fee-ſimple Lands in his Towne of A. were holden of the King in chiefe by Serjeantie. The words of the petition, ſhewing the ſeruice, which we (fearing to erre) leaue for other to interpret, are theſe: De trouuer le jour due Coronnement noſtre treſredoubte Seigneur le Roy, vng homme de faire vne meſſe queſt appelle Dilgirunt, & ſi apponatur ſanguineum adonques il eſt appelle Creation of States.

(3) But the generall State of the Kingdome being implicated, before the late King Edwards deceaſe, by reaſon of that opportunitie and aduauntage to their deſignes, which the Neighbour-enemies of the Crowne of England found in the old age of that victorious Monarch, was now no leſſe entangled through the contempt of King Richards youth. For before his Coronation, the French with fiftie Ships (as Walſingham cals them) thruſt into the Hauen of Rie) the Towne whereof they rifled, and conſumed with fire. The Crowne of England was ſcarſe ſetled on his head, when the Scots at the other end of England ſet fire vpon the Towne of Rockesbrough: but the French (encouraged by their late exploit at Rie) arriued in their Gallies, and tooke the whole Iſle of Wight, the Caſtle (which Sir Hugh Tyrell manfully defended,) onely excepted, leuying vpon the inhabitants one thouſand Markes in lieu of ſparing their houſes from the rage of warre, and flame. Neither was it long before they landed at Winchelſey, though being from thence repulſed, they burnt the Towne of Haſtings at that preſent.

The firſt attempts of the French and Scots.

(4) Theſe petty braues thus giuen to the King, were farther fortunated with a little victory. For they, emboldened with ſuch ſucceſſes (diſhonourable and dangerous to King Richard, who ſeemed to haue loſt the Soueraigntie of the Engliſh Ocean, where Pyrates durſt ſo reuell, and alſo to haue had as little counſell, courage, or forces, left about him vpon the Land) come on Shore at Rotingdene in Suſſex. An.D.1378.

(5) The chiefe charge of affaires lay vpon the Duke of Lancaſter, the Kings Vncle, or vpon ſome ſuch as he did put about him, through whoſe want of care, things declining to a ſhamefull change, and the glorious atchieuements of the two late Edwards falling vnder Eclypſe, there was onely found one priuate Citizen of London, that (without regard to the enuy of the ſloathfull Lords, or his owne hazards, or of any thing elſe, ſo much as the good of his neglected Countrey) put his whole ſtrengths to ſupport the ſame. This was the worthy Iohn Philpot, who at his owne charges mans out a Fleete to the Sea, raignes by them therein, and guardes both water and land from their intollerable violences. Nor did his ſo great pietie fayle of happy euent, for God (who fauours all vertuous actions) had put into his hands within a ſhort ſpace 15. Spaniſh Ships fraught with rich Merchandize, which the right of warre made his, wherby his great charges were abundantly repayed. Let vs ſee his Statue erected now at laſt, with the Statues of Walworth, and other honourable Citizens in London.

The immortall deſerts of Sir Iohn Philpot Citizen of London.

(6) What therefore the loue of their Prince and Countrey could not ſtirre vp in the Lords, that very ſhame and indignation doe. There is conſultation had, and the King of Nauarre (an vnquiet ſubiect of the Crowne of France) morgageth the Hauentowne of Cheirbrough in Normandy to king Richard. The occaſion was the rather not omitted, for that, by thruſting into it a good Garriſon (which was forthwith done, and firſt Sir Robert Rous, then Sir Iohn of Harleſton, both worthy Knights, made Captaines there) the ſame would at all times ſerue to giue quiet entrance to an inuaſion of France which now was meditated.

(7) How looſely, the meane while, the affaires of the State and Iuſtice were managed, by reaſon of the vnripe yeeres of the King, may appeare by a bloudy outrage then perpetrated and vnreuenged. The occaſion this. In the warres of Spaine, (which Edward the late Prince of Wales made for reſtoring Peter to the Crowne,) the Earle of Dean was taken and adjudged Priſoner (from all others clayming that honour) to two valiant Eſquires Robert Haule and Iohn Shakel, who both of them belonged to that martiall Knight Sir Iohn Chandoys. They free the Earle, taking his ſonne and heire for aſſurance of performances. This young Gentleman (vtterly neglected hitherto by his diſhonourable Father,) was now demanded of them in the Kings name, by the Duke of Lancaſter, with a purpoſe (as was thought) the rather either to aduaunce thereby his (the ſaid Dukes) title to the Crowne of Spaine, or to make a peace there, with the better conditions. The Eſquires refuſe, and ſhift their Hoſtage out of the way; are thruſt therefore into the Tower of London; but eſcaping from thence, take Sanctuary in Weſtminſter. Thither with fifty armed men doth Sir Alan de Bruxhull ſecretly repaire, drawes Shakel by a wile out of the priuiledge of the Church, and expoſtulates the matter with Haule in the Kings name; vpon whom (proteſting againſt the abuſe offered to that Maieſtie in his tender yeeres, and freely taxing his Counſellours with injuſtice, auarice, and euill aduice,) while they ſought to lay hands, he with his ſhort ſword valiantly made them all flye off, but in the end they moſt wickedly murthered him in the Chancell: commending himſelfe, in his laſt words, to God reuenger of ſuch iniuries, and to the liberty of our holy mother the Church. With him was murthered a ſeruant of his, thruſt in with a Iauelin at the backe. This is that Haule whoſe body lies buried vnder a braſſe-plated ſtone in the Abbey Church at Weſtminſter, whoſe bloud (by the violence of the ſaid Duke) found not that fulneſſe of legall vengeance, which ſo hainous an homicide required.

The ſacrilegious murther of Robert Haule.

(8) The North parts of England were about this time greeuouſly viſited with the ſtroake of peſtilence, and their lamentable affliction encreaſed by the inroads and outrages of the Scots; who had now ſurprized Berwicke, killing Sir Robert Boynton Knight, Berwick ſurprized and recouered within nine daies.

Knight the Conſtable thereof; which yet the Earle of Northumberland vpon the ninth day after recouered by force, putting thoſe, who had ſurprized it, to the Sword.

An.D.1379. (9) Neither was the ſpirit of the Engliſh (after it began to re-quicken) idle elſewhere; for as Sir Robert Rous had diuers waies vexed the French, and taken Oliuer (the brother of that renowned Bertram de Glequin) priſoner, ſo Sir Iohn de Harleſtone, Captaine of Cherbrough after him, ſlew and took diuers French in a skirmiſh. Theſe the few fore-going drops of greater approaching ſhowers. For Sir Hugh Caluerley and Sir Thomas Percy, made admirals of the narrow Seas, tooke many rich prizes, and exploited ſundry other things very praiſeworthily, bringing home the acceptable newes of the diſlike which the Britons had conceyued againſt the French Kings Gouernment; for hee commaunded them to render vp to him all their ſtrengths, Caſtles, and walled Townes, and many of them, who refuſed to obey, he put to death.

The Britons diſlike of the French Gouernment: matter of new troubles.

(10) Theſe employments, and freſh deſignes for other like, found neede of pecuniary ſupplies; whereupon, in a Parliament holden at London, it was agreed, that for ſupply of the Kings wants, the Commons ſhould be ſpared, and the burthen be wholly vndergone by the able. The rates then of that taxe were theſe; Dukes, Archbiſhops, Earles and Biſhops at tenne markes each, mitred Abbots at as much, beſides fortie pence for euery Monke vnder their ſubjection. Briefly (ſaith Thomas Walſingham) there was no religious perſon, man or woman, Iuſtitiar, Sheriffe, Knight, Eſquire, Parſon, Vicar, or * Chauntry Prieſt free from this taxe rated according to the value of their yeerely receipts.

The Commons ſpared in the Subſidie.

* Simplex Capellanus. Walſingh.

(11) We formerly mentioned, how Iohn Shakell (the other companion of Robert Haulee, ſo execrably murdered in Gods-houſe) was taken. He now vpon condition that the King (beſides 500. markes in money) ſhould giue him Lands to the yeerely value of one hundreth markes, and ſhould alſo found and ſufficiently endow, at the Kings coſts, a Chantrie with fiue Prieſts for their ſoules, whom the Kings Officers had wickedly murthered, he rendred vp his Hoſtage, the eldeſt (but naturall) ſonne of the ſaide Earle of Dean. At the diſcouery and bringing-forth of whom, all men were ſtroken with wonderfull loue and admiration: for the young Gentleman (hauing giuen his faith not to diſcloſe himſelfe,) appeared in the ſhape of a baſe groome, in which (vnknowne to all the World but his Maſter) he had of his owne accord lurked. An example of ſuch a poynt of perfect honeſty as cannot be forgotten without injurie.

A memorable example of a noble yong gentlemans faith-keeping.

(12) The ſame yeere, the Lord Iohn Mountford, whom the French had driuen out, being inuited home by his Barons, returned into his Dutchy of Britaine, accompanied with the valiant Knights Caluerley and Percy aforeſaid, where he, his friends, and followers were receiued with ſingular honor. Soone after Sir Iohn of Arundell, brother to the Earle of Arundell, being ſent into Britaine to aid the Duke, was with many other valiant Knights and Eſquires drowned. It is imputed by our Author to a juſt effect of Gods anger againſt the ſaide Sir Iohn, and his houſhold, for their manifold vices and outrages, practiſed by him and them, before they ſet out from England, for which they had the bitter curſes of the people; and the Angell of deſtruction to execute thoſe imprecations vpon the delinquents.

Aids ſent into Britain drowned.

(13) But the action of aiding did more deepely import, then that it ſhould be abandoned for the loſſe of that vnfortunate fellowſhip, and the exceeding riches which were with them: therefore the Lord Thomas of Woodſtock earle of Buckingham, with Caluerley, Percy, Knols, Windleſhores (or Windſor) very valiant Knights, and other competent forces, was ſent to aſſiſt the Duke of Britaine. But becauſe the French Galleys houered vpon the narrow Seas, they landed at Callis, and from thence march through France, ſpoyling Countries, burning townes, the French not * daring to empeach them, and killing people, till they and their whole equipage came ſafe into Britaine.

Other aides pierce into Britaine from Callis by land.

An.D.1380.

* Io. Vill. in Chron.

(14) There were about theſe times ciuill diuiſions in France; for the Duke of Burgundie, younger brother of King Charles (lately dead) being made Guardian of the perſon and dominions of his Nephew Charles then in minority, had the Duke of Anion (being an elder brother to the Duke of Burgundie) a mortall enemie. Their bloudie quarrels fell out luckily for the Engliſh aydes in the Dutchie of Britaine, out of which as Duke Iohn had beene driuen for adhering to his father in law the late King Edward, ſo the Engliſh did their beſt to vphold him in it, as there was cauſe.

French troubles profitable to the Engliſh.

(15) The French in theſe extreames are releeued by their ancient diuerſion: for the Scots entring about that time with fire and ſword into Cumberland and Weſtmerland, and the forreſt of Inglewood, draue away much Cattle, ſlew the Inhabitants, rifled the booths and houſes of Perith in the Faire time, killing and taking many, and driuing away the reſt. The Earle of Northumberland preparing a bloudy reuenge, was (not without wonder) prohibited ſo to doe by letters from the King, that is, from ſuch as were about the King.

The Earle of Northumberland countermanded from purſuit of the Scots.

(16) But how coldly ſoeuer the publike affaires were followed, the want of money for ſupplies was ſtill pretended. And therefore in a Parliament holden at Northampton, was granted to the King a generall ſupply of money; the pretended occaſion of monſtrous miſchiefe which followed, by reaſon of a clauſe in that grant of Subſidie, that euery one of ech ſexe, being aboue a certain age, ſhould pay by the head, or per Pol as they call it, twelue pence.

The Parliament at Northampton.

(17) The Engliſh Cheualry began now againe to diſplay it ſelfe farre off, to gratifie the priuate ends of Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, who claimed the Crowne of Caſtile and Leon, in right of Conſtance his wife: For Iohn King of Portugal had a defenſiue warre againſt Iohn then King of Caſtile, who challenged the Crowne of Portugall * in right of Beatrix his Wife, (by whom he had no iſſue) the onely daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugal, which this other Iohn (a baſtard ſonne of Ferdinands) had by faction vſurped. There were ſent to his aide the Lord Edmund de Langley, Earle of Cambridge, the Kings Vncle, and ſundry Knights and others of good experience with an Armie. Theſe arriuing in Portugall valiantly defended the ſame for about two yeares, and were the chiefe cauſe of giuing the Spaniards an ouerthrow in battle, where they loſt * tenne thouſand men. At laſt the two Kings agreeing together bare the charges of conueighing home the Engliſh in common, that their Countries might be freed from them, being both alike jealous of their puiſſance. In this time Edward ſonne to the Earle of Cambridge, vncle to Richard King of England, married the daughter of the King of Portugall, but afterward neither would the Earle leaue his ſonne behinde, as ſuſpecting the Portugeſes faith, nor the other entruſt his daughter to the Earle, ſo as they remained diſioyned in body, howſoeuer vnited by Ceremonie.

An.D.1381. The Earle of Cambridge ſent with an Armie into Portugall.

* Polyd. Virg. hiſt. lib. 20.

(18) Not long after the time of that Earles imployment into Spaine, there fell out accidents which doe plainely conuince their error to be great, who thinke that any madneſſe is like that of an armed and vngouerned multitude, whereof theſe times (by a kind of Fate proper to childrens raigne) gaue a moſt dangerous document. The extreame hatred borne by the people to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, calling himſelfe King of Caſtile and Leon, and the diſcontentment taken at an extraordinary taxe, leuied per Pol, vpon all ſorts of people, who were aboue ſixteene yeers of age, which (as all other the euils of the time) they imputed to the Duke (the maner being to count them the authors of euils, who are ſuppoſed to haue the greateſt power of doing them) mooued the enraged enraged multitudes vpon ſlight and ſmall beginnings to runne together in ſo fearefull a Torrent, that it ſeemed the King and kingdome were ſodainely falne vnder their moſt wicked fury. There were in this moſt rebellious inſurrection, the Commons and Bond-men (who aſpiring by force to a free manumiſſion) principally thoſe of Kent and Eſſex, whoſe example was followed in the Neighbour-Shires of Surrey, * Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge, and other places by incredible heards and droues of like qualified people, who (ſpecially in Norfolke) forced ſundry principall Gentlemen to attend them in their madding.

* L.S.Alban.M.S.

(19) They of Kent embattelled themſelues vnder two Banners of Saint George, and about threeſcore and tenne Penons, vpon Black-heath by Greenewich, and from thence came to London, where, the generality of people inclining to them, they are maſters. The Priory of S. Iohns without Smithfield they kept burning for about ſeauen daies, and the goodly Palace of the Sauoy, belonging to the Duke, with all the riches therein, they conſumed by fire, in a kinde of holy outrage, for they threw one of their fellowes into the flame, who had thruſt a peece of ſtolne Plate into his boſome. The Rebels of Eſſex came to Lambeth, burnt all the Archbiſhops goods, and defaced all the Writings, Rowles, Records and Monuments of the Chancerie, as hauing a ſpeciall hatred to the Lawyers, little to their diſgrace, for that they ſhared herein with good men alſo, whom they hated. But their deſperate wickedneſſe extended it ſelfe beyond the ſpoyle of houſes and ſubſtance, laying bloudy hands vpon the moſt eminent and worthy men in the kingdome, for that they had diſſwaded the King to put himſelfe into their hands at Greenewich, where he talked with them out of his Barge, and thereby had their maine deſigne diſappointed. Simon Tibald Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, and Chancellour of England, a right worthy Prelate, and Sir Robert Hales a Knight of high courage, Lord Prior of Saint Iohns, and Treaſurer of England, with others, they without reſpect to the Maieſty of the King, or priuiledge of their moſt honourable dignities, moſt barbarouſly murthered by beheading them vpon Tower-hill, among infernall ſhoutes and diuelliſh yels. For the Tower it ſelfe (from whence they had haled them, the young King being there in perſon) was open to their execrable inſolencies. Neither doth the authority of * Polyd. Virgil, affirming that they were not haled forth, but onely ſtayed by the Rebels, to whom (hee ſaith) they were ſent, induce vs rather to credite him, then Authours liuing about thoſe very times. There was no little ſtore of other innocent bloud ſhed by them in theſe tumults. Nor was the Kings owne perſon without manifeſt perill, againſt whoſe life they had damnably conſpired. It were long to reckon vppe the kindes of ſuch villanies as they wrought, but endleſſe to recount the particulars. The common * Annals ſet forth this whole Tragicall buſineſſe very diligently.

Wat. Tyler the Idol of the Clownes.

(20) They had many Captaines of miſchiefe, but two principall, Wat Tyler of Maidſtone in Kent, (whom Walſingham pretily cals the Idoll of Clownes) and Iacke Straw, who together had followers to the number (as they were eſtimated) of about one hundreth thouſand, and at one Sermon made to them by Iohn Ball, Walſingham ſaith, there were about twiſe as many. Their Petitions were full of pride and malice, but eaſily graunted by the King, the neceſſity of the times extorting them. They had a Chaplaine as graceleſſe as themſelues, one Iohn Ball an excommunicated Prieſt, who with his wicked doctrine nouriſhed in them their ſeditious furies, to his own iuſt deſtruction in the end: but when a great multitude accepting the Kings mercy were gone, Wat Tyler and his Campe departed not, but vpon pretence of diſliking the Articles of peace, ſought to winne time till he might put into full execution his incredible Treaſons, which (as Iacke Straw at the time of his execution confeſſed) were vpon that very night of the day, wherein Wat Tyler was ſlain, to murder the King, and chiefe men, and to erect pettie Tyrannies to themſelues in euery ſhire: and already one Iohn Littiſtar a Dyer in Norwich; had taken vpon him at Northwalſham in Norfolke, the name of the King of the Commons, and Robert Weſtbroome in Suffolke, to whom Iohn Wraw another lewd Prieſt had aſſigned it.

(21) Neuer was the kingly race and Commonweale ſo neare to an vtter extirpation, as at this preſent, which was (wee may truely ſay) miraculouſly preuented. The yong King in theſe feares and dangers repairing to Weſtminſter, moſt deuoutly commended his Crowne, Life, and whole eſtate to God, nor that in vaine. For Wat Tyler with his Campe of Raſcals eſteemed to be ten or twenty thouſand (according to the Kings Proclamation, attending in Smithfield, but cauilling of purpoſe vpon the conditions of peace, as hee that meant a farther miſchiefe, though they of Eſſex were returned) was entreated to ride to the King, who alſo ſate on horſebacke before Saint Bartholmewes, in whoſe company was that renowned Lord Mayor of London, William Walworth, with many other men of birth and place.

(22) Wat Tylar ſcarſe at the laſt comming, behaued himſelfe ſo inſolently, offering to murther one of the Kings knights, Sir Iohn Newton, for omiſſion of ſome punto of reſpect, which he arrogated to himſelfe in more then a kingly manner; was (vpon leaue giuen him by the king) boldly arreſted with a drawn weapon by the Lord Maior, a man (ſay Writers) of incomparable courage, which blow was ſeconded by the ſaid Lord, and others, ſo ſpeedily, that there this prodigie of a Traitour was feld and ſlaine. A death too worthy, for that he dyed by the ſwords of honourable perſons, for whom the axe of an Hangman had beene far too good.

(23) The Commons perceiuing the fall of their Captaine, prepared to vſe extreme reuenge, when the moſt hopefull yong King with a preſent wit and courage (it being for his life and kingdome) ſpurred forth his horſe, and bad them follow him, without being grieued for the loſſe of a ribauld and traitour, for now he himſelfe would be their Captaine. Hereupon they thronged after him into the field, there to haue whatſoeuer they deſired. But the moſt worthy of all Londoners, Walworth, ſpeedes with one man onely into the Citty, raiſeth a thouſand Citizens in armour, brings them (being led in good array by Sir Robert Knolles and others) with Wat Tylers head (which the Lord Maior had commanded to be chopt off from his dead carkaſe) borne before him vpon a Speare to the King. That very head, the curſed tongue whereof had dared to ſay, That all the lawes of England ſhould come out of his mouth.

(24) This act reſtored the Crowne (as it were) & Realme to king Richard, for the Rebels ſeeing themſelues girt-in with armed men, partly fled, partly fell vpon their knees, and (throwing away all hope in weapon) they anſwerably to their baſeneſſe, begged their liues, who, but euen now reputed themſelues Maſters of the field, and of the King. And albeit there was a generall deſire in the hearts of loyall men to expiate ſo many villanies with the bloud of the Actors, yet things abroad in the Realme being as yet vnſetled, they had a generall Charter of pardon ſealed, and were ſo ſent home into their Countries.

(25) Certainely although the Cittie of London (the moſt noble and able part of the Engliſh Empire) hath otherwiſe deſerued of the Kings of this land very well, yet the honour of this ſeruice worthily ſtands higheſt in the many great praiſes therof. Which the King did thankefully and publikely teſtifie by knighting Walworth, and by beſtowing vpon him (when he modeſtly excuſed his vnworthineſſe and and in-abilitie) one hundreth pounds land by the yeare in fee-ſimple. Hee alſo at the ſame time beſtowed the ſame honour vpon that right worthy Citizen and Patriot, Sir Iohn Philpot, and two other Aldermen, Sir Nicholas Brember, & Sr. Robert Launde, to each of which he gaue a like eſtate of 40. pounds. There be who write that hee then alſo knighted Nicholas Twiford, and Robert Gayton Citizens. The memories of theſe and other ſuch, deſerue and ought to be honoured with ſtatues, aduanced in the moſt conſpicuous place of that great Citie, leaſt otherwiſe ſhee be holden ingratefull to them, from whom ſhee deriues ſo honourable ſplendor. That the beauteous Armories of London were at this time augmented with that weapon which we ſee in the dexter Canton thereof, in remembrance of this ſeruice done by Walworth is affirmed by * ſome, but with what warrant let themſelues ſhew.

* Holinſhead. in Richard. 2.

(26) The young King, after this fortunate concluſion giuen to ſo helliſh vproares about his principall Citie, repaired in good array to * Tower Royall, or the Queenes ward-robe, a Palace then in the boſome of London. There the Queene-mother had remained in very great feare and griefe for the ſpace of three daies, and two nights; but the ſight of her ſonne, and relation of his good ſpeed, blotted out of her memory the ſorrowes formerly ſuſtained.

* Survey of London.

(27) It was not long, but that the King (ſurpriſed before with that popular innundation) had ſure notice that the diuelliſh rebels were in all other places diſſipated, but neither till themſelues had done much miſchiefe, and ſuffered iuſt puniſhment. Memorable was the ſeruice of Henry le Spercer the ſtout Biſhop of Norwich againſt the Bondmen and Peſants of Norfolke, whom he draue out of their Trenches, ſlew diuers, and cauſed their muſhrom King Iohn Litteſtar to be hanged, drawne and headed. But that which vniuerſally moſt of all preuailed to the reduction of theſe audacious wretches to due obedience, was the death of Wat Tyler, and the certaine newes of their diſſipation who were aſſembled about London, where for a few daies they had moſt barbarouſly tyrannized. In Hertfordſhire at S. Albans, Barnet, &c. in Suffolke, Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle of Elye the popular outrages were now in a manner appeaſed. Yet wonderfull is it, that all theſe execrable furies, being in ſo many ſeuerall places, with ſo great forces in each, (for at Bury, where Iohn Weſtbroome kinged it, they are reported to haue beene about fifty thouſand, making it their ſauage ſport, to cauſe the heads of great perſons, which they had cut off and fixed on Poles, to kiſſe and whiſper as it were one in the others eare) laſted not in the high ſpeed and full rage thereof the ſpace of eight dayes, (being not long before Midſommer, as if it had been a ſyderall infection or generall Lunacy) and the whole time thereof from the beginning to the end, is accounted, by Act of Parliament, but from the firſt of May till Midſommer, the Feaſt of Saint Iohn Baptiſt.

Statut. An. 6. Rich. 2. Seſſion 1. cap. 13.
The royall power like the Sun after a long darkneſſe puts forth it ſelfe againe.

(28) The royall power which had thus beene foilde, and trodden vnderfoote, could not longer brooke ſo intollerable debaſement, but to repaire and eſtabliſh it ſelfe, there was proclamation made, that all men who had horſe and armour, and loued the King, ſhould forthwith come to London in their beſt manner. There were neuer ſeene together ſo great a multitude of horſe-men in England. The muſters were taken vpon Black-heath, where the king himſelfe, being mounted on a goodly courſer among the armed men, and hauing his Standard royall aduanced before him, daily rode forth to view his people, reioycing to bee ſeene among them, and acknowledged their Lord. It is ſaid, that within three dayes ſpace there appeared vpon that heath for the Kings ſeruice, not fewer then forty thouſand horſemen moſt brauely appointed.

Forty thouſand Engliſh horſemen in field together.

(29) This force had beene employed againſt the Kentiſh-men, euen to the vtter rooting out of all the guiltie, who againe began to ſtirre, but that the King was perſwaded by the Nobility and Gentlemen of that Countie, to proceede by ordinarie iuſtice; which was done. The Kings peace was alſo proclaimed in euery place according to his letters dated at London 17. Iune, in the fourth yeare of his reigne, to the great encouragement of good ſubiects, and confuſion of the wicked. There were executed about one * thouſand and fiue hundreth in all places, beſides fiue of a new forlorne Companie; which hauing deſperately dared to gather head againe in Eſſex about Billericai, had tendered to the King certaine inſolent demaunds, which were iuſtly reiected, and they ſlaine. The Lord Thomas of Woodſtocke, Earle of Buckingham, the Kings Vncle, with Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Count Northumberland, were ſent with force againſt them. The Rebels being many in number, were notwithſtanding broken at the very firſt with a Charge made vpon them by a rancke in front of ten men of Armes or Lances. There were taken eight hundreth horſes belonging to the Rebels. Sir Robert Treſilian was principall Actor in the matters of Iuſtice, which hee rightly and ſeuerely adminiſtred. The King himſelfe had ſo great a force of horſe-men with him, that (as Sir Walter at Lee knight, ſaid in his ſpeech to Saint Albans-men) there was neither graſſe nor blade of Corne, old or new, left within fiue miles compaſſe of the Kings perſon.

* Holinſh. in Rich. 2.

(30) And leaſt the miſchieuous multitude ſhould, to the Kings diſhonour and common hurt of the Church and Kingdome, enioy any the leaſt benefit by their late vnſpeakeable villanies; the King, by aduiſe of his Councell, ſent letters reuocatorie into the Shires about, by which he commands, that no man ſhall enioy any freedome or profit by vertue of any extorted graunts, during the time of the Inſurrections: but yet that his Maieſties purpoſe was by the aduiſe of his Councell to grant to his ſubiects (notwithſtanding their ſo heinous treaſons) ſuch mercy as ſhould bee pleaſing to God, and profitable to him, and to the Kingdome. After which, ſundry executions were done at Saint Albans, and elſewhere. And this end for the preſent had theſe infernall attempts of the baſer people, in which we may cleerely behold the hideous face of Anarchie and Plebeian furie.

All grants of pardon and manumiſſion reuoked.

(31) Which fearefull conuulſion in this State, ſome imputed to Gods wrath on this Land for the generall coldneſſe and neglect of their duties in the chiefe Prelates of the kingdome; others to the great vices, and irreligious tyrannies of the great ones; others to the abounding ſinnes of the common people. But * our Author iudgeth, that the full heape of thoſe cauſes of Gods vengeance, was made-vp by the begging Fryars, who (ſaith he) to purchaſe wealth, contrary to their owne Oaths, did ſooth the great men in their vices, and nouriſhed the vulgar in their errours, feeding on the ſinnes of both: calling good euill, and euill good, ſeducing Princes by flatteries, and the common ſort with lies, carrying both headlong with themſelues aſtray. For their outward profeſſion of truth they haue ſo defiled with their wicked life, as that it is now in euery mans mouth a good Argument, holding in matter and forme; This is a Fryar, Ergo, a lyar; euen as true as to ſay: This is white; Ergo, it is colour'd.

* Walſ. in Rich. 2. pag. 266.

(32) The Duke of Lancaſter, at the firſt breaking forth of theſe Rebellions, was vpon the borders, about ſetling of a truce with the Scots, who therefore did ſhut vp the matter ſpeedily before the Scots had any intelligence, ſetling a two yeares abſtinence from Hoſtilitie. The Scots (though they were ſorrie that by the peace ſo concluded, they had loſt an opportunitie of making a dangerous impreſſion vpon the Engliſh,) vnderſtanding the Dukes perill, offred him twentie thouſand men to defend his honour, but he loyally refuſing that, they gaue him leaue to come and goe at his pleaſure with all other rites of ſacred Hoſpitality.

Humanity of the Scots toward Iohn Duke of Lancaſter in his greateſt dangers.

An.D.1382. An. Reg. 5. Walsingham begins the yeare at Christmas day inclusiuely.

(33) After Christmas King Richard tooke to wife the Lady Anne, daughter to the Emperour Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus King of Bohemia, called Emperour; which Lady by the Duke of Tassill, was in the name of her said Father, formerly promised and assured vnto him, as one whom the King did specially affect, though the daughter of Barnabas Duke of Millaine was also offered with a farre greater summe of gold. Shee was with great pompe and glorie at the same time crowned Queene, by the hand of William Courtney (a yonger sonne of the Earle of Deuonshire) Bishop of London, lately promoued from London to the See of Canterbury. The Nuptials and Coronation of the beauteous Queene being, the Parliament (which by this great Ladies arriuall was interrupted and prorogued) began againe. Where many things concerning the excesse of apparrell, transportation of Coine, &c. were wholesomely enacted. Sed quid iuuant Statuta Parliamentorum? &c. but to what purpose (saith Walsingham) are Acts of Parliament, when after they are once past, they take no manner of effect? For the King with his priuate Councell, was wont (saith he) to change, or abolish all things, which by the whole Commons and Nobility of the kingdome had in former Parliaments been agreed vpon.

(34) Neuertheless, it was then prouided, that such as had done any thing in their owne defence against the Rebels, or to their suppression, without the ordinarie formes of processe in law, should sustaine no dammage thereby, but for euer bee as cleare as if they therefore had enioyed their particular pardons; and that all releases, feoffements, and other acts done in the late rebellions, (during the hurling times, for so they were called) by way of constraint or duresse, should be vtterly voide.

The hurling times.

(35) With the good liking of this Parliament, Sir Richard Scrope Knight, was made Chancellor of the Realme, and Sir Hugh Segraue Treasurer; but it was not long before the Chancellour, denying to passe such large gifts vnder the Great Seale; as the King in his youthfull humor had imprudently granted, therewith to gratifie his still crauing Courtiers, fell into the Kings vndeserued displeasure. For albeit he alledged important causes of such his deniall, (as, that the King was greatly in debt) and therefore such largesses were fitter to be imployed in discharging some of his Creditors, that knowing how the King was intangled with Creditors, such crauers were not truely well affected to him, as regarding their owne priuate auarice more then the Kings profite, or the publike wants; that those selfe-same crauers had formerly receiued such gifts of his Maiestie, as were (at least) answerable to their deseruings; and that himselfe, if he should seale those grants (made in the Kings childhood) was like to haue small thankes of him, when hee should come to riper iudgement; yet thereupon he was twice or thrice willed to send the Seale to the King, who comming in person surrendred the same, with such like words, That hee would alwayes be loyall and true to his Maiestie, but neuer beare any office vnder him againe. Not long after which surrender, Robert Braybroke Bishop of London was made Chancellor in his place. This act of the Kings was displeasant to the whole Realme, and one of the first things by which hee fell into dislike, it being among the infelicities of King Richard, that those times were too full of sower and impatient censors, for a Prince of so calme a temper, and as yet vnseasoned yeares.

Tho. Walsingh.

An.D.1383. (36) Henry le Spenser the warlike Bishop of Norwich, being drawne on by Pope Vrban to preach the Crusado, and to be Generall against Clement (whom sundry Cardinals and great Prelates had also elected Pope) hauing a Fifteenth granted to him for that purpose by Parliament, (after strong * opposition of almost all the Nobles who resisted this businesse of the Crosse) went with forces into Flaunders to support the cause of Vrban against the Antipape; from whence after he had performed sundry things very happily, taken Graueling, Burbrough, Dunkirke by assault, and beene victor in a set battell against thirty thousand abettors of Clements claime, he was enforced to returne, as destitute of those farther succours which were expected out of England. But the King vpon pretence that he had not obeyed his royall mandate, by which he required him, (before hee transported) to returne, for a while seised vpon all his temporalities.

* Tho. walsing. pag. 297.

(37) But K. Richard hauing before giuen the realme discontentment, by remouing Scrope from the Chancellorship, encreased the same by some manifest signes of leuitie and prodigality toward Strangers, then which nothing makes a Prince lesse pleasing to the English: for, in the progresse which with his beloued Queene he made to Bury, Thetford, Norwich, and other places, gifts were taken on all hands by the king, and they againe through the Queene were powred forth to enrich her Bohemians.

The Kings enrichment of the Bohemians displeasant.

(38) Iohn Duke of Lancaster embrakt himselfe for France, where hee concluded a truce to endure betweene the two Nations English and French, from the present Christmas till Midsommer. At his returne, he and his brother Thomas of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, went with an Armie into Scotland, to reuenge the breach of truce: but as it seemes by some, the Duke had rather an hoast of men, then an hostile minde; for hee so ordered the matter (as not forgetfull perhaps of curtesies shewed to him in his late dangers, when the Commons were out in Armes,) that the Scots hauing had time inough to withdraw both their goods and persons, and his army suffering farre more losse by penurie and cold, then it could inflict vpon the enemy, returned * fruitlesse and inglorious.

An.D.1384.

* Iohn Stow.

(39) Not long after his returne, he was encountred with a more capitall and dangerous enemy, then those in Armes: for a certaine Carmelite Fryer, by birth an Irishman, deliuered to the King (in the time of Parliament at Salisbury) a writing, which contained therein a heinous accusation of the Duke of Lancaster, that he had conspired to murther the King, & to crowne himselfe. The accuser discouered the day, place, and other circumstances, to induce a beliefe of the pretended intention, and tooke his oath vpon the Sacrament, which that day he had receiued, that no one word in that scroll was vntrue. The Dukes Apologie and fauour with the King, preuailed aboue the accusers confidence; whervpon the Fryer is committed, at the Dukes request, to the Lord Iohn Holland (the Kings halfe-brother by his mother) and a day appointed, wherein the accuser was to shew a cause of his crimination.

The Duke of Lancaster accused of highest Treason.

(40) But in the night which next fore-went the designed day, the said Lord Iohn Holland (if a man may beleeue, that a thing so villanous could be done by men of honour) and one Sir Henry Greene knight, are reported to haue trussed vp the Fryer in a cord by the necke, and parts of generation, laying vpon his breast a stone of great weight to breake the chine of his backe; and that they also scorcht the soles of his feet. By which miserable and quadruple manner of death, without triall or conuiction, (as also without * recantation of any thing which hee had vttered against the Duke) he is said to haue breathed his last. Neither was his death smothered, for the next day they caused his strangled carkase to bee dragged through the City, that it might not be thought hee had perished vniustly. But the Lord Thomas of Woodstocke (the same who was afterward Duke of Glocester) went farther, for hee rushed into the Chamber where the King was, and bound his words with a "terrible oath, That hee would kill any one liuing "who durst lay treason to his brothers charge; neither did hee except the King himselfe: In which speeches, as piety and zeale for his brothers honour and safety were not wanting, so certainely duty to his Prince was exceedingly forgotten.

* Iohn Stow.

(41) That

(41) That which followed, may giue vs iuſt cauſe to ſuſpect the truth of that Fryars accuſation: for the Lord William la Zouch was alſo by the Fryar accuſed, of hauing beene the Inuenter, broacher, and prouoker of him, to ſet downe all that which was comprehended in the accuſation; who therevpon ſent for to Salisbury (though then very ſicke of the gowte) repaired thither in a Horſe-litter, where hee was compelled to anſwere to all ſuch poynts as were obiected, like a Felon, or a Traitour, ſtanding bare-headed: but the priuitie, or leaſt thought of any ſuch matter as the Fryar affirmed againſt the Duke, hee confidently forſware, and was therevpon acquitted and diſmiſſed. Howbeit (ſaith Walſingham) La Zouch was from that time forward a profeſſed enemie, not onely of Carmelites, but of all other orders of Fryars whatſoeuer. But theſe diſgraces came vnſeaſonably vpon the Duke, whoſe head was vndoubtedly full of deſignes, and of cares, how to atchieue to himſelfe the crowne of Spaine.

(42) There were then ſundry incurſions made by the Engliſh and Scots, each into the others Countrie, the Earle of Northumberland being leader to the Engliſh, with little aduantage to either. But to take away the very cauſe of this continuall bad neighbourhood, or to leſſen it by an eſtabliſhed peace with France, the Duke of Lancaſter ſailed to Callis, about the beginning of Auguſt, there to treate with the Duke of Berrie, on behalfe of the young French King Charles 6. but after he had in that voyage expended (as was ſaid) fiftie thouſand Markes, he brought into England nothing backe, except onely a truce, to continue till the firſt day of May next. His deſire to haue procured a ſurer peace both with the French and Scots, ſeemes to haue beene great, that ſo hee might the more freely purſue the conqueſt of Spaine which he intended.

John Cumbertowne, once Lord Maior of London, confined and confiſcated.

(43) Whiles hee was abſent in this Ambaſſage, there enſued the arraignement of a great fauourite of the Dukes, Iohn Northampton, alias, Comberton, whom his aduerſaries by-named Cumber-towne. This man is by them reported to haue exceedingly troubled the Citie of London, during his late Maioralty there, nor leſſe afterward; for that being followed with many abettors, hee publikely diſturbed Sir Nicholas Bramble his ſucceſſor, (but a * bloudy minded man by report,) and wrought other maſteries, till Sir Robert Knowls cauſed one of the buſieſt companions to be drawne out of his houſe, and (as ſome ſay) ſhortned by the head. This Comberton was by his houſhold Clerke accuſed, as priuie to ſome practiſes, in preiudice as well of the King, as the Citie; and when ſentence was to be pronounced in the kings preſence (being then with great ſtore of his Nobles at Reading,) hee durſt (as is ſaid) affirme, That ſuch iudgement ought not to proceed againſt him in the abſence of his Lord the Duke. This again vnraked the burning coales of enuie, and ſuſpition againſt the ſaid Lord Duke; and perhaps malice to the Duke procured this hatred againſt his fauourite. Whereupon hee was confined to the Caſtle of Tyntagel in Cornwall, and all his goods ſeiſed vpon by the Kings Seruants, whom Walſingham expreſſeth, by calling them after the name of thoſe Poetical rauenous Birds, Harpyes.

Polydor. Virgil. not to be raſhly beleeued.

(44) That here which Polydor Virgil (aſſigning cauſes to actions, not alwayes ſuch as are, but ſuch as ſeemed to him moſt probable, not ſeldome confounding and changing perſons, times, names, and things) tells vs, concerning a combate within liſts, betweene Sir Iohn Anſley Knight, and one Carton hath little ground, (ſo farre as we can find) in hiſtory. He ſaith they were teterrima capita, both very wicked men, and that there was a real plot to murther the king. We can neither find the crime nor the men: there had beene a ſolemne combate long before, betweene ſuch a Knight and one * Katrington an Eſquire, in which the Knight was Challenger and victor, but the crime was not treaſon againſt the Kings perſon, nor for any thing done in his time, but in his noble Grandfathers. Neither was Anſley, teterrimum caput, but a valiant and loyall man of Armes. The crime which he obiected to that Eſquire (his kinſman) was, that for money he had traiterouſly giuen ouer the Caſtle of Saint Sauiour, in the Land of Conſtantine in Normandy, when he had ſtore of victuall and munition. The Eſquire was vanquiſhed in faire fight, and dyed franticke the next day. Polydors errour therefore is ioyned with manifeſt wrong to the Knights name, wherein we ought to be very circumſpect, for that, honour is ineſtimable and deſcendeth to poſterity. There was indeed at the time he ſpeakes of, another combat, fought alſo within liſts before the king, (for Duels then were performed, not on priuate choiſe or quarrell, but on publike appointment) betweene one Iohn Weſh an Eſquire of England, and one * Martilet a Gentleman Nauarrois, who in reuenge againſt Welſh, for hauing at Cheirbrough (where the ſaid Eſquire was vnder-captain) committed (as Martilet ſaid) adultery with his wife, accuſed him of high treaſon againſt the King and Realme. But Welſh preuailed; and the Nauarrois, at his execution (for hee was * drawne and hanged after he had beene foild in battell,) confeſſed the cauſe of his euill will, and the innocency of Welſh in the matter of treaſon.

(45) The Scots had this while by practiſe and money gotten the Caſtle of Berwicke, whereof the Cuſtody belonged to the Lord Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland. The Duke of Lancaſter was not ſad at this, but ſo purſued the matter, that the Earle (as if by his negligence and priuity the ſame royall Caſtle had been loſt) was condemned in Parliament. But the King relieued him with extenſion of fauour. This was a great cauſe of confirming the rancour already kindled in the hearts of theſe two principall Peeres. But the Earle to wipe away all blemiſhes of diſgrace, encloſeth the Caſtle with a ſiege both of force and large proffers, ſo that after ſome time ſpent therein, he had it re-deliuered vpon paiment of two thouſand markes.

Hatred increaſeth betweene the Duke and Count Northumberland.

(46) The Flemmings had heretofore in the fift yeere of this King, ſent Ambaſſadors at the time of Parliament, to ſubmit themſelues and their Country to his Dominion, renouncing alleageance to their naturall Lord the Earle, whom they had by force of Armes expelled, vpon pretence of oppreſſion vſed by him, and for other cauſes; but becauſe they ſeemed not either perſons ſufficient, or ſufficiently inſtructed with authority, to tranſact with the King in a matter of ſo high nature, they were commanded to returne, and fetch more ample power, and to bring certaine men of euery good Towne in Flaunders. Now againe, the Citizens of Gaunt, though they had in battell againſt the French King, (who was there in perſon on behalfe of the Earle,) * loſt twenty * thouſand men not long before, deſired of K. Richard, that they might haue an Engliſh General to command in their warres; to whom was ſent a wiſe and valiant Gentleman, the Lord Edward le Bourſer, who demeaned himſelfe in that charge with much commendation. But when afterwards he went more abundantly and ſtrongly to haue ſupported them, they ſodainly turned French, ſhewing Se neſcire (ſaith * Walſingham) vni amico, vel domino, fidem diu ſeruare.

(47) The Duke of Lancaſter (whoſe, or the like greatneſſe may perhaps ſeeme more then can ſtand with the narrow limits of England, which, without danger to the Common-wealth, can hardly affoord ſuch a proportion of eſtate to any Subiect) was about this time enformed, that the King had a purpoſe to arreſt his perſon, and to trie him vpon capitall poynts before Sir Robert Triſilian, his Chiefe Iuſtitiar, a man ready, (vnder the Kings protection) to deliuer iudgement without reſpect to Titles. The King was nouriſhed in this * deliberation by young men, who combined againſt the Dukes life. This being diſcouered, the Duke (a potent Prince) withdrawes vpon his guard to his Caſtle of Pomfret in the the North; neuertheleſſe the hopes of wicked men, delighting in their Countries miſeries, and ciuill combuſtions, were made voide by the great diligence of the Kings mother, the Princeſſe Ioan, who ſpared not her continuall paines and expenſes, in trauailing betweene the King and the Duke, (albeit ſhe was exceeding tender of complexion, and ſcarce able to beare her own bodies weight through corpulency) till they were fully reconciled.

(48) It had indeed beene a moſt wretched time for a ciuill warre, not onely becauſe the French Admirall, Iohn de Vienna, had beene ſent with forces, embarckt in threeſcore ſaile of Ships, to be employed out of Scotland againſt the Engliſh, but for that the French prepared a generall inuaſion of England, hauing in hope already as it were deuoured it. There reigned at that time in France, Charles the ſixt, a yong and fooliſh Prince, (ſaith Tillius) who hauing in his treaſurie, left to him by his prudent Father, * eighteene millions of Crownes, (and not onely eighteene hundred thouſand, * as ſome, fearing perhaps that the other ſumme might ſeeme incredible, haue written,) and being moreouer ſet on fire with an inconſiderate loue of glory, rather then vpon any ſound aduiſe (though * ſome impute the Counſell to the ſaid Admirall) would needs vndertake the conqueſt of our Countrey. Theſe newes ſtirred all the limbes and humours thereof, though the euent (God not fauouring the enterprize) was but like that of the Mountaine, which after long trauaile brought forth a ridiculous Mouſe, neuertheleſſe it had beene a moſt deſperate ſeaſon for a ciuill warre to haue broken forth in England.

(49) The preparations of the French doe hold notwithſtanding, and the generall Rendeuou of their huge forces was at Sluſe, in the Port whereof, and other places about, there were aſſigned to aſſemble for their tranſportation, * twelue hundreth ſaile of ſhips. At the ſame time (as if the two young Kings had beene riuals in ſhew of men) Richard raiſeth ſo great an Army to ouer-runne Scotland, as the like for beauty and number was neuer ſeene together, conſiſting wholly of Engliſhmen. But may we beleeue that England could ſpare three hundreth thouſand men, and as many horſes for the vſe of a warre? Certainely a needleſſe multitude, but onely to terrifie the French with the fame; for there might haue beene fewer, for any great Act which Richard (full of iealouſie againſt his Vncle of Lancaſter, wherewith his head and heart were full,) effected. But wee may the rather beleeue the account, for that Walſingham voucheth * Serueants at Armes (if he meane not Heralds by thoſe words) whoſe office (hee ſaith) it was to number the Hoaſt, and they affirmed the ſame. This is ſure, that * among other the arguments vſed by the Duke of Bury (one of the French Kings Vncles) to fruſtrate this enterprize, he alleaged, that the King of England had muſtred ten thouſand Horſemen, and one hundreth thouſand Archers for his defence; whereas the Admirall Iohn de Vienna affirmed, that hauing ſeene the forces of the Engliſh, they were but eight thouſand horſemen and threeſcore thouſand foot; and he might well ſay hauing ſeene: for, though Æmylius bring him in ſpeaking to the French King, and vaunting that hee had encountred them, yet nothing is truer, then that the Engliſh returned out of Scotland without the leaſt offer of battell. The Admiral was willing indeed to haue fought, but when hee ſaw our Army from the hil-tops, his fury gaue place to reaſon.

(50) While the Armie was vpon the way toward Scotland, the Kings halfe-brother the Lord Iohn Holland, wickedly ſlew the Lord Stafford, ſonne to the Earle of Stafford, not farre from Yorke, being vpon his iourney to the Queene, whoſe fauoured Knight hee was. For which heinous homicide the King ſeiſed vpon his whole eſtate, denying to his Mothers moſt earneſt prayers any pardon or grace for his Brother. Which was to her ſo greeuous, that within fiue or ſixe dayes after ſhe gaue vp the Ghoſt at Wallingford. The young Lord tooke Sanctuary at Beuerley, and the King by his iuſtice herein wanne the hearts of the ſaid Earle of Stafford, the Earle of Warwicke, the Lord Baſſet, and other great men of Staffords kindred and friends; neither did this empeach at all the preſent voyage.

(51) The Scots and French in Scotland, ſeeing themſelues vnable to withſtand ſuch forces, had ſo retired themſelues and all their goods, that when the Engliſh ſhould come, they, (as Walſingham pleaſantly ſaith) could ſee no quicke things left but onely Owles. That which was greene in the fields, the horſes deuoured or trampled downe, yet ſuch harme, as the materials of buildings were capable of, was done. Edenburgh alſo and the * noble Abbey of Mailroſſe were fired. The Duke of Lancaſter perſwaded the King to march beyond the Frith or Scottiſh Sea (as his great Anceſtors had done) to ſeeke out his enemies; but he, very ſuſpicious that the Duke gaue him this counſell with a purpoſe to betray him to deſtruction by famine, and want, which hee was there to looke for, expreſſed much diſpleaſure and returned. The Dukes words notwithſtanding and behauiour were tempered with much duty and modeſty; but that would not ſerue, till the Lords peeced their affections together by interceſſion in the beſt manner the time would ſuffer. But the Engliſh hoaſt was ſcarce returned and diſcharged, when the Scots and French ſodainely powred themſelues forth vpon our Countrey, and did whatſoeuer hurt the ſhortneſſe of time in their incurſion could permit.

(52) To reſiſt and endammage the French, there were appointed Admirals for the narrow Seas, the Maſter of Saint Iohns, and Sir Thomas Piercy knight, (the Earle of Northumberlands Brother,) who did nothing worthy their fame or place. Onely the Townesmen of Portſmouth and Dart, maund forth a few ſhips at their owne perill and charge, wherewith entering the riuer of Seine (vpon which the renowned Cities Roan and Paris are ſituated) ſuncke ſome of their enemies ſhips, tooke others, and among them one of Sir Oliuer de Cliſſon's, the goodlieſt that France had. The ſucceſſe anſwered their hopes, and they were enriched with the ſpoiles of their aduerſaries, whom thus they compelled to beare the charge of their proper miſchiefe.

(53) Meane-while that the French lay at Sluſe, attending the approach of their kings vncle the Duke of Burie, (who fauoured not this enterprize of inuaſion, but ſought * aſwell by delayes, as by perſwaſion and authority to make it fruſtrate,) they of Gaunt had gotten the Towne of Dam, by the good liking of the Inhabitants, to whom the French gouernment was odious. For recouery whereof, the French King drew his army (prepared againſt England) to the ſiege of Dam, which (the ſame being firſt ſecretly abandoned, after a moneths ſiege and many repulſes giuen to the French) was by him recouered. This, and other things, did ſo protract the great expedition intended, that (after waſt of infinite treaſure) Charles returned home, without hauing ſeene England, which was by theſe meanes moſt graciouſly freed by God from ſo dangerous, and greatly-feared an impreſſion. But that the Engliſh might the better endure the ſame, Iohn King of Portugall, hauing lately in a great and bloudy battell (where ſome of the Engliſh deſerued well of him,) ouerthrowne the Caſtilians, and thereby ſetled his eſtate, ſent into England ſixe Galleys throughly well appointed, for Sea-ſeruice, though (as God would) there was no neede of them.

(54) Of thoſe French, which (after the Cloude of warre at Sluſe was diſperſed into ayre,) paſſed ouer-land into their Countries, many were taken and ſlaine by the Gauntiners. Their Nauie was not leſſe vnfortunate; for at one * time the Engliſh of Callis tooke of them eighteene; and the rage of weather

The attempt of the Laity to diſpoſſeſſe the Clergie of their temporall eſtates.

(55) The multitude of memorable things which preſent themſelues to vs in the liues of our Engliſh Monarches, is ſuch, that if we did not vſe choiſe, and in their relation breuity, we ſhould not relieue our Readers of that moleſtation, with which the vaſte volumes of former labours doe oppreſſe the memory. The Laity, at the Parliament now holden at London, had yeelded to aide the King with a Fifteenth, vpon condition, that the Clergie ſhould ſuccour him with a Tenth and an halfe; againſt which vniuſt proportion, William de Courtney, Archbiſhop of Canterbury moſt ſtifly oppoſed; alleadging that the Church ought to be free, nor in any wiſe to be taxed by the Laity, and that himſelfe would rather die then endure that the Church of England, (the liberties whereof had by ſo many free Parliaments, in all times, and not onely in the raigne of this King been confirmed) ſhould be made a bond-maide. This anſwere ſo offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, and ſome Peeres of the land, with extreame fury beſought, That Temporalities might be taken away from Eccleſiaſticall perſons, ſaying, that it was an Almeſdeed and an Act of Charity ſo to doe, thereby to humble them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition which they had exhibited to the King would take effect. Hereupon they deſigned among themſelues, out of which Abbey, which ſhould receiue ſuch a certaine ſumme, & out of which, another. I my ſelfe (ſaith a * Monke of S. Albans) heard one of thoſe Knights confidently ſweare, that hee would haue a yearely penſion of a thouſand Markes out of the Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the King hauing heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to ſilence, and the Petition to be razed out, ſaying, Hee would maintaine the Engliſh Church in the qualitie of the ſame ſtate or better, in which himſelfe had known it to be, when hee came to the Crowne. The Archbiſhop hereupon hauing conſulted with the Clergie, came to the King, and declared, that he and the Clergie had with one conſent, willingly prouided to ſupply his Maieſties occaſions with a Tenth. This grant the King tooke ſo contentedly, as he openly affirmed he was better pleaſed with this free contribution of one Tenth for the preſent, then if he had gotten foure by compulſion.

(56) Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford (a young Gentleman in ſpeciall grace with the King) was at this Parliament created Marqueſſe of Dublin in Ireland, which mooued great deſpight againſt him, thoſe rough times being impatient to beare the vnequall aduancement of fauourites. Neuertheleſſe, though the gentle King was thought heerein to pleaſe his owne fanſie, rather then to reward merite, yet did hee ſo ſweetly temper it, as there was no iuſtice, nor reaſon to enuie to him that ſolace which hee tooke in his friends encreaſed honour; for at the ſame time hee aduanced two of his Vncles, Thomas of Woodſtocke, Earle of Buckingham, to the title of Duke of Gloceſter, & Edmund of Langley Earle of Cambridge, he created Duke of Yorke, allotting ſeuerall proportions of penſion to bee paide out of his Exchequer. In Vere there was ancient Nobility to iuſtifie his new degree the better; but in making the Lord Chancellor Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, with the yearely penſion of 1000. Markes, was matter of more enuie; becauſe he was not deſcended of ſuch honourable Parents: a defect (if it bee a defect) which none more willingly vpbraid to men of worth, then who themſelues are not alwaies the moſt worthy. The firſt raiſer of this family of De la Pole was Edward the third, who made William de la Pole, of a braue Merchant, a * Knight Baneret, and gaue him great poſſeſſions, in requitall of an extraordinary and voluntary loane of treaſure, aduanced by him to ſupply the King in a time of ſpeciall neceſſity, when money could ſtand him in more ſteed then a thouſand men of Armes: no little merite in a ſubiect, nor a ſlender reward of a moſt munificent Prince.

(57) Henry Spenſer the martiall Biſhop of Norwich found grace with the King at this Parliament, to be reſtored to his temporalties, at the ſpeciall ſuite of Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Ely: whiles the Biſhop of Ely thus beſought his Maieſty of Grace, the ſaid Michael de la Pole (Lord Chancellour, and Earle of Suffolke) ſtood by, and brake out with much offence into theſe words. What is that (my Lord) which you aske of the King? Seemes it to you a ſmall matter for him to part with that Biſhops temporalities, when they yeeld to his Coffers aboue one thouſand pounds by yeere? Little need hath the king of ſuch Counſellors, or of ſuch friends, as aduiſe him to acts ſo greatly to his hinderance. Whereunto the Biſhop of Ely not leſſe truely, then freely replide. What ſaith your Lordſhip, my Lord Michael? Know that I require not of the King that which is his, but that which hee (drawne thereunto either by you, or by the Counſell of ſuch as you are,) with-holds from other men, vpon none of the iuſteſt titles, and which (as I thinke) will neuer doe him any good: as for you, if the Kings hinderance bee the thing you weigh, why did you ſo greedily accept of a thouſand Markes by yeare, at ſuch time as he created you Earle of Suffolke? The Chancellour was hit ſo home with this round retort, that he neuer offered any further to croſſe the reſtitution of the Biſhops temporalities.

(58) After this the King being with his Queene at their manour of Eltham in Kent, there came thither Leo King of Armenia, a Chriſtian Prince, whom the Tartars had expelled out of his Kingdome. The pretence of his negotiation was to accord the Realmes of England and France; that the Princes thereof might with ioynt forces remoue the common enemy from Chriſtendome. Therein he could effect nothing, but his iourney was not otherwiſe vnfruitfull to himſelfe, for King Richard (a Prince, to ſpeake truely, full of honour and bounty) gaue him beſides a thouſand pounds in a * ſhip of gold, letters Pattents alſo for a thouſand pounds yearely penſion during life.

* Ypod. Neuſt.

(59) The time now was come, wherein King Richard ſhould ſee himſelfe deliuered of all that feare and iealouſie, which the greatneſſe of his Vncle the Duke of Lancaſter ſtirred in him. His Forces were now ready, and his Nauy (encreaſed with * ſeauen Gallies and eighteene ſhips ſent out of Portugall) attended at Briſtoll, to tranſport him toward Spaine, (for Caſtile is high Spaine) the Crowne whereof hee claimed in right of Conſtance his ſecond wife, daughter of Don Peter the cruell. Before hee ſet forth, the newes came that ſuch Engliſh as were already in Portugall, with their friends, had ouerthrowne the Spaniards, French, and Britons, at a battell in Spaine. This was a ſpurre to quicken the Dukes enterpriſe, which Pope Vrban the ſixth (by granting plenary remiſſion of ſinnes to all ſuch as gaue the Duke ayde) did ſpecially fauour, as againſt them who did partake with his enemy the Antipape; * but the frequent grant of ſuch pardon & releaſment, was now growne ſo vile and contemptible amongſt the people, that few were found open handed towards this Cruceato. Admirall of this Fleet was Sr. Thomas Piercy, Sr. Iohn Holland (who had married one of the Dukes daughters, afterward created Earle of Huntington) was Conſtable of the hoaſt, & Sr. Iohn Mereaux (who had to wife one of the Dukes illegitimate Children) was one of his Marſhals. There were in this noble and excellently-well appoynted Armie, the Lords, Talbot, Baſſet, Willoughby, Fitz-walter, Poynings, Bradſton, Fitz-warren, (60) It was now the moneth of May, when the great Duke of Lancaster comming to take leaue, had of the Kings gift a Diademe of gold, and his Dutchesse of the Queene another: hee also commanded the English to call, and hold his Vncle for a King, and to doe him answerable honour. But after all this, hee lay for a wind so long, till his whole prouisions were almost spent; at length yet, hee set forward. The first land they touched was neere to Brest in Britaine, where Sir Iohn Roch, the Gouernour against the French, complained of two Forts built about him to empeach his quiet egresse; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster caused them to be assaulted; so both of them being taken by surrender, were razed to the ground, though some English first lost their liues, among which was, * Sir Robert Swinarton, a valiant Knight of Staffordshire, and Iohn de Bolton a couragious Esquier of Yorkeshire, whom the sodain ruine of a Tower (ouerturnd by mining) whelmed and slew out-right. Sharpned with the successe of this victorie, they commit themselues to God, and the Sea, and prosperously arriue with the whole Fleet in the Port Corone, or the Groyne, * in August.

(61) The French (belike) thought England could not furnish another Armie for France, as she had for Spaine: whereupon there was now no false nor vaine rumor spread againe, that the French would besiege Callis. The King to secure that pretious transmarine part of his Dominions, sent thither store of men and of all prouisions. The most eminent person was Henry Lord Piercy, Sonne to Henry Earle of Northumberland. This was hee whom the Scots by-named Hotspur, a young Gentleman, in whom (saith Walsingham) the patterne of all vertue and martiall prowesse shined: and indeed his nature did answer his by-name; for he made such ridings into the quarters about Callis, that they could neuer wish a worse Neighbour. After which, when the fame went that the French King would not delay, or (as they call it) beleaguer Callis, but rather inuade England, hee returned to bee present where the greatest danger was expected. At this time, the English Seamen of warre, brought two French prizes to Sandwich, in which was taken a part of an huge strong Timber-wall, which the French King, preparing now for Englands inuasion, had caused to bee built in length three miles, in height twenty foot, which had at euery twelue paces a Tower (ten foot higher) and each capable of tenne men, the whole to be a defence for the French encampments against our shot, and a shelter for theirs, there was also in the same Ships the Enginer and Master-workeman, who was an Englishman and great quantities of powder, and store of Ordinance, together with the French Kings * Master-Gunner.

The Lord Henry Piercy by-named Hotspur, sent to Callis.

A Parallelization of the English and French States in these times.

(62) There was in this time a great resemblance betweene England and France in the chiefe poynts of State. As England had Richard, so had Fraunce her Charles, both young Kings. Charles with an huge armie had prepared to inuade England, but did nothing: Richard with no lesse forces entred Scotland, and did no great thing. Richard had Vncles which bare great sway in the Realme; so had Charles. Richard had his Vncle Iohn more potent then the rest; Charles had his Vncle Lewis. Iohn vpon his Wiues title claimeth the kingdomes of Castile & Leon; Lewis by the gift of Ioane the Queene, claimes the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicil. Lewis went with an Army of * thirty thousand horse into Italy to atchieue his claime; with what force Iohn set forth you haue heard. But Lewis died without obtayning; Iohn preuailed so farre as to settle his childe by marriage. The King and great Lords of France were glad (with any charge) to enioy the absence of Lewis, and Richard & his fauourites were not sad, that the Realme was for the present rid of Iohn.

* Paul. Aemyl.

(63) The forces of the French prouided for this inuasion of England, were reported in open Parliament (which the King held about Michaelmas in London) to consist of * 15. Dukes, 26. Earles, two hundreth Lords, and an hundreth thousand Souldiers, and a thousand Ships, assembled about Sluse, with full purpose to take reuenge of all the euills which the English nation had formerly wrought in France, and to destroy the English Kingdome. But though these reports were not fained, (for the French attended nothing in a manner but a faire gale of winde to bring them,) yet could not the King, without Capitulations made by the Duke of Glocester, obtaine any aydes of money; so that, whereas it seemed to the King, that by the Duke of Lancasters departure, hee was become more free, yet had hee left behinde, spirits much more stiffe and intractable. O deare Countrey, hadst thou not then beene apparantly in Gods protection, (for the French hauing stayd for a winde till Hallon-tide, and then hauing it halfeway, were beaten backe, and the voyage made vtterly voyd) certainely thy ruine had then beene certaine. What shall we thinke or say of those popular Lords, by this gentle King armed (to his owne bane) with power and greatnesse, who vnder the specious pretext of reforming abuses, did satisfie their enuie and inbred insolencie?

* Ypodig. Neustr.

(64) The King tels them, that England is, as they saw, in manifest danger, and prayes their succour in money: what is the answere? That the Duke of Ireland (for now the Marquesse of Dublin was made a Duke,) and Michaell at the Pole (so they scornfully called the Earle of Suffolke) and other, must be remoued. Things are baldly carried at home, say they; (and they perhaps said truely,) but where was now the care of our Countrey? God indeed turned from vs the mercilesse poynt of the French sword: but here began the seedes of innumerable worse miseries, neuer to be remembred without sighes and teares.

The first seeds of the ciuill wars.

(65) The seeds (we say) of those fearefull calamities were then first here sowne, whose summe a flourishing * Writer in our age (willing neerely to haue imitated Lucan, as hee is indeed called our * Lucan) doth not vnfortunately expresse, though hee might rather haue said he wept them, then sung them; but so to sing them, is to weepe them.

But Robert de Vere, saith Thomas Duke of Glocester and his party, was vnworthily created Duke of Ireland, and De la Pole the Lord Chancellour seemed to the onely great Lords (for so they would seeme) to be in the Kings debt. Strange colours for Subiects to capitulate with their King; vpon giuing their ioynt aides against the common enemie, now ready with one destruction to ouerwhelme them all. The time they tooke to worke this pretended amendment in state, was not well fitted. It sauoured of somewhat else besides the loue of Common-weale. Priuate ambitions and passions could not be wanting in such oppositions. This is some mens iudgement, let the sequels shew how iust.

(66) There were called vp at this Parliament for defence of the Realme innumerable people out of all Shires, which forces lay about London with n twentie miles round, and had no pay but liued vpon ſpoyle. Theſe at laſt were licenſed to depart to bee ready at warning. There was alſo the Lord Chancellour accuſed, of (we wot not what) petty crimes (for the abuſes of following ages haue made them ſeeme ſo,) as for paying to the Kings Coffers but * twenty markes yeerely, for a fee-farme, whereof himſelfe receiued threeſcore and tenne, and ſome ſuch other. To pacifie theſe great Lords, the Lord Chancellour is diſgraced, and the ſeale taken from him, againſt the Kings will, and giuen to Thomas Arundell Biſhop of Elye, and then the houſes of Parliament yeelded to giue halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth, but vpon condition that it ſhould bee diſpoſed of, as the Lords thought fit, for defence of the Realme. The money was thereupon deliuered to the Earle of Arundell to furniſh himſelfe, for that purpoſe, to the Sea. But to rid the Duke of Ireland out of the Realme, the Lords were willing he ſhould haue thoſe thirtie thouſand Markes, for which the heires of Charles of Bloys, (who heretofore challenged Britaine) were tranſacted to the French, vpon condition that the ſaid Duke ſhould paſſe into Ireland before the next Eaſter.

* Tho. Walſingh. in Rich. 2.

(67) The Parliament was no ſooner diſſolued, but the King recals the Earle of Suffolke to the Court, keepes both him, the Duke of Ireland, and Alexander Neuile Archbiſhop of Yorke about his perſon, in greater fauour then before. Inſomuch that at Chriſtmaſſe he made De la Pole to ſit at his owne Table, not in the vſuall garment of a Peere, but Princely robed. Surely therein not well; for ſome of thoſe great Lords, (though not by ſo ſweet meanes as were fit) did deſire to waken him out of Courtly drowſineſſe, and (as men that knew not what peace meant) to put him into actions worthy of his name and greatneſſe. Theſe other perſons were not ſo friended, or qualified, that they could ſupport a King againſt an vniuerſall miſlike. But the King vpon a ſtomacke doth it; ſo that (ſaith * Walſingham) here firſt grew the Kings hatred againſt the Peeres, that from thence-forth hee neuer (as it is ſaid) regarded them but fainedly. So much more dangerous ſometime is the remedy then a very greeuous malady.

* Ypod. Neuſtriæ.

(68) King Richard (whoſe age and place ſtood in need of wiſer inſtructions) not thus contented to haue whetted the diſpleaſures of the greater Peeres, as if hee had ſaid to himſelfe, Rumpatur * quiſquis rumpitur inuidiâ; is further drawne, as was ſaid, to plot the death of his Vncle, Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloſter, and other enemies of De la Pole; who together being inuited to a feaſt (by the bloody deuiſe of Sir Nicholas Brambre late Lord Maior of London) ſhould together haue periſhed. But the preſent Lord Maior Nicholas Exton (whom the conſpirators would haue had their Partaker, if it may be beleeued) honeſtly refuſed to aſſent. The Lords hereupon hauing admonition, refrained to come.

(69) The perſons which were in the publike enuie for their ouer-ſwaying grace with the King, were (as you haue heard) Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, the ſaid Archbiſhop, Sir Simon Burley Knight, and Sir Richard Stury: Theſe men hearing that Richard Earle of Arundel, and Thomas Earle of Nottingham Marſhall of England, * had encountred with a great Fleet of Frenchmen, Flemmings, Normans, and Spaniards, and taken aboue one hundreth ſaile of ſhips, and in them nineteene thouſand Tunnes of wine, depraued the victory, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed were but Merchants, whoſe loues had beene more profitable to our Country, then ſo to ſtirre them to inexorable hatred. But theſe (ſaith * one) who thus iudged, were rather the *Knights of Venus then Bellona, fitter for a Canapy then a Campe, for language then a lance, as they who were awake to diſcourſe of martiall actions, but drowſie when they ſhould come to doe them. Such therefore conuerſing with the King (not * without ſuſpition of foule familiarity) neuer tooke care to put into his mind any matter which beſeemed ſo potent a Prince, we ſay not (quoth our Authour) as concerning the vſe of Armes, but not euen concerning thoſe very recreations, which moſt of all become great ſpirits, as hunting, hawking, and the like.* But the Earles did more then meddle with Merchants (who yet were able to make dangerous reſiſtances) for they landed at Breſt in Britaine, and with great difficulty deliuered it againe from ſo bad neighbours as the two wooden Forts neerely built, where the other had ſtood, one of which they fired, and the other they mand with the Engliſh Garriſon of Breſt. Then ſtuffing it with all ſorts of prouiſions for a yeere, & furniſhing the wants of the Souldiers with all neceſſaries, they returned, hauing worthily wonne the loue and praiſes of the people. Which, as they were alſo due to them from the King, yet comming to his preſence, they (by theſe mens euill offices) had ſo cold entertainment, as they eſtſoones with-drew themſelues from Court to liue quietly vpon their owne at home. After them the braue young Henry Hotſpur, Lord Percy was ſent (ill prouided) to the Sea; neuertheleſſe hee ventred, and returned (when his commiſſion was expired) with honour.

The malignant conſtruction made of the Earle of Arundels ſeruice.

(70) One thing done by the Duke of Ireland, was ſurely full of wickedneſſe and indignity. For he hauing to wife a young, faire, and noble Lady, and the Kings neere kinſwoman, (for ſhee was Grandchilde to King Edward by his * daughter Iſabel,) did put her away, and tooke one of Queene Annes women, a Bohemian * of baſe birth, called in her mother-tongue Lancecrone. This intollerable villanie offered to the blood royall, King Richard did not encounter; neither had the power, ſome ſay, who deemed that by witchcrafts and ſorceries (practiſed vpon him by one of the Dukes followers) his iudgement was ſo ſeduced and captiuated, that hee could not ſee what was honeſt or fit to doe. But where Princes are wilfull or ſloathfull, and their fauorites flatterers, or time-ſeruers, there needs no other enchantments to infatuate, yea, and ruinate the greateſt Monarch.

(71) The Duke of Gloceſter tooke the matter more to heart, reſoluing to bee reuenged for the infamy and confuſion, which was brought thereby vpon his noble kinſwoman. Meane-while the King, as if hee meant to conduct his deare friend the Duke toward Ireland, went with him into Wales. There the King deuiſeth with him, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Treſilian, and others, (who were equally affrayd of the Lords) how to deſtroy the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Derby, Nottingham, and ſuch others, as from whom they thought fitte to bee cleare. Much time being trifled thus away in Wales, they come together (as if the Dukes appoynted voyage, or ratherbaniſhment into Ireland, were quite forgotten) to the Caſtle of Nottingham, there more freely to deliberate. A fearefull eſtate of a Monarchie. Hee among a few, generally ill-beloued, and ill-aduiſed, and ill-prouided; for their whole ſtrength was the King, and theſe emulations made that force feeble both to him and them: the Lords, potent, martiall, rich, and popular; he at Nottingham, they not neere him, but abroad farre-off: the Duke of Lancaſter with the flower of the Engliſh forces, and mighty neighbours, watching for the ruine of all. The courſe agreed vpon by the King and that ill-choſen Senate, was firſt to haue the opinion of all the Chiefe Lawyers concerning certaine Articles of Treaſon, within whoſe nets and ſprindges they preſumed the reforming Lords were; and if the Lawyers (who ſeldome faile Princes in ſuch turnes) did conclude, that thoſe Articles contained treaſonable matter, then vnder a ſhew of iuſtice they ſhould be proceeded againſt accordingly. Theſe Lawyers (who were the very men, which in the laſt ſeditious Parliament, gaue aduiſe to the Lords to doe as they did) now meeting, were demanded, whether by the law law of the Land, the King might not disanull the Decrees of the last Parliament: they joyntly * answered; he might, because he was aboue the lawes: confessing, that themselues had in that Parliament decreed many things, and giuen their judgement, that all was according to law, which now they acknowledged to be altogether vnlawfull. The King thus enformed, appointeth a great Councell to be holden at Nottingham, and sent for certaine Londoners, some of them such as were beholding to the King for mercie in cases of attaindour, to be there empanelled for Quests of Inquirie. The Sheriffes of Shires (being questioned) denied, that they could raise any competent forces against the Lords, their whole Counties were so addicted in their fauour: and being further willed to suffer no Knights to be chosen for the Shires, but such as the King and his Councell should name, they answered, that the election belonged to the Commons, who fauoured the Lords in all.

(73) The Duke of Gloucester (sadded with these newes) sent the Bishop of London to bring his purgation vpon oath to the King, who inclining to credite the same, was in an euill houre diuerted by De la Pole. The Duke makes his and their common danger known to the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, & Derby, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lancaster. They seuerally gather forces, that vnited they might present their griefes to the King, who to keep them from joyning, sends the Earle of Northumberland to arrest the Earle of Arundel at Reygate in Surrey, where he abode. But by reason of Arundels power, it was too dangerous a worke. Northumberland returnes, and Arundel (admonished by the Duke of Gloucester of his farther perill) escapeth in post to Haringey, where the Duke and Earle of Warwicke had store of people.

(74) As yet no bloud was drawne. Peaceable men procured that the Lords should repaire safe to Westminster, and there be heard. Thither approaching they are aduertised by the Bishop of Elie and others (who had sworne on the Kings behalfe for good dealing to be vsed during the Interim) that, at the Mewes by Charing-Crosse, a thousand armed men (which without the Kings priuitie Sir Thomas Triuet and Sir Nicholas Brambre Knights, were reported to haue laide for their destruction) attended in ambush. The King sweares his innocency, but the Lords come strong and trust no longer. The King royally adorned keepes state in Westminster-Hall with many his Prelates and Peeres about him; the Lords present themselues vpon their knees, and being required by the Bishop of Elye the Lord Chancellour (for the Lord De la Pole neuer had that place againe) why they were in warlike manner assembled at Haringey Parke, contrary to the lawes, their joint answere was, That they were assembled for the good of the King and kingdome, and to weed from about him such Traitors as he continually held with him. The traitors they named to be, Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuile Archbishop of Yorke, Michael at the Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Tresilian that false Iustitiar (quoth they) and Sir Nicholas Brambre that false Knight of London. To proue them such, they threw downe their gloues, as gages of challenge for a triall to be had by the Sword. The King hereunto replied, as knowing that they were all hidden out of the way: This shall not be done so, but at the next Parliament (which shall be the morrow after Candlemas) all parties shal receiue according as they deserue. And now (saith he) to you my Lords; how or by what authority durst you presume to leuy force against me in this land? did you thinke to haue terrified mee by such your presumption? haue not I men of Armes; who (if it pleased me) could enuiron, and kil you like cattle? Certainely in this respect I esteeme of you all no more, then as of the basest scullions in my Kitchens. Hauing vsed these, and many the like high words, he tooke vp his vncle the Duke from the ground, where all this while hee kneeled, and bad all the other rise. The rest of the conference was calme, and the whole deferred till the next Parliament, then shortly to be holden at Westminster. In the meane time (that the World might see how little able the King was to equall his words with deedes) a Proclamation is set forth, in which the King cleareth the Lords (before any trial) of treason objected, and names those persons for vnjust accusers, whom the Lords had before named.

The popular Lords bold answer to the King.

The Kings reply.

(75) The factious Lords neuertheless thought not good to seuer themselues, but to keepe together for feare of the worst, which fell out to their aduantage; for the Duke of Ireland (with the Kings priuity) had gathered a power in Wales and Cheshire, which they intercepting neere to Burford and Babblake, slew Sir William Molineux leader of the Cheshire-men, and some others, and made the Duke to flie in great feare. Among the spoyles of the Dukes carriages there were found (as the Diuell would haue it) certaine letters of the King to the saide Duke of Ireland, by which their counsels were plainely discouered. The Lords hereupon march with speede vp to London, hauing an Armie of about fortie thousand men. The King shuts himselfe vp in the Tower, but is glad before long to admit them to his presence. There they (vnreuerently inough) object mutability to him and his vnderhand workings; they objected also, that hee had secretly practised to flie with the Duke of Ireland into France, and to deliuer vp to the French Kings possession Callis, & such pieces as the Crowne of England held in those parts: to proue which dishonourable act, they (as some write) produced the French packets intercepted. This wrung teares (perhaps of disdaine) from the King, and hee yeelded to come to Westminster vpon the next day, there to heare and determine farther. The King in signe of amitie stayed his Cosen the Earle of Derbie (the same who afterward dethroned him) to supper. O where was the courage of a King? The Lords in their owne quarrell could draw vp fortie thousand men, but in the generall danger of the Realme, when the Commons were vp, and the French hung ouer their heads, with no lesse hatred then preparations, no such numbers appeared. Was it for their honour or praise, that their most rightfull King should by their violence be driuen to consult vpon flight out of his proper Kingdome? The City of London was also in no little perill at this present by their accesse, which drawne by just feare was contented to open the gates and harbour the Lords and their partakers. These Lords, who so often are called here the Lords, are named in our * Statute Bookes to be but these fiue; The Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of Derbie, Arundell, Warwicke and Marshal.

The Lords charge the King with sundry matters.

(76) The next day, he would haue deferred his repaire

repaire to Weſtminſter. This being ſignified to the Kings Lords (for ſo they might be called, as being more Maſters then the King) they labour not, by humble words, and dutious reaſons to perſwade the vſe or neceſſity of his preſence in that place, but contrary to their allegiance, and all good order, ſend him word; That if he came not quickly, according to appoyntment, they would chooſe them another King, who both would, and ſhould obey the counſell of the Peeres. They had him indeed amongſt them, whom (belike) they euen then meant to haue ſurrogated, that is to ſay, the before-ſaid Earle of Derby, heire to the Duke of Lancaſter. The Lords certainely had ſo behaued themſelues towards the King, that they well ſaw they muſt be maſters of his perſon and power, or themſelues in the end periſh.

The rough and harſh behauiour of the Lords.

(77) The King (after a prepoſterous and inuerted manner,) attending his Subjects pleaſures at Weſtminſter, heauily and vnwillingly is drawne to diſclaime Alexander Neuil Arbiſhop of Yorke, the Biſhops of Dureſme and Chicheſter, the Lords Souch and Beaumont, with ſundry others. Neither was the Male-ſexe onely ſuſpected to theſe curious pruners; the Ladie Poinings, and other Ladies were alſo remoued, and put vnder baile to anſwere ſuch things as ſhould be objected. Sir Simon Burley, Sir William Elinham, Sir Iohn Beauchampe of Holt, Sir Iohn Salisbury, Sir Thomas Triuet, Sir Iames Berneys, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, & Sir Nicholas Brambre knights with certaine Clerkes were apprehended, and kept in ſtraite priſon, to anſwere ſuch accuſations (what if meere ca'umniations?) as in the next Parliament at Weſtminſter ſhould be objected?

Perſons remoued from about the King.

(78) The Parliament began at Candlemas, where the King was vnwillingly preſent: The firſt day of the Seſſion, all the Iudges, Fulthorp, Belknap, Care, Holt, Burgh, and Lockton, were arreſted as they ſate in Iudgement on the Bench, and moſt of them ſent to the Tower. The cauſe alledged was, that hauing firſt ouer-ruled them with their counſels and directions, which they aſſured them to be according to law, they afterward at Nottingham gaue contrarie judgement to that which themſelues had fore-declared. Triſilian the chiefe Iuſtice preuented them by flight, but being apprehended, and brought to the Parliament in the fore-noone, had ſentence to be drawne to Tyburne in the after-noone, and there to haue his throat cut; which was done accordingly. Sir Nicholas Brambres turne was next. This Brambre (ſaith Walſingham) was ſaid to haue imagined to be made Duke of new Troy (the olde ſuppoſed name of London) by murthering thouſands of ſuch Citizens, (whoſe names he had billed for that purpoſe,) as were ſuſpected of likelihood to reſiſt him. Then Sir Iohn Salisbury, and Sir Iames Berneys two young Knights, Sir Iohn Beauchamp of Holt, Steward of the Houſhold to the King, and Iohn Blake Eſquier, were likewiſe ſacrificed to reuenge. Sir Simon Burley only had the worſhip to haue but his head ſtrucken off. Loe the noble reſpect which the gentle Lords had to juſtice and amendment. This was no age (we ſee) for a weake or ſloathfull Prince to ſit in quiet; for now the people, and then the Peeres, foyle and trample the regall authoritie vnder foote: the Duke of Ireland, the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, had their eſtates confiſcated to the Kings vſe by Act of Parliament, as in the * booke of Statutes may be ſeene, together with a great part of the whole proceedings.

(79) Theſe troubles boiling and burning within, in the Bowels of the State, the Scots abroad had opportunity to inuade the North of England, vnder the conduct of Sir William Dowglaſſe, a noble young Knight, a parallel and riuall in the honour of Armes to Henry Hotſpur, Lord Piercy, whom Hotſpur, fighting hand to hand ſlew in battell: but the Earle of Dunbar comming with an exceſſiue number of Scots, tooke Hotſpur and his brother priſoners, killing many Engliſh, not without ſuch loſſe to themſelues, that they forthwith returned.

(80) But theſe vnneighbourly hoſtilities ſoone after found ſome ſurceaſe, there being a meeting at Callis betweene the Engliſh and French, about eſtabliſhing a peace: and albeit, becauſe the French would haue the Scot and Spaniard included therein, the concluſion was deferred, yet ſhortly after it was reſolued vpon for three yeeres, the Scots being comprehended therein.

(81) King Richard (being now of age) declares himſelfe free to gouerne of himſelfe, without either controlment, or helpe of any other then ſuch as he ſelected to that place, and in token that he was at liberty, he takes the Great Seale of England from Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Yorke, (Alexander Neuil being attainted and fled) and departs out of the Councell-Chamber: After a while hee returnes, and giues it backe to William Wickham (the *renowned Biſhop of Wincheſter) who was vnwilling to haue accepted the ſame. Hee alſo puts out ſundrie Officers, ſubſtituting ſuch others as beſt liked him. From the Councell-Table he remoued his vncle Thomas of VVoodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter, the Earle of VVarwicke, and others; which (as it might) encouraged the Dukes enemies about the King, to doe euill offices betweene them. Yet the King did not preſently credite what was whiſpered into his eare, concerning a purpoſe ſuggeſted to be in the Duke, to raiſe forces againe; but acquainting him withall, was ſatisfied. Neuertheleſſe, he would not ſuffer the Duke to purſue an orderly, or any, reuenge vpon the Authors, whom indeede it had beene wiſdome to haue puniſhed in an exemplary manner.

The King declares himſelfe to be of age, and takes the gouernment vpon him.

* He was founder of the two famous Colledges in Oxford and Wincheſter.

(82) Michael de la Pole late Earle of Suffolke, (whom the popular Lords had made moſt odious to the Engliſh) died at Paris in exile, bequeathing ſuch goods as he had there to Robert Duke of Ireland, who alſo breathed out his griefes in baniſhment, and died at laſt in Brabant.

(83) The Duke of Lancaſter the meane while, returnes into Gaſcoigne out of Spaine, and not long after into England. The ſucceſſe of that voyage (being made to claime the Crowne of Caſtile and Leon) was briefly this. Iohn King of Caſtile * alledged that Conſtance the Dukes wife was not right heire, but he. For, albeit the Lady Conſtance was eldeſt daughter and heire to Peter ſonne of Alfonſe, whoſe father Ferdinand the fourth, was ſon of Sanchez the fourth, and the ſonne of Alfonſe the tenth, all Kings of Spaine ſucceſſiuely; yet, that neither Conſtance, Peter, Alfonſe, Ferdinand, nor Sanchez had the right. His reaſon was; for that Alfonſe the tenth, (choſen Emperour of Almaine) had, before he begat the ſaid Sanchez, an elder ſonne, called Ferdinand de la Cerda, who married Blanch the daughter of S^t. Lewis King of France, from whom deſcended Alfonſe de la Cerda (who entituled himſelfe King, but died without iſſue) and Ferdinand, who had a daughter married to Iohn, ſonne of the Infant of Portugall Emmanuel, mother to the Lady Ioane, wife of King Henry the ſecond, father of Iohn King of Caſtile defendant.

(84) This Apologie, made by the Caſtilian, would not ſerue; for Kingdomes are not vſed to be pleaded for by Bill and Anſwere. The Engliſh and Portugals ioyne their forces. To the Duke (by reaſon of his wiues preſence,) many did voluntarily ſubmit themſelues, all did not; for Don * Aluarez de Perez, on the behalfe of his Lord the King of Spaine, offered to ſtop the Duke in his march to Burgos, and was ouer-throwne. Other aduentures that warre afforded, but ſickneſſe hapning in the Engliſh Army, conſumed * many of the principall, and among them the Lord Fitzwalter, with other Lords, Knights, Eſquires, and men of armes, almoſt three hundreth. Moreouer, the penurie was ſuch, that ſundry reuolted to the enemy to get relieſe, which being * ſeene of the King of Portugall, hee told the Duke he would ſet vpon them as Enemies, but hee ſaid no, for that he knew they did it onely for lacke of of foode. Thus hauing ſaide, he held downe his head, as he ſate on horſe-backe, and wept moſt bitterly, ſecretly powring forth his prayers to Almighty God, and moſt humbly beſeeching mercy. From which time forward his affaires in Spaine ſucceeded happily.

The Duke of Lancaſter in his diſtreſſe calleth vpon God, and is heard.

(85) The warres had beene * ſharpe and teadious, but the end acceptable. For Don Iuan King of Caſtile, a Prince of no euill conſcience, ſeeing the right which the Duke of Lancaſter vrged, and foreſeeing what calamities might happen hereafter, (if as was feared the French ſhould match with him) ſought and obtained a firme peace. The Principall conditions were: That the Lord Henrie, his ſonne and heire, ſhould marry the Lady Katherine, daughter and heire to the Duke and Conſtance his Wife; That the Lord Henry (during his fathers life) ſhould be called Prince of Auſtria, and Katherine his wife Princeſſe: That * for default of iſſue betweene the young Princely couple, the Crowne ſhould come to the Lord Edward Duke of Yorke, who had married the other Daughter of King Peter. That the King of Spaine ſhould lade * eight Cars with wedges of gold for the Duke, or (as *ſome write) pay two hundreth thouſand nobles, toward the defrayment of the Dukes huge charges; That finally, he ſhould giue ſufficient Caution for an Annuitie of * ten thouſand pounds, during the liues of the ſaide Duke and Dutcheſſe, to be duly paid to their vſes at the Citie of * Bayon in Gaſcoigne.

(86) The King, at ſuch time as the Duke of Lancaſter returned, was at Reading, whither he had commaunded the Peeres to repaire. To that meeting the Duke makes haſte, aſwell to preſent his dutie to his Soueraigne, as to be an authour of loue and peace betweene the King and Lords, againſt ſome of whom the King was not thought to be verie fauourably diſpoſed. Which he gratiouſly effected, as ſeeming to addict his minde to offices of pietie and publique benefit. Certainely the wiſdome and moderation of the Duke of Yorke his brother, were ſuch, in all the late, and other tumults, that he is not ſo much as once named among the factious; which Chriſtian ſpirit if it had raigned in all the reſt, England had neuer beene polluted with ſuch infinite bloud ſhed of her nobleſt Children; neither had the goodly fabricke of State, laden with innumerable trophees, ſalne vnder that moſt hideous Chaos, which ſucceeding ages ſaw and ſighed for.

(87) The King vpon the Duke of Lancaſters returne, whether he felt the keeping of Aquitaine an vnprofitable burthen, or the abſence of his vncle the Duke, a thing worthie to be purchaſed at any rate, certaine it is, that in a Parliament held at London, he veſted in him that famous Dutchy, by deliuering the Cap of State, and Ducal Rod; whither he ſhortly went to take poſſeſſion. His ſonne, Henrie of Bullingbroke Earle of Derbie, loath to ſpend his houres in ſloath, but deſirous to purſue renowne by martiall Acts in forreine parts, ſayled ouer to the warres in Pruſſia, where in ſundry enterprizes againſt the Lithuanians, he wan great honor, which, by compariſon of King Richards calmneſſe, prepared a way for him in the Engliſhes affections, to poynts more eminent.

(90) The King declaring his purpoſe to croſſe into Ireland, had an aide of money conditionally granted: foure yeares truce by the trauaile of the two Dukes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter being concluded in France. This yeare was farther notable for many great Funerals. Conſtance Dutcheſſe of Aquitaine, and Lancaſter, a Ladie of great * Innocencie and deuotion: the Counteſſe of Derbie her Daughter in law, Iſabel the Dutcheſſe of Yorke, and a Lady noted for too great a fineneſſe and delicacy, yet at her death ſhewing much repentance and ſorrow for her loue to thoſe peſtilent vanities, left this preſent life. But all the griefe for their deaths did in no ſort equall that of the Kings, for the loſſe of his owne Queene Anne, which about the ſame time hapned at Sheene in Surrey, whom he loued euen to a kinde of madneſſe: but Ladies onely died not; for Sir Iohn Hawkwood, whoſe cheualry had made him renowned ouer the Chriſtian world, did in this yeare depart an aged man out of this World in Florence, where his aſhes remaine honoured at this preſent with a ſtately Tombe, and the Statue of a Man at Armes, erected by the gratitude of that State and Citie, which chiefly by his conduct, courage and valour (to this day admired amongſt them) was preſerued. But the Duke of Lancaſter hauing all things readie, ſets ſaile to Burdeaux, there, with the conſent of the State to take poſſeſſion of his lately granted Duchie.

(91) The King doth the like for Ireland; where that ſort of the Iriſh which are called the wilde, had greatly inueſted the Engliſh Pale, and other good Subjects there, to the great dammage of the Crowne of England. In the times of Edward the third, Ireland yeelded to the kings coffers *thirty thouſand pounds yeerely, but now things were ſo growne out of order, that it coſt the King thirty thouſand Marks by yeere. To reduce the rebellious, himſelfe conducts thither an Armie, attended vpon by the Duke of Gloceſter, the Earles of March, Nottingham and Rutland, all the Iriſh being commanded to auoid out of England. The terror of the preparations, and ſhining preſence of a King (which aboue all worldly things is pleaſant to the Iriſh) had ſuch effects that ſundry great men were compelled to ſubmit themſelues. To ſupply the Kings wants, growne in the Iriſh expedition, Edmund Duke of Yorke, the Kings vncle, and Cuſtos or Warden of England, called a Parliament at London, (whither the Duke of Gloceſter repaired to declare the kings wants) and hath contributions granted. Neuertheleſſe, ſo ſtrong a party againſt the Clergie, and Friarly abuſes of thoſe times diſcouered it ſelfe therein, that the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the Biſhop of London, and others, preſt ouer-Sea to the King at Dublin, beſeeching him to returne, the ſooner to repreſſe the Lollards (ſo called they the embracers of Wicliffes doctrine) and their fauourers, who ſought, not onely (as they vntruly pretended) to wring away all the poſſeſſions of the Church, but that which was worſe, to abrogate and deſtroy all Eccleſiaſticall conſtitutions, whereas they aimed onely at the redreſſe of exorbitancy in the Papall Clergy. The King hereupon returnes; by whoſe arriuall and authoritie, thoſe conſultations of the Laitie were laide downe. Sir Richard Storie a ſeruant of his had been forward againſt the Prelates; of him therefore he takes an oath vpon the holy Goſpell, that he ſhould not hold ſuch opinions any longer. The Knight takes that oath, and we (ſaith the King) doe ſweare, that if thou doſt breake it, thou ſhalt die a moſt ſhamefull death. The reſt hearing the Lion roare ſo terribly, drew in their hornes, and would be ſeene no more.

(92) The King cauſed the body of the late Duke of Ireland to be brought into England. His exceeding loue to him was ſuch, that he commanded the Cypreſſe cheſt wherein his body lay enbalmed, to be opened, that he might ſee, view, handle, and openly expreſſe his affection. The dead remaines of that noble young Gentleman, (by his birth-right Earle of Oxford, and by race a Vere) were buried at the Priorie of Coln in Eſſex, there being preſent the King himſelfe, the Counteſſe Dowager of Oxford, the Dukes mother, the Archbiſhop of Canterburie with many Biſhops, Abbots, and religious perſons, but few of the Lords, for they had not as yet digeſted the hate they bare him.

An. D. 1396.

(93) The Duke of Lancaſter was this while in Aquitaine, where he had ſought to winne the people with incredible largeſſe, to accept of his Soueraigntie, according to the tenor of King Richards grant. Little did he then thinke, that within leſſe then ſixeſcore and three yeeres after, an * Ambaſſador of King Henrie the 8. ſhould write thus of Burdeaux it ſelfe, the capitall City of Gaſcoign and Guien: Anglorum nulla ferè veſtigia remanẽt, &c. There are (ſaith that learned Gentleman) ſcarſe any foot-prints of the Engliſhmen remaining. In the Churches, and other places newly refreſhed and reedified, ſuch Armories of the Engliſh as ſtood, were vtterly blotted and defaced: yet in the Church of the Fryers Preachers, the Armories of the Duke of Lancaſter ſtand entire in a Glaſſe-window, and in the oldeſt wall of the City thoſe alſo of England, though conſumed in a manner with age: The Lawes, Statutes, and Ordinations which were made by the Engliſh, are notwithſtanding obſerued at this day. But the Dukes eye could not looke ſo farre into the times to come. Neuertheleſſe we that ſee theſe things muſt confeſſe, that the beſt Kingdome vnder heauen is not ſo worth the getting, as that with the wilfull contempt of God and conſcience any man ſhould ſeeke to purchaſe it.

* Doct. Tayler ex Autographo ipſius. A. D. 1526.

An excellent note concerning the vanitie of worldly ambition in Princes.

(94) But while the Duke was thus buſied in Courting the Gaſcoignes good will,* who had ſent into England, to ſhew cauſes why they ſhould not atturne to the Duke, (and yet were wrought at laſt to the point of yeelding,) he receiues a commandement from King Richard to returne, that he might goe with him into France; which he obayed. The King keeping his at Langeley in Hartfordſhire, the Duke was there entertained with more honour (as it was thought) then loue. Being licenſed to depart for a time he repaired to Lincolne, where he a widdower, married his olde loue the Lady Katherine Swinford, now a Widdow. Men did wonder at it, but hee therein obeyed the remorſe of a Chriſtian conſcience, without reſpect to his owne vnequall greatnes; for hauing had ſundry Children by her in his former Wiues time, he made her and them now the onely ſufficient amends, which the law of God or man enjoyneth. And further in a Parliament held the yeere following, the Duke procured an Act to paſſe, by which, ſuch children as he formerly had by his new Dutcheſſe, were legitimated; and ſurnamed them Beufort, being * foure of them, Iohn, Thomas, Henry, Ioane; the ſecond of which was by the Kings bounty created Earle of Sommerſet.

(95) The King, being ſpecially accompanied with thoſe his vncles of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, at a moſt ſumptuous and chargefull enteruiew betweene him and Charles King of France, in the parts of Callis and Gynes, eſpouſed the Lady Iſabel, Daughter of the ſaid Charles. At the deliuery of her, King Richard, in the preſence of all the greateſt Princes, Peeres, and Ladies of either Nation, gaue the King his father in law great thankes for a gift ſo noble and acceptable adding, he tooke her vpon the conditions made betweene the two Nations, to the intent that liuing in peace and reſt, they might attaine to the eſtabliſhment of a perpetuall amitie, for auoyding the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, which would in likelihood haue followed, had not at that time affinitie beene contracted betweene them. The young Lady was not aboue ſeauen or eight yeeres olde, but the truce was taken for thirty yeares. Her perſon therefore was committed to the Dutcheſſes of Lancaſter and Gloceſter, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Callis. From whence, after a ſhort ſtay, the King, his young Queene (with whom he had great riches) and all the glorious company came ouer into England. Their perſons arriued ſafe, but the Kings gorgeous Pauilions, and a great part of his ſtuffe was caſt away by tempeſt in the tranſportation. A. D. 1397. An. Reg. 20.

(96) The outward felicitie of England ſeemed at this time very great, and the rather ſeemed ſo, becauſe it was likely to continue. In the Duke of Gloceſters perſon that bright proſperity was firſt ouerſhadowed. He, Vir ferociſſimus & præcipitis ingenij (as * Polydor cenſures him,) a moſt fierce man, and of an head-long wit, thinking thoſe times, wherein he had maſtred the King, were nothing changed, though the King was aboue thirty yeres old, forbare not, roughly, not ſo much to admoniſh, as to checke and ſchoole his Soueraigne. The peace with France diſpleaſed him, that therefore he calumniates. The King had reſtored Breſt in Britaine to the Duke, vpon re-emburſements of the money lent; he tels the King that hee ſhould firſt conquer a Towne, before he parted with any; yet the King anſweres, that he could not in conſcience detaine the ſame, now that the Duke had re-paide his loane. There were other things which could not ſo well be anſwered. For a vaine rumor * that he ſhould be choſen Emperour, put him belike into ſuch a vaine of ſpending, as carried a proportion with that maieſty; his coffers in a ſhort time ſounding like empty Caske, there was no great monied man in whoſe debt he was not, nor any in a manner ſo meane to whom he was not burthenous.

(97) The King had heretofore complayned of his Vncle to the Earle of Saint Paul a Frenchman, (then in England,) whoſe judgement was, that ſuch inſolency was to be reuenged; but complayning to his other vncles of Lancaſter and Yorke, they wiſely aduiſed the King, not to regard his words but his heart, which he and they knew ſincere vnto him. Neuertheleſſe, partly to weaken the intollerable humour of their brother, who like a conſtant Admirer of his owne waies, thought nothing well done, but what himſelfe either did or directed, and partly to auoid the ſcandall of the Kings bad courſes, they withdraw their preſences from the Court. The King notwithſtanding is the ſame man ſtill, as the Duke of Gloceſter thinkes; wherefore, he breakes his minde to ſuch as he durſt truſt. Arundel in Suſſex is appointed the Conſultation-place, where he, the Archbiſhop of Canterburie, the Earles of Arundel, Warwicke, Marſhall and others, take an Oath of Secrecy, and conclude to raiſe a power to remoue * the Dukes of Lancaſter and Yorke, and ſuch other as they thought beſt, from about the King, ſo to enact a reformation.

The bluſtring Duke had breathed out dangerous words; as, * that he would put the King (of whoſe courage he ſpake contemptibly) into ſome priſon, there to ſpend his dayes in eaſe and peace, as himſelfe thought beſt. His brethren hearing hereof, brotherly admoniſh him to beware; but, as it ſeemes, they found him deafe on that ſide. This though ſome of the late Authors write, yet there are both * olde and * new, who mention no ſuch matter, but the contrary, not obſcurely teaching vs, that the Dukes ruine was but an effect of old malignities.

In the firſt act (after the liberties of the Church and people confirmed,) we finde theſe * words: *The commons of the Parliament haue ſhewed to our Soueraigne Lord the King, how in the Parliament holden at Weſtminſter, the firſt day of October, in the tenth yeare of his raigne, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, and Richard Earle of Arundell, traitors to the King and his Realme and his people, by falſe imagination and compaſsing cauſed a * Commiſsion to be made, &c. and that the ſaid Duke of Gloceſter, & Earle of Arundel, did ſend a great man and Peere of the Realme in meſſage to our Lord the King; who of their part ſaid, that if he would not grant and aſſent to the ſaid Commiſsion,* HEE SHOVLD BE IN GREAT PERIL OF HIS LIFE: and ſo, aſwell the ſaid commiſsion, as the ſaid Statute touching the ſaid Commiſsion, were made by conſtraint, &c. Wherfore the Commons pray their Soueraigne Lord the King, that the ſaid Commiſſion, &c. be vtterly annulled, as a thing done TRAITEROVSLY, &c.

(101) The ſanctuary of former Lawes, and all particular Charters of pardon being now taken away from the Duke, Earle, and others, they lay open to manifeſt ruine. The * Duke of Lancaſter ſate in iudgement as High Steward vpon Richard Earle of Arundel, where, for no other but for the olde attempts, (though the other accuſations ſeeme to haue beene auerred by the eight Appellants) by which, as ye haue heard, ſo many were diſplaced and put to death, hee adjudged him to dye that foule death of a common Traitour: but the King ſatisfied himſelfe with onely his head, which was at one ſtroake taken off at Tower-hill. That he was a traitor either in word or deed, he vtterly did deny, and died in that deniall. The conſtancy of this Earles carriage as well at his arraignement, paſſage, and execution, (as in which hee did not diſcolour the honour of his bloud with any degenerous word, looke, or action) encreaſed the enuy of his death vpon the proſecutors. The Earle of Warwicke confeſſed with teares, (and as ſome ſay, drawne by faire hope of life) that in adhering to the Duke of Gloceſter in thoſe ridings and aſſemblies he was guilty of treaſon. The ſame ſentence was therefore pronounced vpon him. The King neuertheleſſe did onely baniſh him into the Ile of Man. But the Duke of Gloceſter (whom, as the peoples darling, it ſeemed not ſafe to bring to a publike triall) was ſecretly ſmothered at Callis with pillowes and featherbeds.

(102) The great Parliament (for ſo it ſeemes to haue beene called, by reaſon of the extraordinarie numbers of Peeres, and their retinues, which came thereunto) was holpen by adjournment at Shrewſbury. That he neuer troubled his minde with conſidering how his Dominions were diminiſhed through his idleneſſe. He remembred not how broken an eſtate he had in England, where the peoples hearts were ſtrongly alienated, not onely for the death of the late great Lords, and baniſhment of the Duke of Hereford, (whoſe calamitie encreaſed his popularity) or for the like paſſed exaſperations, but for that (to furniſh his Iriſh voyage) he had extorted money on all hands, taking vp carriages, victuals, and other neceſſaries, without any recompence; whereby the hatred of his gouernment grew vniuerſall.

(106) But the euill fortune which hung ouer his head, laid forth an alluring baite to haſte his deſtruction, by occaſion of the Duke of Lancaſters deceaſe, which hapned about Candlemas, and the abſence of his baniſhed ſonne and heire Lord Henrie. The King (moſt vnjuſtly) ſeizeth vpon the goods of that mighty Prince his vncle, and as if all things now were lawfull, which but liked him, he determines to baniſh the new rightfull Duke of Lancaſter Henry, not for a few yeares, but for euer; for which cauſe he reuoked his Letters Patents granted to the ſaide Henry, by which his Atturnyes were authoriſed to ſue his Liuery, and to compound for the reſpite of his homage at a reaſonable rate; whereby he made it ſeeme plaine to the world, that he had not baniſhed him to auoyde diſſentions, but (as many ſaid) to fill vp the breaches which his riot had made in the royall treaſures, with plentifull (though an vndue) Eſcheate, as that of his deceaſed vncles fortune.

(107) The one ſtedfaſt baſe and buttreſſe of all lawfull Empire, is Iuſtice; that ſupports the kingly Throne. This he ouerthrew, and how then could himſelfe hope to ſtand long? He lands at Waterford in Ireland with a Nauie of * two hundreth ſhips, hauing with him the ſonne of the late Duke of Gloceſter, and of the now Duke of Lancaſter, to ſecure himſelfe the rather. * His forces conſiſted much of Cheſhire men: But that King is deceiued, who repoſeth his ſafetie in violence. It was no great matter hee did there, that which fell out to be done elſewhere, was great indeede. His warre in Ireland was more dammagefull, then fiſhing with an hooke of gold, for here the baite and hooke was not onely loſt, but the line, rod, and himſelfe, were drawne altogether into the depthes of irrecouerable ruine. Duke Henrie ſees the aduantage which King Richards abſence gaue him, and vſeth it. (108) Edmund Duke of Yorke, whom King Richard had left behind him to gouerne England, hearing this, cals vnto him Edmund Stafford Biſhop of Chicheſter, Lord Chancellor, the Earle of Wiltſhire, Lord Treaſurer, and the Knights of the Kings Councell, Buſhie, Bagot, Greene, and Ruſſell. Their concluſion was to leuie a force to impeach Duke Henries entrance. The aſſembly was appointed to be at Saint Albans, which came to worſe then nothing, for the proteſtation that they would not hurt the Duke, whom they knew to be wronged was generall. This made the Treaſurer Sir John Buſhie, and Sir Henrie Greene flie to the Caſtle of Briſtoll, Sir William Bagot to Cheſter, from whence he got ſhipping into Ireland. Meane while Duke Henrie lands at a Village heretofore called Rauerſhire, to whom repaired Henry Earle of Northumberland, his ſonne Henrie Lord Piercy, the Lord Neuill Earle of Weſtmerland, & many others, who (ſaith VValſingham) greatly feared King Richards tyrannie. With an Armie of about threeſcore thouſand (multitudes offering their ſeruice) they come to Briſtoll, beſiege the Caſtle, take it, and in the ſame the foreſaid Treaſurer Buſhie and Greene, whoſe heads (at the cryes of the Commons) were the next day after their ſurrender ſeuered from their bodies.

(109) King Richard was in the City of Dublin, when theſe moſt heauie newes arriued. His courage which at no time ſeemed great, was ſhortly none at all. Somewhat muſt be done: he leaues the ſonnes of Duke Henry, & of his late vncle of Gloceſter (which he retained as pledges for his owne indemnitie) in the Caſtle of Trim, and returnes himſelfe into England, entending to encounter the Duke before his force ſhould be too much eſtabliſhed. The great names which accompanied him, were his late noble Creatures, the young Dukes of Aumarle, Exceſter, and Surrey, the Biſhops of London, Lincolne, & Carleil, and many others. There had beene ſome more hope for vpholding his right, if he had not made the World know, that tenne yeares ſpace was not able to burie in him the appetite of reuenge, which made many forget their owne loyalty to him, and the Crowne. Princes, ſee in him the vſe of obliuion: but ſome conſcience of euill deſerts ſeeming to haue taken from him all confidence, he diſmiſſeth his Armie, bidding his Steward Sir Thomas Piercy, and others, to reſerue themſelues for better daies.

(110) His laſt refuge is in Parlea. For that cauſe there repayred to him, at the Caſtle of Conway in North-wales, (for thither he was now come) the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Northumberland at the Kings appointment: The sum of his demaunds were, that if he and eight, whom hee would name, might haue honourable allowance, with the assurance of a quiet priuate life, he would resigne his Crowne. This Northumberland did sweare should be: whereupon he forthwith departs to the Castle of Flint in their company. After a short conference there had with the Duke, they all ride that night to the Castle of Chester, being attended by the Lancastrian Armie. If, to spare his peoples bloud, he was contented so tamely to quit his royall right, his fact doth not onely not seeme excusable, but glorious; but men rather thinke that it was sloath, and a vaine trust in dissimulation, which his enemies had long since discouered in him, and for that cause, both held his amendment desperate, and ran themselues into these desperate Treasons.

Nor-

(111) The King did put himselfe into the Dukes hands vpon the twentieth day of August, being but the forty and seauenth from the Dukes first landing. From thence they trauell to Lonaon, where the King lodged in the Tower: Meane while writs of Summons are sent out in King Richards name, for a Parliament to be holden at Westminster, Crastino Michaelis. The tragicall forme of Resignation, you haue * had already in Edward the second, of whom this King is a Parallell. There are named to haue been present at this wofull-joyfull Act, Arundel, Archbishop of Canterburie, Richard Scrope Archbishop of Yorke, Iohn Bishop of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaster, (who in this serious play must seeme as if he were but a looker on) the Earles of Northumberland, and Westmerland, the Lords Burnell, Barkley, Ros, Willoughby, and Abergeuenie; the Abbot of Westminster, &c.

* Ed. 2. §. 33. & 34.

King Richard resignes vpon Michaelmas-day. An. D. 1340.

(112) In their presence Richard as yet a King, and in his Tower of London, but not otherwise then as a prisoner, reades the Instrument of his surrender, with a seeming chearefull countenance, as if he were glad the houre was come, in which he might taste what it was to be a priuate man, and (hauing otherwise first done and said what then he could to put all right out of himselfe) subscribes it with his hand; but prayes, that his Cousen the Duke of Lancaster might succeed him in the regall gouernement, and in token that it was his desire (for he must seeme to desire what hee could not hinder) hee * plucked off his Signet-ring, and put it vpon the Dukes finger. Then did he constitute the Archbishop of Yorke, and Bishop of Hereford his Procurators, to declare to the whole Body of Parliament what he had done, and how willingly, where euery one (* except the loyal and magnanimious Bishop of Carleil) being particularly asked, did particularly accept of the resignation. Neuertheless, it was not thought inough to haue his Crowne, vnlesse they also published his shame. Thirty * and two Articles are therefore openly (but in his absence) read; of all which, it was said (for then men might say what they lifted) that he had confessed himselfe guilty. In the front was placed his abuse of the publike treasure, and vnworthy waste of the Crown-land, whereby he grew intollerably grieuous to the Subjects. The particular causes of the Dukes of Gloucester and Lancaster, the Archbishop of Canterburie and Earle of Arundel, filled sundry Articles. They charged him in the rest with dissimulation, falshood, losse of honour abroad in the World, extortions, rapine, deniall of Iustice, rasures, and embezelling of Records, dishonourable shifts, wicked Axiomes of State, cruelty, couetousnesse, subordinations, lasciuiousnesse, treason to the rights of the Crowne, perjuries; and briefly with all sorts of vnkingly vices, and with absolute tyranny.

* Holinsh. pag. 504.

* D. Hayward in Hen. 4.

* Fabia. Concord. hist. saith thirty and eight.

(113) We may be assured, that nothing could then be objected so vntrue or incredible, but would haue gone for current and vndenyable with affections so throughly prepared. Hereupon it was * concluded, that in all those thirty and two Articles, hee had broken the Oath of Empire taken at the Coronation, and all the States of the Kingdome (strange that so many should so concurre in disloyalty vnder pretence of equity) being asked what they thought; did hold that those causes seemed notorious, and sufficient to depose King Richard. Commissioners were therefore nominated by consent of the whole house, to pronounce the sentence of Deposition; which were, the Bishop of Asaph, the Abbot of Glassenbury, the Earle of Glocester, the Lord Barkley, William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the common Pleas, and some others. The forme of pronunciation was, IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN: We Iohn Bishop of Saint Asaph, Iohn Abbat, &c. Commissioners specially chosen by the Lords spirituall and temporall of the Realme of England, and Commons of the said Realme, representing all the States of the said Realme, sitting in place of iudgement, &c.

(114) The definitiue sentence of Deposition giuen thus in open Parliament, there were further named certaine persons, amongst whom William Thyrning Chiefe Iustice of the Common Pleas was thought the fittest man, by whose lawlesse mouth that vnjust doome should be deliuered to the King, and who on the behalfe of the realme, should renounce to the said Richard the Fealties and Homages heretofore made vnto him, and to make relation of the whole manner and causes of their proceedings. The Regall Seate was now reputed void; whereupon Duke Henrie riseth from his place, and stands vpright, that hee might be seene of the people; then * signing himselfe with the signe of the Crosse vpon the fore-head and breast, and inuocating the name of Christ, he challenged the Crowne and Realme of England, with all the members and appurtenances. His words are said to be these.

* Ypodig. Neustr.

* Ypodig. Neustr.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaster, claime the Realme of England, and the Crowne, with all the appurtenances, as comming by the bloud-royall from King Henry, and by that iustice which God of his grace hath sent to mee, by the helpe of my kinsfolke and friends, for recouery of the said Realme, which was in point of perdition, through default of Gouernement and breach of lawes. Ypodig. Neustr.

(115) Which challenge and claime being thus made, all the States of the Kingdome doe with one consent grant, that the said Lord Duke should raigne ouer them. The Archbishop of Canterbury (brother to the late Earle of Arundel) takes him then by the right hand, and the Archbishop of Yorke, (the late Earle of Wiltshires kinseman) being his assistant, placeth him in the royall Throne, with the generall acclamation and applauses of the people. Lastly, in full complement of the present solemnity, the Archbishop of Canterburie (that we may see how the Diuinity aswell as the Law of those times were degenerated into temporizing Policie) made a Sermon vpon those words in Samuel, A man shall raigne ouer the People. By occasion whereof * he describeth out of the holy Scriptures, the happinesse of that Kingdome which is gouerned by a Man, and the infelicity of those Realmes where a Childe (whether in age or discretion) weeldes the Scepter. The euill whereof as they had dangerously felt vnder the late King, so they hoped abundantly to enjoy the other in King Henrie. To al which the whole Auditory joyously answered, Amen. Then rose the affable new Monarch, and among a few other words, he gaue the world to vnderstand, that none should thinke he would, as by way of Conquest, disinherite any man, certaine bad members onely excepted.

* Fab. 1. Concord. Hist. Holinsh. ex Fab.

A necessary protestation.

(116) From henceforth he was taken for King, and all Writs issued, and went forth in his name: which disorderly matters being orderly related to the deposed Prince in the Tower, by Thyrning the Chiefe Iustice, he onely vsed these words; That he looked not after such things, but (quoth he) my hope is, that (after all this) my cosen will be my good Lord and friend. The Archbishop (otherwise inexcusable in those proceedings) yet in his saide Sermon seemeth graucly and truely to haue described the cause of this effect; for (quoth hee) the childe or insipient (which are with him æquiparable) drinketh the sweet and delicious words vnaduisedly, and perceiueth not intoxication, which they been mingled with, till he be inuironed and wrapped in all danger, as lately the experience thereof hath been apparant to all our sights and knowledges, and not without the great danger of all this Realme. Being thus brought downe to the show, and littlenesse of a priuate man, we leaue him to draw his comfort out of holy meditations, as one whose violent death ensued before long, and turne ouer to his politique and martiall Successor.

(117) Yet in our way, we may not quite ouerpasse a cursory consideration of the affaires of the Church vnder this King, which, for auoyding often interruptions of other argument, we haue put off to this last place. For albeit the Kingdome indured great crosses in the affaires of State, (yet * some haue thought, that it found as great blessings in matters of Religion, which in those daies tooke so deepe roote in this our Land, by the preaching of Iohn Wicliffe, that the branches thereof did spread themselues euen * ouer the Seas. Nor were the common people onely allured with his doctrine, (though the * Londoners fauouring of him is thought by Walsingham to haue deterred the Prelates from proceeding against him, and a scholler of his in Leicestershire, is said to haue drawn by his preaching, * all the Laymen in that Countrey) but (as the same Author reporteth) sundry of the Friars themselues fell to him, and imbraced his opinions, amongst whom one * being also the Popes Chaplaine, so discouered by preaching, the murders, luxuries and treasons of Friars of his owne Habit, that the common people were astonied with the horror thereof, and cried out to haue them all vtterly destroyed; which his accusations he particularly justified by publique writing, professing he came forth of that Order, as out of the Diuels nest. But that which Walsingham much more * admires, is, that Wicliffes opinions were not only entertained in ordinary Cities, but euen in the Vniuersity of Oxford it selfe, where was * the very top of wisdome and learning: and where not onely two Chancellors successiuely, * Doctor Nicholas Hereford and * Robert Rugge, were most earnest maintainers of Wicliffes doctrine, but also, when the Pope (to suppresse the same doctrine) sent his * Bull to the Vniuersity, threatning the priuation of all their priuiledges, the Proctors & Regents thereof were very doubtfull, whether they should receiue the Popes Bull with honour, or rather reject it with open disgrace. Yea, the whole body of that glorious Vniuersity (as the Pope there cals it in his Bull) gaue a glorious * Testimony (vnder their publique Seale) of Wicliffes religious life, profound learning, orthodoxe opinions, exquisite writings, all farthest from any staine of heresie.

(118) And therefore no marueile, if not only the Duke of Lancaster, with * sundry Peeres & great ones, but King Edward 3. himselfe, were (as Capgraue testifieth) a fauourer of him, and * King Richard 2. and the whole Parliament did (according to his * instructions) much labor to abrogate the Popes transcendent power, which was a principall cause of the Popes hatred against him. Notwithstanding to discountenance the truth which he taught, in defence of Regall Supremacy against Papall Vsurpation, (as also against the Masse, Transubstantiation, Merit; against Adoration of the Hoast, of Saints, Images; and Reliques; against Friarly Orders, Pilgrimages, Indulgences,) many lewde opinions by mis construction (as his Bookes * yet extant, euince) are fathered on him, yea some so monstrous and diabolicall (as, * that Men ought, yea, * that God himselfe ought to obay the Diuell,) that any man which heareth them, will presently beliue (without further perswasion) that they are but malicious figments. This famous Doctor * dying of a palsie, hath this charitable Euloge or Epitaph bestowed on him by a * Monke; The Diuels Instrument, Churches Enemy, Peoples Confusion, Heretikes Idoll, Hypocrites mirrour, Schismes broacher, hatreds sower, lyes forger, Flatteries sinke; who, at his death dispaired like Cain, *and stricken by the horrible iudgement of God; breathed forth his wicked soule to the darke mansion * of the black dinell:* Whereby, Gods best children may learne, not to regard, whiles they liue, the malice of the Wicked, nor to expect after their death ought else but their slanderous rancour. And thus we conclude the raigne, though not the life of King Richard:

His first Wife.

(119) The first wife of King Richard the second, was Anne, daughter vnto the Emperour Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus Emperour, and King of Bohemia, who was crowned Queene the 22. of Ianuary 1382. Hauing been ten yeares his wife she died without any issue, at Sheen in the county of Surrey, 1392. whence her body was conuayed and buried at Westminster, the seauenth of the Ides of Iune.

His second Wife.

(120) Isabel, daughter vnto Charles the sixth, King of France, was a Virgin about seauen yeares of age, when she was affianced vnto King Richard, 1396. Neither had her Husband (it seemeth) any nuptiall fruition of her, by reason of her tender age, before such time as his traiterous Lords, (to compasse their owne disloyall purposes, and gratifie an Vsurpers ambition) had dethroned him. What became of this young Ladie, we shall further see in the ensuing Storie.

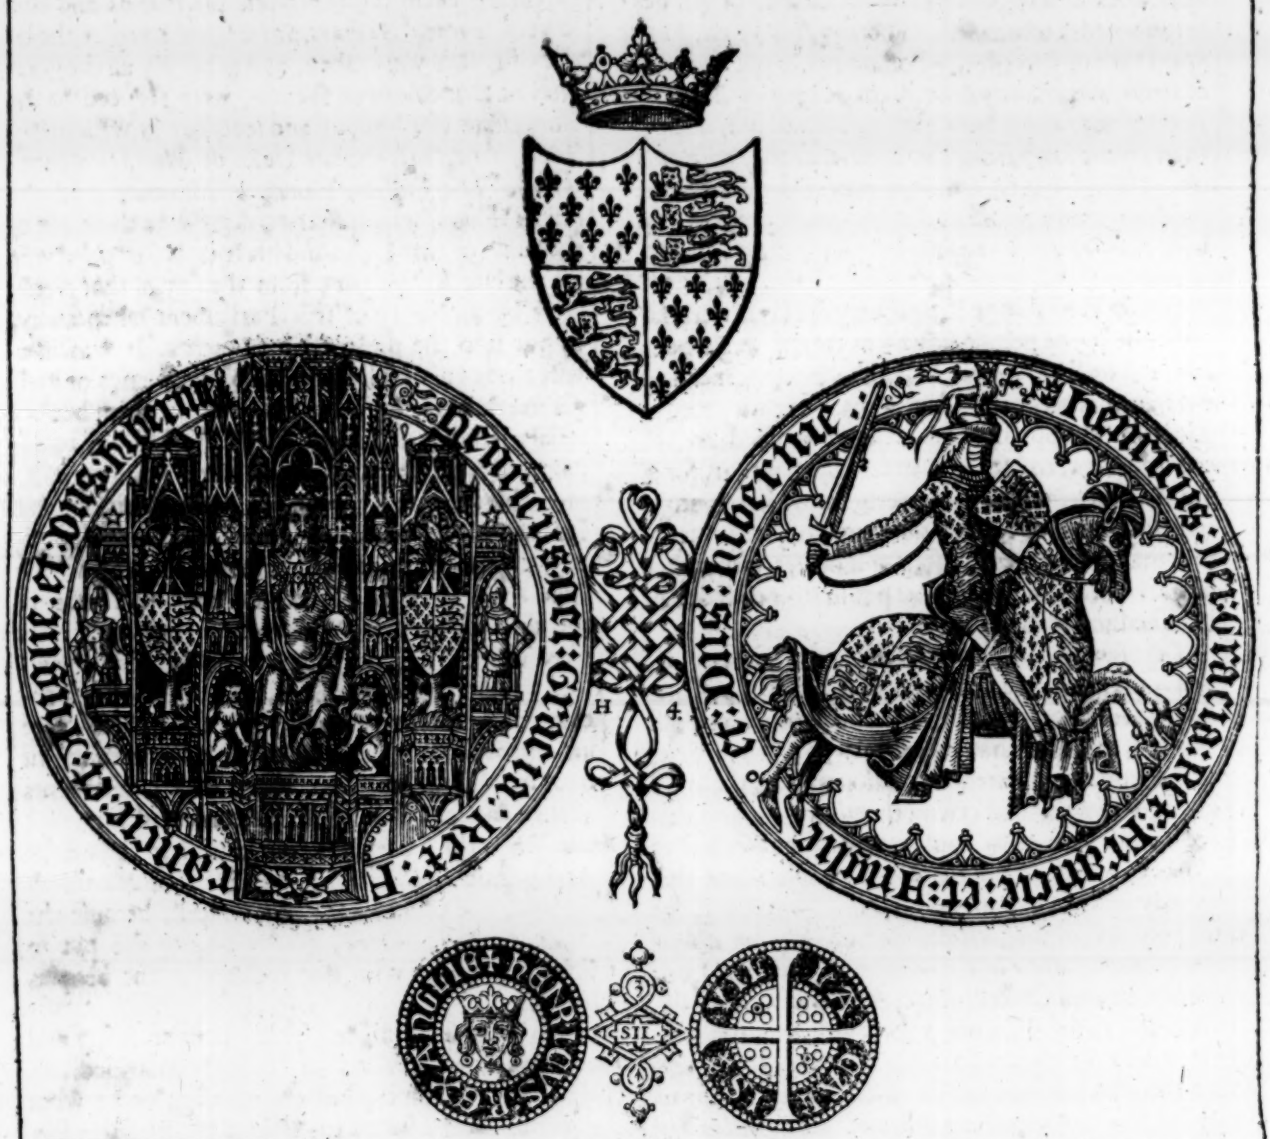
HENRIE

Henry IIII.

HENRIE THE FOVRTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE FIFTIE ONE MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 51.



CHAPTER XIIII.

HENRIE of that name the fourth, hauing thus obtained the title of king, in full accompliſhment of all rites peculiar to Maieſtie, had the Crowne of England ſet vpon his head, with all worldly magnificence and honour at Weſtminſter, by Thomas Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury, vpon the* ſelfe day twelue moneth, in which hee had formerly beene baniſhed vnder Richard the ſecond. Power and fauour can ſet vp and maintaine a King, though they cannot create aright. But ſuch tranſcendent courſes deuiating from all due regulation of Iuſtice, haue beene too frequent in this Kingdome. What right had William ſurnamed the Conqueror? What right, (wee ſpeake of a right of Equity,) had his ſonnes William the ſecond, and Henry the firſt, while their elder brother liued? What right had that valiant and princely Stephen? What was the intereſt of Henry the ſecond, during the life of his mother Mathildis? or that of King Iohn, till his Nephew Arthur Duke of Britaine dyed? yea, or that of Henry the third, till Arthurs ſiſter died in her priſon at Briſtow? Howbeit, in this preſent caſe, not onely Richard the late king, but the houſe of Mortimer, claiming from the onely daughter and heire of Lionel Duke of Clarence (an elder brother of Iohn D. of Lancaſter) doubly might haue withſtoode the legall challenge of this Prince? That obſtacle which grew by Richard, was in apparance greateſt, but the other was onely dangerous. Richard had no iſſue but the line of Mortimer (engraffed by marriage into the houſe of Yorke) feeling it ſelfe vnable to preuaile, and during Richards life-time, hauing no right, ſecretly foſtered in it ſelfe thoſe fires, which afterward brake forth, and taking hold of the roofe-tops of both the royall houſes, neuer left burning, till no one principall timber was vnconſumed in either, all the Male-Iſſues which could claime by a direct line, vtterly loſt downe by by mutuall maſſacres, and extinguiſhed.

(2) But this wiſe and valiant Prince Henry, beſides all other helpes toward the poſſeſſion of the Crowne in preſent, had as much ſtrength, as the vnordinate affections and ſiding of a factious greater part could giue, for tranſlation of a right from one family to another; which ſtrength (as the baſis of his vniuſtly-reared building) he endeauoureth by all the politike meanes hee may, to make perpetuall. During therefore the former Parliament, (for Parliaments, as Kingdomes, giue their voice with power, and he who hath the force, doth commonly carry the effect of right) hee * prouided for their indemnities, who either came in with him, or did afterward adhere to his ſides, and doth vtterly abrogate, and make voide the Acts made in the one and twentieth yeare of the late King Richard the ſecond, for ſo much as concerned the Attaindors diſinheriſons, or other forfeitures of any perſons therein named, or (in generall words) compriſed. Thereby, his Vncle, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, who had beene put to death at Callis without any orderly condemnation, Richard Earle of Arundell beheaded at Tower-hill, and others, were freed from the infamie of that corruption in bloud which followes executed malefactors. And the Statute made in the eleauenth yeare of the ſaid Richard, was againe fully ſet on foote and reuiued.

* Lib. Statut. An. 1. Hen. 4 c. 2. 3. 4.

(3) In theſe things King Henry did (as it were) ſacrifice vnto the people, aſwell as to the weale publike: The ſaid Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, meaning the reformation of the State, in that eleuenth yeare of King Richard procured (as is before touched) an Act of Parliament, to " ſettle a Super-royall power, for a yeare, in certaine Peeres, by vertue of which commiſſion the intended reformation was ſo farre proſecuted, that ſundry great perſons and others (fauourites of the vnfortunate King) were put to ſhamefull death, baniſhed and confiſcated.

Lib. Stat. An. 11. Rich. 2. cap. 1.

(4) But Richard * afterward (by the Duke of Aumarls inſtigation) re-examines all the former paſſages and proceedings, and ſatisfied his pleaſure and diſpleaſure, as already hath beene ſhewed; The Articles in thoſe times ſentenced for treaſonable by the moſt eminent Lawyers, did extend themſelues ſo farre, that the Prince ſeemed to haue too great meanes left to worke miſchiefe to the Peeres and people: and that we may ſee the conſtant humour in Lawyers to iudge with the will of the greateſt, * the Lord William Thyrning Chiefe Iuſtice of the common Bench, the Lord Walter Clopton Chiefe Iuſtice, and others, being demaunded their opinions vpon the ſame Articles, for which Sir Robert Triſilian had loſt his life, and for the which others had ſo terrible beene cenſured by the Gloceſtrian faction, affirmed (as Triſilian and others did) that the ſaid Commiſſion was againſt the royall Prerogatiue, and the procurers thereof were all Traitors.

* An. Reg. 21.

* So is he and the reſt called Lib. Statut. An. 21. Rich. 2. cap. 11.

(5) King Henry therefore, in this his firſt Parliament, reduceth the ſtate of treaſons (being crimes of the higheſt an l fouleſt nature) to a more certaine head, vtterly aboliſhing all ſuch as were eſtabliſhed by the late King Richard. The words of the * Statute it ſelfe are; Whereas, in the Parliament holden the one and twentieth yeare of the late king Richard, diuers paines of treaſon were ordained by Statute, in as much as there was no man which did know how he ought to behaue himſelfe, to doe, ſpeake, or ſay, for doubt of ſuch paines: It is accorded, and aſſented by the King, the Lords and Commons, that in no time to come any treaſon be iudged otherwiſe, then it was ordained by the Statute, in the time of his noble Grandfather, King Edward the third, whom God aſſoile. So was that net broken, the perilous eſtate of Subiects relieued, the people well gratified, and the King hereby became gracious and popular.

* An. 1. H. 4. c. 10.

King Henry createth his ſonne Henry Prince of Wales.

(6) And that his indulgent magnificence might aſwell appeare, as his ciuill prudence, hee (in this Parliament) created Henry his eldeſt ſonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, & Earle of Cheſter, by * aſſent of all the States. To his friend the Earle of Northumberland hee gaue the Iſle of Mann, as that which he had atchieued by Conqueſt, (ſo the cited * Record ſpeaks) of Sir William le Scrope Knight, Earle of Wiltſhire, beheaded at Briſtol. The Earle of Northumberland had it granted to hold by the ſeruice of bearing Lancaſters ſword on the left hand of the King at the Coronation. Vpon the Earle of Weſtmorland, hee beſtowed the Earledome of Richmond. Laſtly, as a binding knot, hee cauſeth the * Crowne to bee entailed vpon the heires of his body, hauing at that time foure ſonnes aliue, Henry Prince of Wales, Thomas, John and Humfrey.

(7) Now, as in the workes of nature, what the Sea drawes from one Coaſt, it caſteth to another; ſo, others were diminiſhed, as theſe encreaſed; the King bereauing enemies, to enrich his friends and followers. From Aumarl, Surrey, and Exceſter, the titles of Dukes were taken, and generally all the great ones of that colour or faction, were reduced to the ſame eſtate (for honour and fortune) in which they ſtood, when firſt the late Duke of Gloceſter was arreſted. The Caſtles, Honours, Manours, and the reſt of things, which afterward grew to them out of the ruine of that Duke and his friends, or otherwiſe by the late Kings gift, from the day of that arreſt, were by authority of this Parliament taken away, or put into the preſent Kings mercy. It was likewiſe made vnlawfull for them to giue liueries or badges to retainers, or to keepe any about them but neceſſary ſeruants: They were alſo forbidden, vnder paine of high Treaſon, to goe about by any way to re-enable the late King againſt the authority of this Parliament, in which the ſentence of his depoſition was giuen and enacted. Finally, (a thing which laide them open to infinite vexations) whereas, in the time of their late greatneſſe, they and theirs were charged to haue done, and patronized manifold wrongs and oppreſſions, all people (vpon proclamations to that purpoſe) were willed to come in, and declare their griefes, to the intent they might haue redreſſe and remedy. With theſe puniſhments of his aduerſaries, King Henry contented himſelfe; but * not the Commons who inueighed againſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earle of Northumberland, and other Lords of Councell, becauſe the ſaid Aumarl, Surrey, &c. were not alſo put to death, as perſons who ſtoode deepe in the peoples hatred.

The late Kings friends diſinabled and deplumed.

* Tho. Walſing.

(8) Theſe prouiſions for his honour, ſafety and aduantage, King Henry very ſeeingly contriued, and eſtabliſhed at home; but not ignorant vnder what grieuous conſtructions his actions might fall in forraine parts, ſends honourable Ambaſſadors to * Rome, France, Spaine, and Germany, to giue a reaſon of his doings. To Rome, the Biſhop of Hereford, Sir Iohn Cheney Knight, and Iohn Cheney Eſquier. To France, the Biſhop of Dureſme, and the Lord Thomas Piercy Earle of Worceſter, and * William Heron. To Spaine, the Biſhop of Saint Aſaph, and Sir William Par Knight. To Germany, the Biſhop of Bangor, and others. Theſe were armed with all ſorts of inſtructions for iuſtification of their new aduanced King.

* Holinſh. ex Tho. Walſingh.

* Iohn Stow. Anna.

(9) In France * was worthily found the greateſt difficulty of giuing ſatisfaction, for that the French Kings daughter (the deſigned wife of the late King) did thereby leeſe the honour, profit and pleaſure of a Monarchies fruition. She was as yet ſcarſe twelue yeares of age, and therefore, * till ſhee attained to more maturity, the late King had the rather abſented himſelfe in Ireland. France therefore tooke theſe newes roughly, and it ſeemed that matters tended to Armes, which yet came to nothing, for that King Charles relapſed into his old diſeaſe of frenzie, and a warre to bee made againſt ſo politicke a Captaine as King Henry, required a ſober man, and not a mad a mad one. Certainly, in the death of Richard which shortly followed, all those tumultuous designes for reuenge, immediately expired.

They of Aquitaine discontented and re-fuelled.

(10) They of Aquitaine (among whom the vnfortunate Richard was borne) bare the late king great loue, as being their Countriman. These discontentments were so publike, that Burdeuax (the capitall Citie and Presedentiall seat) stucke not openly to say, (as * Polydor hath it) *that since the world began there was neuer a more cruell, vnreasonable, nor wicked fact done; that the good Prince was betrayed by * faithlesse men, & that all law was violated.* Thus doe they exclaime, calling to God for vengeance with one voyce. Neuertheless the French were deceiued in hoping to conuert these popular passions to their aduantage; for partly by the chiefe * Magistrates wisedome, and principally by the comparison which the people made of the two sorts of gouernment, English and French, that of the English being farre the more sweet and gentle, they continued firme. Much good labour, and many faire promises Lewis Duke of Burbon was forced to spend in vaine, who by such baites cast into the troubled wits of the Gascoignes, trauailed to draw them to a reuolt. The mischiefe was the better, and more strongly encountred, by the arriuall of Sir *Thomas Piercy Earle of Worcester with competent numbers of men, sent thither to withstand the French practises, and cure the peoples affections, by applying to them the soueraigne balme of reason, or with force to compell obedience.

(11) The first prouocation which was giuen to King Henry was by the Scots, who during the last Parliament exercised themselues in England, and took the Castle of Warcke; whose Captaine Sir Thomas Grey at that time gaue his attendance at Parliament about the common affaires; and the whole North of England being also infested with pestilence; the Scots had the more opportunity to range vn-encountred. Cause of other ensuing enmities which afterward brake forth, was (as it * seemeth) for that King Henry tooke into his protection George Earle of Dunbarre, and other Scots, who fled out of Scotland to auoyde the displeasure of Robert their King, and partly to take open vengeance for wrongs done vnto them. Such oftentimes is the corruption of humane nature, that it will not pardon priuate iniuries for the publike benefite, but thrust the pietie due to our Countrey vnder the inferiour respect of particular interesses. Princes also vpon oblique reasons of state (so bad men call them) which is neuer well founded vpon iniustice, are (for their owne seeming good) contented to hold their neighbours in awe, by possessing meanes of their disturbance, which when time serueth also, they are not slacke to vse, the profite whereof is seldome or neuer durable.

(12) But King Henry was scarce warme in his new atchieued soueraignty, when a nest of powerfull enemies beganne to hatch his destruction vnder the shadow of his owne wings. The deposed Richard was yet aliue, and howsoeuer rough and headstrong men of the Kingdome approued his downe-throw, all others did not; for some moued by neerenesse of bloud, as the Earles of Kent, and Huntington his halfe-brothers by one mother; some doubtlesse in conscience (because howsoeuer Richards actions were vnworthy of the Scepter, yet the right was onely his, and besides, Henry seemed to them not the next heire) others transported with enuie at Henries super-eminencie, and not a few with remembrance of receiued benefites, or hope of better fortunes in the change of times, inclined to set him againe vpon the English throne. But they whosoeuer seeke the deliuerance of a Captiue Prince, doe commonly nothing else but hasten his death.

A conspiracie for deliuery of Richard begun.

(13) It was our purpose in many great things to haue forborne the testimony of Walsingham (otherwise a great light of these times) as one who dedicating his workes to King Henry the fift, sonne to this Henry, may be feared to speake the best and most hee can, for setting forth the honour of that line; but the leuity and dissonance of later Writers, enforceth vs (though with some warinesse,) to follow his light, for that, concerning this great conspiracy it selfe, our late Authors doe fondly encounter one the other, and some of them (as it must needes be) the truth. The principall Conspirators (if such in so iust a cause may be so enstiled) were such, whose liues in the last Parliament had beene spared, though many lockes in their periwigs of worldly honour were plucked away. Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, and (as * some say) Edward Earle of Rutland, (three the late Dukes of Excester, Surrey, and Aumarl,) Iohn Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Lord le Spencer, late called Earle of Glocester, the Bishop of Carlile, Sir Bernard Brokas, Sir Iohn Sheuele, (or Shelley) Knights, Iohn Maudler, the Pseudo-Richard, or * counterfet King Richard, whose Chaplaine hee had beene, and resembled him very neerely. The * Abbot of Westminster is (by some) not onely named a Conspirator, but the first wheele of all the practise, as mouing the rest; and with him they adde to the former, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedict Celie Knights. There were sundry others, but those Earles, and others first named, were vndoubtedly the chiefe.

The chiefe Conspirators names. * Ioh. Stow Annal.

* Iohn Stowes Annal. ex Anonymo.

* Iohn Stow ex Anonym. Hall Chron. Sam. Daniel. li. 2.

(14) The maine point of the plot was to * kill King Henry and his sonne, and thereby to restore Richard to his rightfull dignity; which the more powerfully to effect, (because, though Henry were murthered, yet they were assured that the businesse would not take end in a day, or a death) they resolued * to call the French into their succours, which they had reason to expect, for that the young Queene Isabel, daughter to the French king, remained at that present in England. There was nothing feeble or improbable in all this deuise; the difficulty was how to come so strong into the presence of King Henry, that they might ouer-liue the Assassinate, thereby to finish their enterprize, which as they could not hope for, but with the helpe of a multitude, nor a multitude be assembled without conuenient colour, it was resolued, that the pretence of some extraordinary shew in Christmas was the fittest.

* Polyd. Virg. li. 21.

(15) Not long before the time of intended execution, the whole Coniuration was discouered, some say by the late * Duke of Aumarl, and afterward by the Maior of London. Discouered it was, but with so short a warning, that the King scarce found himselfe out of danger, when the Earles of Kent and Salisbury, (not vnderstanding that the bad odour of their conspiracy was come to the King) enter with foure hundred armed men about * twylight into Windsore Castle, from whence he was departed to London. But God (whose peculiar Wards and pupils Princes are) hauing deliuered the King out of that most certaine perill, did also sodainely dissipate the further enterprises of the Conspirators. The Lord Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington, one of the chiefe, was not in this defeat at Windsore, but houered in London, attending the successe, there to raise meanes and men, and to worke such other masteries as hee could, and afterward (for wee credite Walsingham who liued in that time, and neare the p'ace, and saw, and diligently noted things, rather then some * others) vpon the certaine report of the Kings safety sought to flie away by water.

* Hall apud Holinshed pag. 515.

(16) The two Earles missing their hoped pray, though greatly greeued, yet necessity and new hopes bid them to dare farther. They therefore came to Sunnings. There the young Queene (King Richards spouse) lay; where hauing spoken certaine big words, to little other purpose then to giue the poore Lady a short comfort, and taken King Henries Badges from such as wore them, saying King Richard was at libertie, and in the midst of an army of one hundreth thousand thousand friends at Pomfret; they proceed to Wallingford, then to Abingdon, and so to Circester. The rumors vsed by them to encrease their numbers were; that Henry of Lancaster (meaning the King) was fled with his sonnes and friends to the Tower of London, and that King Richard was escaped. Maudlen also, one of Richards Chapleins, tooke vpon him the *person of his said Lord, the more strongly to seduce the multitude, by so bold and perillous a fiction. Thus seemed they to fit their words and sute their Arts to the place. At Sunning, Richard (they said) was at Pomfret, for there the guile had beene transparent; but at Circester, Richard was not at Pomfret, but present.

*Ex Anonym. apud Io. Stow. Annal. Holinsh. p. 515. Polyd. Virg. li. 21.

(17) Howbeit the successe was not answerable to the deuise; for, besides, that King Henry was in the heart of his strengths at London, where sixe * thousand men were put into a readinesse, and would come vpon them like a storme, the Townesmen of Circester assailed the Lords, tooke them, and (because their Towne was fired of purpose by some of their followers, the better to recouer them while the quenching found the people employment,) haled them forth, and without longer tarriance seuered their heads from their bodies: The Earle of Huntington, with a trusty Knight of his, Sir Iohn * Sheuele, hauing (after the faile at Windsore) in vaine attempted to escape by Sea, was taken by the Commons at * Pitwel (perhaps Prittlewel) in Essex, brought first to Chelmsford, and lastly to Pleshie, the house of the late Duke of Gloucester, (whose Ghost a tragicall Poet would suppose did haunt his persecutors for reuenge,) where, partly also by this Earles instigation, the said Gloucester was first arrested. The Commons (out of whose hearts the image of that Duke was not vanished) at * the Countesse of Herefords instigation who was the Dukes widdow, tooke satisfaction vpon the Earle, with the escheate of his head, which there was sundred from his shoulders. The Lord Spenser called Earle of Gloucester (one of the Conspirators) had like execution done vpon him, by the Commons, at Bristoll. Some other of them were put to death at Oxford, and some at London; where Iohn Maudlen the counterfeit Richard, who as it seemes was a beautifull and goodly person) and one William Ferby were drawne, hanged and headed. The Bishop of Carlile neuertheless was by the Kings clemency preserued aliue after the condemnatory sentence. There were * nineteene in all (whereof two had beene Dukes) put to death for this conspiracy, most of which were men of speciall note.

(18) The designes and misfortunes of King Richards friends being made knowne vnto him, could not but work strongly in a soule oppresst with griefe; but whether so strongly as to make him resolue by voluntary abstinence to starue himselfe (as * the fame went) may bee doubted, though it be past doubt that King Henry was not sorry he was dead howsoeuer. That he was starued seemes very plaine; though, as it is not certaine, (neither yet vnlikely) that King Henry was priuy to so foule a parricide, so neither is it knowne, but that Richard might as well be starued of purpose, * as starue himselfe. Master * Stow (a man for honest industry very praise-worthy) saith that king Richard was fifteene dayes and nights together kept in hunger, thirst and cold, till he dyed. How true that was in the circumstance, who knows? but in the poynt of staruing hee is clearely with Walsingham: and a * Knight liuing about those times calleth it a death neuer before that time knowne in England. *Harding also, liuing vnder King Edward the fourth, agrees of the rumour of staruing.* Master Cambden saith of Pomfret Castle, that it is a place principū cæde & sanguine infamis, but seemes to insinuate, that some other torments were most wickedly practised vpon this King, as made out of the way with hunger, cold, & vnheard-of torments. * Polydor therefore in this may bee beleeued, who writes of this poore deposed Monarke, that, (which may well be called vnheard-of torments) his diet being serued in, and set before him in the wonted Princely manner, he was not suffered either to taste, or touch thereof. Idle therefore seemes * his dreame, who writes hee was murthered in the Tower, and not more credible *theirs, who tell vs of Sir Peirs of *Exton*s assault, and the murther basely by him acted vpon this most miserable Princes person: but much more are * they to blame who negligently for credit of the fable quote Walsingham, in whom no syllable of such a thing is found. Onely * Hector Boetius wils vs to beleeue that Richard fled disguised into Scotland, was discouered to King Robert, and honourably entertained, but Richard who would no more of the world, gaue himselfe wholly to contemplation, and both liued, died, and was buried at Striueling. Which fond fable hath neuertheless somewhat in it, for that some personated Richard might so doe is neither impossible, nor improbable, and indeed it was so.

(19) The late King Richard thus cruelly and heinously murthered (for in regard of pining death the seeming fable of his fight with Sir Piers of Exton was a sport, it being both noble and full of comfort, for a man of honour and courage to die with weapon in hand) King Henry causeth his dead body to bee brought vp to London. O Henry, if thou wert Author, or but priuie, (though for thine owne pretended safety, and for that errors cause which is lewdly misse-called reason of state) of such a murther; we doe not see, how the shewing of the people his vncouered face in Pauls, did either conceale, or extenuate the execrable crime. But to let the world know, that there was no hope nor place for a Richard, that course was vsed, which may the rather confirme the truth of his enfamishment: for a violent death by braining could not but deforme him too much: and it is most probable that such a death would be sought, as might least appeare. Surely he is not a man, who at the report of so exquisite a barbarisme, as Richards enfamishment, feeles not chilling horror and detestation; what if but for a iustly condemned galley-slaue so dying? but how for an annointed King, whose Character (like that of holy Orders) is indeleble? The tragicall spectacle of his dead body (perhaps because it moued too much both pittie and enuie) was after a while transported without honor to Langley in Hartfordshire, where the last rites were performed by the Bishop of Chester, the Abbots of S. Alban and Waltham, but neither King Henry present, (as at the exequies in London) and the great Lords and such other as were, had * not so much as a funerall feast bestowed on them for their labour. But Henry the fift, in the first * yeare of his raigne with great honour did afterward cause those royall remaines to be interred in the Sepulture of his Ancestors at Westminster. Among the riming Latine verses of his Epitaph, ye may maruell to reade these, considering vpon what points he was triced out of Maiestie and State;

Ecclesiam fauit, elatos suppeditauit,
Quemuis prostrauit, regalia qui violauit.

Fabians English of them:

The Church he fauoured, casting the proud to ground,
And all that would his royall State confound.

The said Authour therefore Robert Fabian, obseruing the scope of those lines (to dampe their force) doth vnder-write and annex this Stanza, with much greater discreation then elegancy:

But yet alas, though that this meeter or rime,
Thus doth embellish this noble Princes fame,
And that some Clerke which fauoured him sometime,
List by his cunning thus to enhance his name,
Yet by his Story appeareth in him some blame:
Wherefore to Princes is surest memory,
Their liues to exercise in vertuous constancy.

From thence is carried to Langley, and afterward to Westminster.

More

More tart and ſeuere is the cenſure of Gower vpon this Prince, one of whoſe verſes * Stow giues vs thus,

* Annal.

So God doth hate ſuch rulers as, here viciouſly do liue.

That beautifull picture of a King ſighing, crowned in a chaire of eſtate, at the vpper end of the Quire in Saint Peters at Weſtminſter, is ſaid to be of him, which witneſſeth how goodly a creature he was in outward lineaments.

(20) King Henry, to diuert the humors and eyes of the people from the remembrance of this Tragedie, prepareth now a puiſſance, therewith to inuade Scotland; ſome ſubiects whereof, together with their Admirall Sir Robert Logon a Scottiſh Knight, were taken at Sea by certaine Engliſh ſhips. But K. Henry may ſeeme to haue done any thing rather then to haue made a warre; for albeit he did ſome hurt by * waſting the Country, yet did not the Scots offer battell, and the reſt will well appeare in theſe words of * Boetius: He did ſmall iniuries to the people thereof: for hee deſired nought but his banner to be erected on their wals. He was euer a pleaſant enemy, and did great humanity to the people in all places of Scotland where he was lodged. Finally, he ſhewed to the Lords of Scotland, that he came into their Realme rather by counſell of his Nobles, then for any hatred he bare to Scots. Soone after he returned into England. Whether the remembrance of the curteſies ſhewed to his Father Duke Iohn, or the feare of his owne great ſtate ſo neere to an ouerthrow by the late furious conſpiracy, wrought theſe gentle effects, it was not long before the euent ſhewed, that his prouidence in not creating new acerbities was therein needfull.

(21) For albeit the face of England ſeemed ſmooth, yet God thruſt a thorne into King Henries ſide, when and where he little expected; for the Welſh, whom former Kings of England had ſo yoaked, and ſubiected, did contrary to all mens expectation, breake forth into open acts of hoſtility, vnder the conduct of a Gentleman of that Nation, ſurnamed Glendowr, of the Lordſhip of Glendowr in Merionithſhire, whoſe owner he was; the wrath and iuſtice of heauen is alwaies ſo well furniſhed with meanes to exerciſe the mightieſt, thoſe chiefly at whoſe amendment God aimes by chaſtiſement. The originall of ſo great an euill was in the ſeed but little, as but this: Owen Glendowr, * whom the Welſh call the ſonne of Gruffith Vachan, deſcended of a younger ſonne of Gruffith ap Madoc, Lord of Bromfield, was at firſt a Student of the common lawes, and an Vtter Bariſter, (but not therfore an Apprentiſe of Law, as Doctor Powell miſtakes, for an Apprentiſe of the Law, is he that hath beene a * double Reader) did afterward ſerue the late King Richard in place of an Eſquire, and was well beloued of him, but in King Henries time (retiring himſelfe as it ſeemes to his Mannour of Glendourdwy, the L. Gray of Ruthen entred vpon a peece of common, which lay betweene Ruthin and Glendowr, which Owen (deſpite the Lord Gray while Richard continued King) had formerly holden, though not without contention. Owen (a man of high courage, and impatient of force) armes hereupon, and encounters the Lord Gray in the field, where he ſcattered the ſaid Lords people, and tooke him priſoner, as hereafter will elſewhere be touched.

(22) It ſeemes herein that hee had forgotten the lawes which he had formerly ſtudied, and wherein he had beene a licentiate; for ſhortly after, as hee had trodden law vnder foote, ſo did hee alſo caſt off loyalty, burning and deſtroying the Lord Grays inheritances, and killing ſundry his ſeruants. The King aduertiſed hereof, paſſeth with an Army into Wales, burnes, kils, and takes ſuch reuenge as that time would permit. Meane-while, Owen (whom pride and folly armed to the farther ruine of his Country) with his truſtieſt friends (which were not few) withdrawes into the inexpugnable faſtneſſes of Snowdon, where during this tempeſt, hee kept his head ſafe. Shortly after the King with ſuch riches and ſpoyles as thoſe Parts had afforded, returnes. His next moſt noted action was peaceable. For one of the houſe of Palæologus, and Emperor of Conſtantinople, came into England to pray ſome ſuccour againſt the Turke, and vpon the day of Saint Thomas the Apoſtle, was met at Blackeheath by King Henry, highly feaſted, richly preſented, and his charges borne till departure. (23) In a Parliament held the next yeare, * by reaſon of the numbers of Lolards, (ſo called) encreaſing, the puniſhment for them enacted, was burning. And in the ſame yeare alſo, the Articles of peace being firſt agreed vpon betweene the two Nations, Engliſh and French (notwithſtanding that they had denyed to match with the young Prince of Wales, * becauſe the former marriage with Richard thriued ſo badly) the Lady Iſabel who had beene crowned Queene of England, as Spouſe of the late King, was now ſent backe into France, after a moſt Princely manner, ſhee being not as yet * twelue yeares old, had * no dowry allowed her in England, for that the marriage was neuer conſummated. Before ſhe was reſtored to her friends, the Lord Henry Piercy, before the Ambaſſadors of both the Nations, where they were met between Callis and Boloigne, proteſted, That the King of England his Maſter had ſent her to be deliuered to her Father, cleare of all bonds of marriage, or otherwiſe, and that he would take it vpon his ſoule, that ſhe was ſound and entire, euen as ſhe was the ſame day ſhe was deliuered to King Richard, and if any would ſay to the contrary he was ready to proue it againſt him by combat. But the Earle of Saint Paul ſaying, he beleeued it to be true, the Lord Piercy tooke her by the hand, and deliuered her vnto the Earle, and then the Commiſſioners of France deliuered certaine letters of receipt and acquitall. (24) Owen Glendowr perſiſting in his pride and diſobedience, made incurſions vpon the Engliſh, doing them great harme, and returning himſelfe without any; but K. Henries danger was greater at home; for treaſon had crept into his moſt ſecret Chamber. In his bed there lay hidden a Galtrop or Engine, with three ſmall yron pikes, long, ſlender and paſſing ſharpe, all of them with their points ſet vpward, but (God ſo diſpoſing it) the King before he laid himſelfe downe, perceiued them, and thereby auoyded that hidden miſchiefe, but who was actor therein it doth not appeare.

(25) This appeares, that the ſplendors of his new regality had drawne vp many thicke and poyſonous clouds of enuy and practiſe, to darken if it were poſſible the farther brightneſſe thereof. Neither was it long before it grew to ſome extremity. For Owen Glendowr vpon the cauſes before-ſaid, waſting the Lord Reynald Grays lands, was encountred by him, as preſuming that Owen and his friends might eaſily be ouercome, but the contrary hapned, for there in fight he loſt very many of his company, and was himſelfe taken priſoner. This fortune made the ſwelling minde of Owen ouerflow in vaine hopes, who compelling the ſaid Lord to marry his daughter, yet obtained hee not his liberty the ſooner, but died (ſay * ſome) in the power of Owen, if perhaps our Author miſtake not the Lord Gray for Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, who indeed did marry ſo after he was alſo ouerthrowne by the ſaid Owen, with the ſlaughter of aboue a thouſand principall perſons of Herefordſhire, aſſembled vnder his conduct, to reſiſt the Welſh inuaſions, and there alſo himſelfe was by treachery taken priſoner.

by the first they *traduced (in libels) Henries actions, so to make him hatefull, and by the second they divulged that * Richard was still aliue, thereby to raise an head of separation. Henry thus galled in his honour, and endangered in the maine, resolued to spare none, vpon whom the crime or concealement was found. The first of them that fell vnder his iustice, was a Priest of Ware, with whom was taken a list, or roll of names which hee had gathered, supposing them such as in regard of benefits receiued, would liue and die for King Richard, which vanitie of his created trouble to many, till it appeared that he had therein wronged them, as persons who were vtterly ignorant both of the man and matter. Whereupon hee was drawne and hanged. The like fate had Walter Baldocke Prior of Lawnd, who confest that he had concealed others councels against the King, though himselfe had acted nothing. A Frier Minor also being taken, with some other of his Order, for like intendments, was asked, What he would doe if King Richard were aliue and present? hee confidently answered, that he would fight for him till death against any whosoeuer; which cost him his life, being drawne and hanged in his Friers weeds. Neither did this hard fortune fall only vpon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Claringdon Knight, (reputed the base sonne of Edward late Prince of Wales) together with an Esquier and seruant of his, finished the affection which they bare to the deceased Richard, by hanging. Not long after eight Franciscan Friers, or Minorites, were taken, conuicted, hanged, and headed for the like causes, which made the King an heauy Lord to that whole Order. It is said, that somewhat before this knot was discouered, the diuell appeared in the habit of a Minorite at Danbury Church in Essex, to the incredible astonishment of the parishioners; for, at the same time there was such a tempest and thunder with great fire-bals of lightning, that the vault of the Church brake, and halfe the Chancell was carried away.

Tho. Walsi. Ypodig. The Diuell appeares in Essex.

(27) But howsoeuer these out-branches were pared away, the rootes of all the practise lay deeper out of sight; for the * Piercies, Henry Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Earle of Worcester, and Henry Hotspur Lord Piercy, because perhaps they thought they had done wickedly in helping to set vp Henry, * beganne to imagine that bloudy mischiefe, which afterward was prosecuted. This malice the late successe of Owen Glendowr against the Lord Mortimer Earle of March, (taken prisoner, as is said, with no little slaughter of his Herefordshire men) did perhaps nourish; for that hee saw an enemy appeare, who was not vnlikely to proue an able member of a greater rebellion. Certainely the King hauing in September led an Army into VVales, to take reuenge vpon his Rebels, was in great danger to haue perished with sodaine stormes and raines, the like whereof none of his people had euer felt or seene, so that after he had done some wasts vpon the Country he returned. The common fame went that Owen was a Coniurer, and had raised those hideous tempests by hellish arts; they seemed so excessiue, which (whether true or false) did yet impart no little strength to the Welsh faction.

(28) The Kings fortune was happier in the North, where his Lieutenant had two faire victories, the one at * Nisbet, and the other at Halidown-hill, neere to a village called Woller. And although the first was not a small one, yet the other deserued the name of a iust battell and garland. To the Scots, hauing with aboue ten thousand men (vnder conduct of Archibald Earle of Dowglasse, whom the Scots nick-named Tyne-man, because he neuer wanne field, though no sort of true manhood was wanting in his person) made great spoiles in England, as farre as to Newcastle, and were now vpon returne; Henry Piercy Earle of Northumberland, the noble Henry Hotspur Lord Piercy his sonne, and George Earle of Dunbar (who fled as you haue heard out of Scotland) with the forces of the Countries thereabout, not meaning to let them to passe in so slight a sort, opposed themselues. The chiefe feate was wrought by the English Archers, who first with their stiffe, close, and cruell stormes of arrowes made their enemies footmen breake, and when the noble Dowglasse descended to the charge with his choisest bands, himselfe being in a most rich and excellently tempered armour, and the rest singularly well appointed, the Lord Piercies Archers making a retreate, did withall deliuer their deadly arrowes, tam viuidè, tam animosè, tam graniter (saith our Monke) so liuely, so couragiously, so grieuously, that they ran through the men of Armes, bored the helmets, pierced their very swords, beate their lances to the earth, and easily shot those who were more slightly armed through and through. There were taken prisoners the Earle of Dowglasse himselfe, (who notwithstanding his armour of the best proofe, had fiue wounds, and lost an eye) Murdake Stewart Earle of Fife, (eldest sonne to Robert Duke of Albanie,) George Earle of Angus, the Earles of * Murrey & Orkney, the Lords Montgomery, Erskin, and Grane, with about fourscore Knights, besides Esquiers and Gentlemen. There were slaine, the Lords Gourdon, and Swyntoun, (Belindens Boetius cals them knights) with sundry other men of honour and marke, beside store of common souldiers. The Riuer Tweed, to shew it selfe meere English, did likewise fight for them, by swallowing about fiue hundreth in his vnknowne depthes, as they, who fled from the battell, sought to passe. This victory hapned vpon Holyrood in haruest. The troubles which afterward hapned, did not onely hinder the Lord Piercy from farther prosecution of such a victory, but eclypsed the honour hee had gotten now, and gaue his daies a bloudy and foule Catastrophe.

The night in which this Lord Mortimer (though some referre it to Owens birth) was borne, all the horses in his Fathers stable, are said to haue beene found standing Belly-deepe in bloud. A fearefull prodigie, as euen then it seemed, but verified afterward in the farre more fearefull euents, when (vpon the quarrell of Mortimers title, by which the house of Yorke claimed,) the horses of warre did not onely stand belly-deepe in bloud, but also swam therein. The mischiefe was already begunne: for Henry Earle of Northumberland (when now his owne and his houses strengths were mightily encreased by this late victory against the Scots, which he vnder-hand seemes to haue conuerted to his secret priuate ends,) closely * animated his brother the Earle of Worcester, and his fiery spirited sonne, against the King, to both their confusions.

one the other in moſt terrible manner, but when they drew neere, nothing was to be found. Of another nature were the fiery attempts of the Piercies. The firſt of them who diſcouered in armes his mortall hatred, was the noble Hotſpur, who (vnder* colour of the Scottiſh warre) made head about Cheſter and the Marches of Wales. To him (by the priuity of Hotſpurs Father,) repaires the naughty olde man the Earle of Worceſter, leauing the young Prince of Wales, and the Princes Houſhold, ouer both which (for their better Gouernment) the King had placed him. Now was the torch of warre lighted vp, and began to blaze, for though the chiefe plot-maſter the Earle of Northumberland was not ioyned to them, as hee did intend, yet were their numbers growne mightily, with which they meant to enter the Towne of Shrewsburie, to make thereof a Seate of warre.

The Kingdome of England to be ſhared among the conſpirators.

(33) This (in our Engliſh Adages) is called to reckon without our hoſt, or to count our Chickens before they are hatched. But though at this time God would haue it ſo, yet who doth not eaſily ſee what a wild horſe a Kingdome (ſo gotten) is, and how hard to ſit, and not to manage onely? Yet it ſeemeth, that if Mortimer, hauing ſo iuſt a title to the Crowne, had openly profeſſed the cauſe of his attempt againſt King Henrie, it might iuſtly haue beene exempted from all ſtaine of diſability. But this partition is *ſaid to haue beene wiſely built vpon a ſound Welſh propheſie of Merlins: as if King Henrie were the Mowldwarp curſed of Gods owne mouth, and Mortimer, Piercie, and Glendowr, the Dragen, Lyon, and Wolfe, which ſhould diuide this Realme betweene them. Surely the Welſh hauing any hand in ſuch a partition, it is not likely they could thinke it had the right feete, if it ſtood not vpon the ſuppoſed Merlins his ridiculous coſenages and riddles. The Engliſh (not to be behind in leaſings,) doe in the meane time euery where ſpread that * Richard was ſafe aliue and in the Caſtle of Cheſter. (34) On the other ſide King Henrie aſſailed with ſo vnexpected ieopardies, defends his cauſe by letters, and ſtrongly puts the blame vpon the accuſers, ſaying, That he maruelled exceedingly, ſeeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henrie his Sonne had the greateſt part of the publike moneys deliuered to them, for defence of the borders againſt Scotland, why they ſhould make that a quarrell, which was a meere calumnie. And to take away all pretence of feare from the Conſpirators, he ſends to the Earles of Northumberland and Worceſter, and to the hot Lord Piercie, a ſafe conduct vnder his royall Seale, by which he ſecures their acceſſe, but vnbridled raſhneſſe (ſaith Walſingham) deſpiſing the royall clemencie, did put on the rigour of rebellion. Meane-while the King armes with all ſpeed againſt the enemy, the rather at the counſell of George Earle of Dunbar, who (like a valiant man at Armes, and a wiſe friend) aduiſed him ſo to doe, before their aduerſaries numbers were too mightily augmented. The King with his ſonne the young Prince of VVales, and a very noble fellowſhip, was now aduanced within ſight of Shrewsbury, as the gallant Piercie ſtood ready to aſſault the Towne. But ſo ſoone as the royall Standard was diſcouered, that enterprize was left off, and he drew out his people (being about fourteene thouſand choiſe and hardy bodies of men) to trie the fortune of warre againſt a well-tride warriour.

Thomas Piercie Earle of Worceſter cauſe of the battell at Shrewsbury.

(35) Peace notwithſtanding (by the exceeding tenderneſſe of the King) had enſued, but that the miſchieuous Earle of VVorceſter, by miſ-reporting & falſifying his Soueraignes words, did precipitate his Nephew into ſudden battell. If there were any praiſe or good example to be drawne out of ſo deteſted bloodſhed, as that of ciuill warre, we would willingly deſcribe vnto you the order and actions, but we cannot too ſoone paſſe ouer ſuch mournefull obiects, which are rather to be celebrated with teares then triumphs. There is no doubt but Piercie, Dowglas, and the reſt fought terribly. Why ſhould we admire that in them? So doe Lyons, Tygers, and Beares, and yet we admire them not. Where was dutie, where conſcience, where the other reſpects, of which onely we are called men? Let none of vs honour, or imitate them, in whoſe eies the price of Engliſh bloud is ſo vile, as that (for priuate fanſies) they can be content to confound all regards, and make ſport for common foes, with mutuall maſſacres. Therefore we will content our ſelues with the knowledge of Gods part in this daies worke, who gaue the garland to the King, though the firſt arrowes flew from the Piercies Archers.

The terrible battell at Shrewsbury.

(36) The Kings courage was not ſmall in the fight as neither was the danger, the young Prince of VVales alſo (being then firſt to enter himſelfe into the ſchoole of bloud and battell,) gaue no ſmall hopes of that perfection which afterward ſhone in him, being wounded with an arrow in the face. The Lord Piercie and Earle Dowglas (then * whom the wide world had not two brauer Champions) in ſteed of ſpending themſelues vpon the multitude, ſet the point of their hopes vpon killing the King, as in whoſe perſon they were ſure ten thouſand fell. For this cauſe they moſt furiouſly ruſhed forward with ſpeares and ſwords; but the noble Earle of Dunbarre, diſcouering their purpoſe, drew the King from the place which he had choſen to make good, and thereby in likelyhood for that preſent ſaued his life, for the Standard-royall was ouerthrowne, and (among other valiant men) the * Earle of Stafford, Sir Walter Blunt, the Kings Knight, and the Standard-bearer himſelfe was ſlaine, ſuch was the fury of theſe ſodaine thunderbolts. That day the Dowglaſſe ſlew with his owne hands three in the Kings Coat-armour, (perhaps ſome in Heralds Coats) though * Boetius yet ſaw a fourth. out of the field. Who notwithſtanding, like a valiant Prince, did re-enforce the fight, performing maruels in armes with his owne hands. The ſlaughter could not be ſmall on both ſides, the Archers ſhooting ſo continually, and the men of armes doing their vtmoſt for about the ſpace of three whole houres.

(37) That which gaue an end to this wofull work was the death of Hotſpur, who riding in the head of the battell in defiance of danger and death, was (by an vnknowne hand) ſuddenly killed, with whoſe fall (as if his whole army had had but one heart) the courages of all others fell into feet, which now altogether they truſted to. But the King abhorring to make farther execution of the miſ-guided multitude, ſuffered them to ſhift for themſelues. The Earles of Worceſter, and Dowglaſſe, Sir Richard Vernon, the Baron of Kindlaton, and diuers others were taken. Of the Kings ſide was ſlaine (beſides the Earle of Stafford) ten new Knights, whoſe names (as dying in an honeſt cauſe) deſerue immortality, and were Sir * Hugh Shorly, Sir Iohn Cliſton, Sir Iohn Cokain, Sir Nicholas Gauſell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir Iohn Caluerly, Sir Iohn Maſſie, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Robert Gauſell, and Sir Thomas Wendeſley, who dyed of his hurts not long after, as moſt of the other did about the Standard; all which fighting for their ſpurres, (as being knighted but that morning) bought them with the honourable loſſe of their whole bodies; there were alſo ſlaine many Eſquiers, and Gentlemen, and about one thouſand and fiue hundreth common ſouldiers, beſides three thouſand ſorely wounded. On the other part, (omitting that ſecond Mars, the Lord Piercy, who drew a ruine after him ſutable to his Spirit and greatneſſe) there fell moſt of all the Eſquiers and Gentlemen of Cheſhire, to the number of two hundred, and about fiue thouſand common ſouldiers. This battell was ſtricken neere to Shrewsbury vpon a Saturday, the one and twentieth of Iuly, and the Eue of Saint Marie Magdalen.

(38) The Earle of Worceſter (the ſeducer and deſtroyer of his noble Nephew Hotſpur, and therefore if but for that, very worthy to haue died) Sir Richard Vernon Knight, and the Baron of Kindlaton had their heads cut off vpon the Monday following. Hotſpurs body had beene buried by permiſſion, but vpon other aduiſe, the King cauſed it to be drawne out of the graue, beheaded, quartered, and the parts ſent into diuers Citties of the Kingdome. The Earle of Northumberland (pretending to come with forces to the Kings ayde) was empeached by the Earle of Weſtmorland, and Robert Waterton who had raiſed a great hoaſt. Northumberland taking neither of them for friend, wheeles about, and returnes to his Caſtle of Warkworth. But what can be ſecure to a ſubiect againſt the victorious armie of a martiall King? The Earle knew as much, manifeſtly feeling the irrecouerable maimes of his Houſe in the loſſe of his ſonne and brother, and therefore ſhaped his courſe accordingly. The King therefore being altogether as prudent as fortunate, hauing ſetled the ſtate of things in the Marches about Shrewsbury, ſets forward to the City of Yorke, from thence to take order for ſuch perils as he foreſaw might happen. He ſetled himſelfe the more ſeriouſly and entirely to this needfull worke; for that his Ambaſſadors had effected an abſtinence from warre with Fraunce, till the firſt of March, which pauſing ſpace though it might ſeeme little, was not a little welcome to the King, the Realme of England being then ſo full of dangerous perturbations. While he was yet at Yorke, hee commands the Earle of Northumberland to come thither in perſon, which he accordingly did vpon the morrow after the day of Saint * Laurence, and that alſo with a ſmall traine in the nature of an humble ſutor. He could not in reaſon hope for the wonted familiar fauour of the King, neither had he yet, for it was accounted matter of grace, that his life was pardoned though his meanes and libertie was abridged, the King allowing onely neceſſary maintenances. The life of Princes is like a perpetuall motion. The Northerne Countries are now ſetled, but hath the King therefore any the more reſt? Nothing leſſe; for VVales & the troubles thereof call him thither. What ſhould he doe? Money, the Cement and ſoldure of all ſuch actions, (for Armies cannot otherwiſe bee held together) vtterly failes. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſees the needs and vſes of his Soueraigne, and like a Father ſupplies him with a Tenth, which the Clergie at their Metropolitans motion, conſent to giue: vpon the ſtrength whereof, the King knowes how farre he may proceed againſt the VVelſh in his good time.

(39) Toward the relieſe of theſe his neceſſities, the valiant exployts of VVilliam de VVilford an Eſquire, who was in the meane time abroad for the king vpon the narrow Seas, brought ſome aſſiſtance, certainely ſtore of contentation; for he tooke forty lawfull prizes, laden with yron, oyle, ſope and Rochell wine, to the number in all of a thouſand tunne, vpon the Coaſts of Britaine, and in his returne ſet fortie ſaile on fire; and to make the Britaines know that he was not onely a man of his hands at Sea, he comes on ſhore at Penarch, burnes Townes and houſes about ſixe leagues into the Countrey, and afterward did as much for them at the Towne of Saint Mathewes, which he conſumed with flames, and waſted the land for three myles about. The French, not to ſeeme ſlow to like miſchiefes, land at the VVight, but were compelled with loſſe to betake themſelues again vnto their Fleet, with farre worſe ſucceſſe then the Britons vnder the conduct of the Lord of Caſtell had not long before, who landing at Plymmouth inuaded, tooke and burnt it.

(40) The King hauing humbled the Earle of Northumberland in ſuch ſort as you heard, lookes againe vpon him with an eye of compaſſion and fauour, not without a ſecret reſpect to his owne ſafety; and he had little appetite to augment enmities, but to allay them rather, whereas by this gracious vſage of that Earle, (for he reſtored him fully to all) he now thinkes thoſe North-parts ſufficiently ſecured. This reſtitution was made to the Earle in the Parliament holden at London, about the middeſt of Ianuary, where the King obtained an vn-vſuall Taxe or Subſidie, of which (that it might not be drawne into example) no Record, nor writing was ſuffered to remaine. Some part of the gold which the King thus drew into the Eſchequer, he had occaſion to beſtow at this time. For, there preſented themſelues vnto him, a boiſtrous troupe of plaine VVeſtern-men, who brought to the Kings view three Lords, and twenty Knights of note; Theſe were priſoners, whom the Countrey people about Dartmouth in Deuonſhire, had gotten in plaine fight. The King was therefore giue to vnderſtand, that the Lord of Caſtell the Briton, who had formerly burnt Plymmouth, thinking to doe the like at Dartmouth, came on ſhore with his forces, where theſe and the like people fiercely encountred him; at which time their Women (like Amazons) by hurling of flints and pebles, and by ſuch other Artillery, did greatly aduance their Husbands and Kinsfolkes victory. The Lord of Caſtel himſelfe, and many beſides, were ſlaine, theſe other were ſaued as more of them might haue beene, but that the ignorance of language alike confounded the cries of indignation and pitty. They therefore in reward of this hazard and ſeruice, doe pray they might reape ſome commodity by their Captiues. It was but reaſon; wherefore the King, who tooke pleaſure to talke with the luſty VVeſtern-men himſelfe, cauſeth their purſes to be ſtuft with golden Coyne, reſeruing the priſoners to repay himſelfe with aduantage out of their ranſomes. The like good fortune againſt Owen Glendowr and the Welſh would haue gladded him indeed; but they burne and deſtroy the Marches, they kill and captiuate the people, and partly by force, partly by fraud, get many Caſtles, ſome of which they raze, and fortifie others,

The King vſeth his victory mercifully.

A new falſe King Richard.

(41) It is more ſtrange that King Richard was not ſuffered to be dead, after he had ſo long a time beene buried. Serlo, who had beene a Gentleman of his Chamber, hauing heard that King Richard (his royall and gracious Maſter) was ſecretly abiding in Scotland, left the fauour of the French Court to ſee him, but it was not worth his ſo much loue and labour; for hee that bare the name, was but an Impoſtor. Loath yet to let the opinion die, becauſe it might do King Henrie harme; Serlo affirmes, that Richard was aliue. What cunning madneſſe is ſo great which hath not ſome great fooles or other to ſupport it? The old Counteſſe of Oxford (mother to the late Duke of Ireland) will needes perſwade her ſelfe and others in Eſſex, that Richard was aliue: certaine it is, that ſhe deſired it might be true. To make others more firmely beleeue the ſame, ſhee ſecretly gaue ſiluer and gilt Harts (the badges which King Richard vſed to beſtow vpon his followers) as tokens. Hitherto the deuiſe held out, for it had no great danger in it; but Serlo ſeeing the neceſſitie of greater friends, which appeared not, grew weary, and knowing that Sir William Clifford knight, Captaine of Berwicke, had receiued ſundry fauours from King Richard, hopes by him to be furniſhed with mony, to beare his charges out of Scotland into France. Clifford farre otherwiſe minded, ſeizeth vpon Serlo, as a fit meanes to reconcile himſelfe with the King, in whoſe high diſpleaſure he ſtood, (for that hee had continued his charge in Berwicke contrary to expreſſe commandement) and carrieth him to the King, who was then come to the Caſtle of Pomfret, being weakned with theſe rumors, and ſuſpecting that the chiefe neſt of danger lay in the North; whither the Earle of Northumberland brought his grand-children (as pledges) to aſſure the King of his loyalty: thither alſo Sir William Clifford brings poore Serlo, who both confeſſeth the practiſe, as alſo that he had a guilty hand in the murther of the Duke of Gloceſter, which made him farre more odious then the other forgery. The crimes being manifeſt, Serlo is drawne from Pomfret beginning his paine, where he had his doome, and at London knits vp the Tragedy in a halter. The Counteſſe of Oxford for this falſhood loſt all her goods, being moreouer committed to cloſe priſon. To make this impoſture the more probable and paſſable, Serlo had cauſed King Richards ſignet to be counterfeited, wherewith he ſealed ſundry conſolatory and exhortatory letters to his friends, indited in King Richards name; whereupon many in Eſſex gaue credit to the Counteſſe, and among the reſt ſome Abbots of that County. Into this ſmoke did all the deuiſe euaporate.

Serlo, a ſpreader of that impoſture, deliuered to the King.

(42) And no leſſe ſmokie was both the deuiſe and ſucceſſe of certaine in the Parliament (held this yeare at Couentry, & called the * lack learning Parliament, either for the vnlearnedneſſe of the perſons, or for their malice to learned men) where, to ſupply the K^s. wants, a bil was exhibited againſt the Temporalties of the Clergy; but by the courage of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, (who told them, it was the enriching of themſelues, not of the King, which they reſpected in their ſacrilegious petitions) and by the gracious care of the King, (who vowed to leaue the Church in better ſtate then he found it, rather then in worſe,) their motion vaniſhed to nothing, but the infamous memory of the attempters. It is obſerued that *a Knight the chiefe ſpeaker in this bill againſt the Clergy, had beene himſelfe a Deacon, and ſo himſelfe firſt aduanced by the Clergy. With great reaſon therefore did our fore-fathers diſtinguiſh the people into the learned and lewd, inferring truely that ſuch commonly were lewd, who were not learned, and that lewd and wicked were but two words of one ſignification, as in this Parliament wel appeared, whoſe Commons might enter Common with their cattel for any vertue which they had more then brute Creatures.

(43) Twiſe after this, betweene Chriſtmas and Palme-Sunday, the King aſſembled the States againe, once at London, & then at Saint Albans, for the cauſe of money, but with much diſtaſte, the Peeres of the Land riſing from the laſt Seſſion thereof meanely contented, as it well appeared not long after, though to the enterpriſers ruine. Thomas Mowbray Earle Marſhall, one of the chiefe men which diſliked the carriage of publike matters, drawes Richard le Scrope Archbiſhop of Yorke into a conſpiracy, in full hope that Henry Piercy Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of Yorke, and the common people would aſſiſt their cauſe, which was gloſed with the ſpecious pretence of redreſſing publique abuſes, hapning through the Kings default. The Earle of Weſtmerland hearing of this attempt, wherein the Earle Marſhall and the Archbiſhop were leaders of the people, gathers a force to encounter them, but perceiuing himſelfe too feeble, he betakes himſelfe to fraud, and by faining to like the quarrell, got them both into his power, and preſented them as an acceptable oblation to the King, who about Whitſontide comes to Yorke, where (albeit the Earle of Weſtmerland had promiſed them their liues) as well the Archbiſhop, as the Earle Marſhall were beheaded. But the next yeare the Pope excommunicated all ſuch as had a hand in putting the Archbiſhop to death. It was ſaid of Tiberius * Cæſar in a Satyricall libell,

-regnabit ſanguine multo,

(44) This the King verified in his perſon, who comming out of baniſhment, could not ſupport his Title and eſtate, but by ſhedding much bloud of ſubjects. For, not contented with thoſe two liues, he purſueth the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf, with an inuincible Armie of ſeauen and thirty thouſand men: but they vnable to make head againſt ſo mightie a force, take Berwicke for refuge. Thither the King marcheth, at the ſound whereof, they both diſtruſtfull of their ſafetie, flie into Scotland, where the Lord Flemming entertains them. Berwicke vpon hope of ſuccours out of Scotland, (which gladly nouriſhed the Engliſh miſeries, and the Engliſh theirs) refuſed to render, whereupon the King plants a battering-piece againſt a Tower in the wall; which as it threw downe the halfe thereof with one ſhot, ſo did it quite ouerthrow all the deſendants courages, who preſently yeelded the place vpon hard and deſperate termes, for they were partly hanged, and partly empriſoned. After * Berwicke was thus recouered, the King takes Alnwicke, and all other Caſtles belonging to the Earle, and thinking the like happineſſe would ſhine vpon him in Wales, he croſſeth ouer thither, where it fell out farre otherwiſe, not by the manhood of the Welſh but by the ſodaine rage of waters which deſtroied his carriages & about fifty wains (as was ſaid) laden with much treaſure: therefore he returnes to Worceſter. Owen Glendowr the chiefe captaine of the VVelſh Nation, expecting and fearing a reuenge, had before this time confederated himſelf with the French, who in 140. ſhips arriued at Milford. Hauen to the aide of Owen, hauing well-neere firſt loſt all their horſes in the paſſage for want of freſh water. The Lord Berkley and Henry de Pay (by what means appeares not) burnt fifteene of that number in the harbour. They made the entrance of their warre by laying ſiege to the Towne of Carmarden in South-VVales, which, the Garriſon being permitted to depart with bagge and baggage, was yeelded.

(45) The King being againe in neede of money, after long vnwillingneſſe and delay, the Parliament furniſhed him, rather ouercome with wearineſſe in contradiction, then for any great good-will. Some of his treaſure was employed, as it ſeemes, vpon ſecret practiſes with the Scots, that the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolfe might be deliuered into his hands, in exchange for ſome Scots; where-whereupon they fled into Wales, and the Scots miſſing their purpoſe, ſlew Dauid Lord Flemming for diſcouering their intention to his diſtreſſed gueſts, (as by the lawes of honour and hoſpitality he was obliged) which filled Scotland with ciuill diſcords. To auoyde the dangers whereof, and to better his education, the King of Scots ſent his ſonne and heire by Sea into France, whom, together with the Biſhop of Orknay, certaine Marriners of Cley in Norfolke ſurprized at Sea, and preſented to the King, who committed him priſoner to the Tower of London. Meane-while the French proſecuting their affaires in Wales, ſent thither eight and thirtie Ships full of Souldiers, of which number the Engliſh tooke eight (the reſt eſcaping in great feare to Wales,) and not long after other fifteene ſayle laden with Waxe and Wine. This fortune, though good, was nothing in regard of the ſeruice which Henry Pay, with certaine Ships of the Cinque Ports, and about fifteene other, exployted vpon a great Fleete, contayning ſixſcore Sayle, whoſe ladings were Yron, Salt, Oyle, and Rochel Wine. The ſame times was a Felon put to death, for hauing in many places of London dared ſecretly to ſet vp Bils, containing newes that King Richard was aliue. The fearefull plague of peſtilence ſlew multitudes of people through the Realme, chiefly in London, where, within a ſhort ſpace it deſtroyed thirtie thouſand. That moſt renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knolls, who had led ſo many liuing men to their honourable deaths in battell, was now captiued himſelfe by death vpon the fifteenth day of Auguſt. His fame grew principally by martiall deedes in the great Warres of France, vnder Edward the third, but ſpred and ſetled it ſelfe by good workes, among which the goodly Stone-bridge at Rocheſter in Kent was one.

(46) In the meane ſpace, the wars of Wales were managed by Prince Henry, who tooke the Caſtle of Aberiſtwith; but Owen Glendowr ſoone after got it againe by faire fraud, and thruſt into it a Garriſon of his owne. Thus Owen proſpered for a time; but the Earle of Northumberland, and Lord Bardolf, forſaking Wales, & ſeeking to raiſe a force in the North, were encountred by the Sherife of Yorkeſhire, who after a ſharpe conflict ſlew the Earle in the Field, and ſo wounded the Lord Bardolf, that he dyed thereof. The Earles head was cut off, which being firſt ignominiouſly carryed through London, was fixed vpon the Bridge. The King hauing thus vanquiſhed his chiefe enemies, went to Yorke, where inquiries were made for the Earles adherents, of which he condemned, ranſomed, and empriſoned many. The Abbot of Hales, becauſe he was taken fighting on the Earles behalfe, had ſentence to die, which was executed vpon him by hanging. In forraine and tranſmarine parts, the Kings affaires had mixt ſucceſſe; for Edmund Earle of Kent, at the ſiege of Briant in Britaine, was ſtrucken with a quarrell into the head, whereof he died; but yet after he had firſt taken the ſaid Caſtle, and leueld it with the earth.

Platina.

(47) The peace of Chriſtendome hauing beene long tempeſtuouſly troubled by a Schiſme, rayſed by ambition of oppoſite Popes, whereof the one was choſen at Rome, the other at Auinion, by contrary factions of the Cardinals; A generall Councell was ſummoned to be held at Piſa in Italie, whither the King of England ſent his Ambaſſadors, and the Clergie elected Robert Alum * Chancellour of Oxford, and Biſhop of Sarum, to ſignifie, * that vnleſſe both the Popes would giue ouer their Papacie, neither of them ſhould thence-forward be acknowledged for Pope. The King in his letter then ſent to Pope Gregory chargeth him (as Platina likewiſe doth) with Perjurie, and that this Papall emulation had been the cauſe of the murther of * more then two hundreth and thirtie thouſand Chriſtians ſlaine in warres. There aſſembled a great number of Cardinals, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and mitred Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander 5. (a man * trained vp at Oxford, where he tooke degree in Theologie) rejecting the two others, who long and bitterly had contended for the place. The King alſo cals his Parliament to find out meanes for more money, to the cuſtody and charge whereof he ordained Sir Henry Scrope, creating him Treaſurer, as Thomas Beaufort the Kings halfe-brother Lord Chancellour. In which Parliament was reuiued the ſacrilegious Petition of ſpoyling the Church of England of her goodly patrimonies, which the pietie and wiſdome of ſo many former ages had congeſted. But the King (who was bound by oath and reaſon to preſerue the flouriſhing eſtate of the Church) deteſted their wicked propoſition, and for that cauſe denied all other their requeſts. The Duke of Burgundies prouiſions which he had made to reduce Callis to the French dominions, and ſtored at Saint Omars, were conſumed with caſuall fire to aſhes.

(48) About theſe times the great and bloudie factions betweene the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleance brake forth. The cauſe was for a murther committed vpon Lewis (brother to the French King, and father of the ſaide Duke of Orleance) as he came late one night from the Queenes lodging, who at that time lay in of a childe. The murtherers * to preuent purſuit, ſtrewed galthrops behinde them. The Duke of Burgundie juſtified the fact, for that Lewis had (as he ſaid) laboured with the Pope to put the King from his Seate, vpon pretence that he was as vnfit to gouerne as euer Childericke was, whom Pope Zacharie pronounced againſt. This prepared the way for that ſcourge wherewith God meant to chaſtice the pride and ſinnes of France. Each partie ſought to fortifie it ſelfe with friends, aſwell at home as abroad. The Duke of Burgundie had the King and the Dolphin on his ſide; the other had the Kings of Nauar and Arragon, the Dukes of Berrie and Britaine, with many of the mightieſt Earles and Lords. The Duke of Burgundie, (who together with the King and the face of gouernement, kept in Paris) perceiuing his aduerſaries ſtrengths to be more then his owne, offers to the King of England, a daughter of France in marriage with the Prince, and many great promiſes, ſo as he would joyne in defence of the King, and ſend ouer competent forces; whereunto he is ſaid to haue anſwered: Our aduiſe is, that you ſhould not in this caſe aduenture battell with your enemie, who ſeemes to proſecute a juſt reuenge for the death of his Father; but labour to aſſwage the diſpleaſure and anger of the exaſperated yong man, by all the good means which are poſſible. If that cannot be, then ſtand vpon your guard, and draw into place of moſt ſafetie, with ſuch force of men as may beſt ſerue for your defence. After all this, if hee will not be appeaſed, you may with the better conſcience encounter him, and in ſuch caſe wee will not fayle (more fully) to aſſiſt, according as you requeſt. For the preſent he ſent ouer the Earles of Arundel and Kyme, and many men of Armes, with plentie of Engliſh Bow-men, who came ſafe to Paris, where they in nothing diminiſhed the ancient glorie of their Nation, but behaued themſelues valiantly.

(5) Theſe Offers being put into the ballance with the Articles, vpon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtained ſuccours, ouer-weighed them ſo farre, that about the midſt of Auguſt, before all thoſe which had bin ſent with the Earle of Arundel to the contrary part, were returned into England, aids were decreed to the Duke of Orleance, to the wonder of all men, who vnderſtood not the ſecret, ſo that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of Yorke, the Earle of Dorſet, and very many other principall men, with a competent puiſſance, were ſent ouer to ayde the Duke of Orleance, the Earle of Angoleſme remaining hoſtage in England, for the ſure paiment of one hundred and nine thouſand Crownes for performance of * the other Articles: They came on ſhore in Normandy; but, whither the confederates moued with the perill into which their Countrey and Nation ſhould by theſe meanes be precipitated, or for ſome other cauſes, (though none indeed ſo iuſt, as the ſorrow and ſhame for their ſo diſloyall a combination with the capitall enemies of France) the Duke of Orleance, (contrary to agreement) came not at the appointed time & place, whereupon the Engliſh burnt, ſpoiled and tooke much riches in the Caſtles, Country and good Townes, wherewith to ſatisfie themſelues, till the Duke of Orleance ſhould ſee them paid. At laſt yet the Dukes of Clarence and Orleance came to a treaty, after which the Engliſh camp roſe peaceably and marcht into Aquitaine there to winter it ſelfe, the Duke of Orleance returning to his owne. While theſe matters were in hand, the Lord of Heyle Marſhall of France, with many other Lords, and about foure thouſand * men of armes, laide ſiege to a certaine ſtrong place in Gaſcoigne; which Sir Iohn Blunt Knight, with three hundred ſouldiers, not only defended, but draue them alſo from the ſiege, taking priſoners twelue of the principal, and about ſixſcore other Gentlemen. * The King liued not to ſee the carriage and fortune of theſe warres, for falling ſicke at Eltham in the Chriſtmas time (at which our ancient authors begin to draw the circles of their yeares) but recouering himſelfe a little, he repaired to London about Candlemas, there to hold a Parliament, the end whereof he liued not to ſee, but vpon the twentieth day of March finiſhed his ſhort but politique and victorious raigne, in peace and honour, had not the injuſtice of his firſt entrance left a diſhonourable ſtaine vpon his worthieſt actions.

The King dieth, hauing raigned thirteene yeares, and ſix moneths, wanting fiue daies, ſaith Walſingh.

(51) The vulgar Chronicles tell vs a ſtrange Story, the truth whereof muſt reſt vpon the reporters. The King, ſay they, lying dangerouſly ſicke, cauſed his Crowne to be ſet on a Pillow at his beds head, when ſuddainely the pangs of his Apoplexie ſeizing on him ſo vehemently that all ſuppoſed him dead, the Prince comming in, took away the Crown; which, his father reuiuing, ſoone miſſed; and calling for his ſonne, demanded, what he meant, to bereaue him of that, whereto hee had yet no right? The Prince boldly replyed; Long may you liue Soueraigne Father to weare it your ſelfe; but all men deeming you were departed to inherite another Crowne, this being my right, I tooke as mine owne; but now doe acknowledge for none of mine; and thereupon he ſet the Crowne againe where he found it. Oh ſonne, (quoth he) with what right I got it, God onely knoweth, who forgiue me the ſinne. Howſoeuer it was got, ſaid the Prince, I meane to keepe and defend it, (when it ſhall be mine) with my Sword, as you by Sword haue obtayned it. Which the King hearing, he entred diſcourſe of aduiſe, ſhewing him that he feared ſome diſcord would ariſe betwixt him and his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, who with better reſpect had borne forth his youth then Prince Henry had done, and whoſe diſtemper was like to breed great troubles, if it were not in time ſtayed. If my Brethren (quoth Henry) will be true ſubjects, I will honour them as my Brethren, but if otherwiſe, I ſhall aſſoone execute juſtice vpon them, as on the meaneſt of birth in my Kingdome. The King rejoycing at this vnexpected anſwere; both prudently and Chriſtianly charged him "before God, to miniſter the law indifferently, to "eaſe the oppreſſed, to beware of flatterers, not to "deferre juſtice, nor yet to be ſparing of mercy. Pu"niſh (quoth he) the oppreſſors of thy people; "ſo ſhalt thou obtaine fauour of God, and loue "and feare of thy Subjects, who whiles they haue "wealth, ſo long ſhalt thou haue their obedience, "but made poore, by oppreſſions, will be ready to "make inſurrections. Rejoyce not ſo much in the "glory of thy Crowne, as meditate on the burthe"nous care which accompanieth it; mingle loue "with feare, ſo thou, as the heart, ſhalt be defended "in the midſt of the body: but know, that neither "the heart without the members, nor a King with"out his Subjects helpe is of any force. Laſtly, "my ſonne loue and feare God, aſcribe all thy victo"ries, ſtrength, friends, obedience, riches, honour, "and all, vnto him; and with the Pſalmiſt ſay with all "thankes, Not vnto vs Lord, not vnto vs, but to thy "holy name be giuen the laud and praiſe.

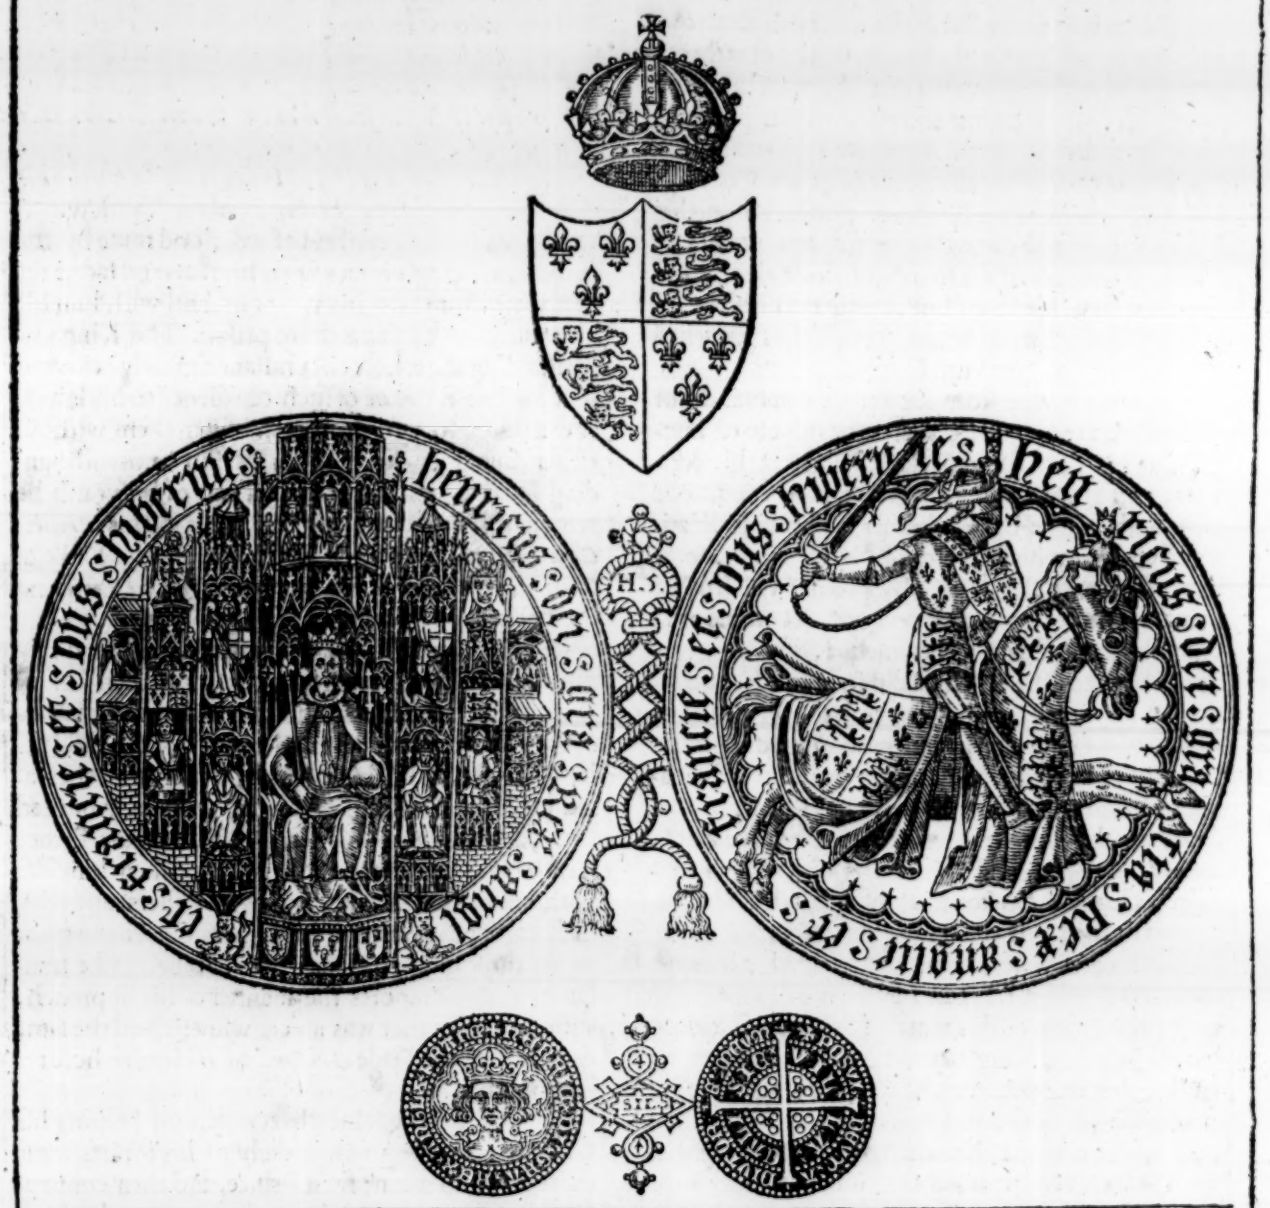
HENRIE THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND: THE TWO AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 52.



CHAPTER XV.

An.D.1412.

AMongst the many Monarchs of this moſt famous Empire, none is found more compleat with all heroicall vertues then is this King, of whoſe life by order and ſucceſſe of Storie we are now to write; which is, Henry of that name the Fifth, the renowne of England, and glory of Wales. Of whom, what was ſpoken of Titus in the flouriſhing times of the Romans, may for the time of his raigne be truely verified in him: both of them being the louely darlings, and delightfull joy of Mankinde. But as Titus is taxed by his Story-Writers, in youth to haue been riotous, profuſe, waſtfull, and wanton, for which (as he ſaith) with the diſlikes of men he ſtept into the Throne; ſo if we will beleeue what others haue writ, Henry * was wilde whiles he was a Prince, whoſe youthfull prankes as they paſſed with his yeares, let vs haue leaue here to rehearſe, and leaue them motiues to our owne vſe, as he made them for his.

Suetonius in vit. Tit. 1. 6.

* Tit. Liuius For.

(2) His birth was at Monmouth in the Marches of Wales, the yeare of Chriſts aſſuming our fleſh, 1388. and the eleauenth of King Richards raigne, his father then a Subject, and Earle of Derby, Leiceſter, and Lincolne, afterwards created Duke of Hereford, in right of his wife, then of Lancaſter, by the death of his father; and laſtly, by election made the Soueraigne of England (that vnfortunate Richard) being depoſed the Crowne. His mother was Mary, ſecond daughter and co-heire of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, and Northampton, high Conſtable of England, * as we haue ſaid.

(3) His young yeares were ſpent in literature in the Academie of Oxford, where in Queenes-Colledge he was a Student vnder the tuition of his Vncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellor of that Vniuerſity, afterwards Biſhop of Lincolne and Wincheſter, and laſtly made Cardinall by the title of Euſebius. But his Father obtayning the Crowne, and himſelfe come come to the age of twelue yeares, had the ſucceſſion thereof entailed on him by Parliament, and accordingly was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Cheſter, and preſently had the Title of the Dukedome of Aquitaine conferred vpon him, the better to effect the thing then intended, which was to haue obtained in marriage yong Queene Iſabel, late Wife to the murthered King Richard, Daughter of Charles the ſixt, King of France.

(4) From Oxford, Prince Henry was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Piercy then Earle of Worceſter made his Gouernour; but being himſelfe falſe to his Father, could giue no good example vnto the ſonne, whoſe hoſtile attempts in the field of Shrewsburie coſt that diſloyall Earle his head, and almoſt had done Prince Henry his life, who in battell againſt him was wounded in the face with an arrow. This marke of his manhood, with the ouerthrow of Hotſpur in that bloudy conflict, were hopefull ſignes of his following ſucceſſe, which preſently were ſeconded with as fortunate proceedings againſt Owen Glendowr that ſcourge of his Country, and Arch-rebell vnto Englands peace, whom this Prince ſo purſued through the vaſt mountaines of Wales, that from the Dennes of thoſe deſerts hee durſt not ſhew his face, but therein periſhed by famine, and natures other wants, though the Prince had then ſcarcely attained vnto ſixteene.

(5) But growne from his tutors command, or controll, and come to the yeares for diſpoſe of himſelfe, as his youth ſtood affected, ſo were his conſorts, and thoſe (many times) whoſe conditions were none of the beſt; whether led by an inclination of youth (which commonly lets the raine looſe vnto Will) or, to know that by proofe, which other Princes doe by report, I will not determine: yet vnto the latter doe I rather incline, knowing that Salomon the wiſeſt of Kings did ſo himſelfe; and rather by Roſſe I am lead, who writeth that Prince Henry in Oxford had in great veneration, ſuch as excelled in vertue or learning, and among many, two he nameth, Thomas Rodban of Merton Colledge a great Aſtronomer, by him preferred to the Biſhopricke of S. Dauids in Wales, and Iohn Carpenter of Oriel Colledge, a learned Doctor in Theologie, whom he aduanced to the See of Worceſter. But let vs heare how his wilde oates were ſowen, and with what increaſe the harueſt was got. The tranſlater of Liuie, who wrote the Storie of this worthie Prince, and dedicated his paines to King Henry his ſonne, affirmeth for truth, that many actions he did, farre vnfitting his greatneſſe of birth; and among other, doth taxe him with no better then theft, who in the raigne of his Father, accompanied with ſuch as ſpent their wits vpon other mens paines, laide waite in the way for his Rents receiuers, and robd them of that which indeed was his owne, when ſometimes in ſhufling he nothing was ſpared, but bare away many knocks, the lenders whereof hee would frankly reward, when they complained vnto him of their loſſes receiued, which euer were abated in the foot of their accounts.

(6) Our learned Knight Eliot ſetting his pen to portrait a perfect Gouernour, recordeth a Story, retaining this Princes great fame, the credit whereof let it lye vpon himſelfe. It chanced (ſaith he) a ſeruant of his to be arraigned for felony at the Kings Bench-Barre, where ſtanding ready to receiue ſentence of death, the Prince had intelligence, and poſted thither, where finding his ſeruant made ſure for ſtarting, commanded his fetters to be ſtrucke off, and the Fellon arraigned to be freed the Court. All men amazed at this his approach and ſpeech: the Chiefe Iuſtice ſtood vp, and ſhewed the Prince that his ſeate was the Kings, that Lawes were the ſinewes of the Common wealth, that himſelfe was ſworne to doe Iuſtice, and muſt yeeld an account for all that he did, that he honored him as the eldeſt ſonne of his Soueraigne, and Prince, but to ſet free the priſoner, he could not, hauing ſo apparantly endangered his life to the Law; and therefore deſired the Prince, if he held him in ſuch eſteeme, to ſaue him by pardon from the King, and not to infringe the Law, which he told him plainely he ſhould not doe.

(7) The Prince inraged to haue the deniall, aſſaied himſelfe to ſet free the Priſoner, which the Chiefe Iuſtice forbad, commanding him vpon his allegiance to ceaſe from ſuch riot, and to keepe the Kings peace: whereat Prince Henry in a fury ſtept vp to the Bench, and gaue the Iudge a blow on the face, who nothing daunted, ſate ſtill, and with a bold countenance, ſpake "thus to the Prince: Sir, I pray you remember your "ſelfe, this ſeate of Iudgement which here I poſſeſſe, is "not mine, but your Fathers, to whom and to his lawes "you owe double obedience. If his Highneſſe be thus "contemned, and his lawes violated by you, that ſhould "ſhew your ſelfe obedient to both, who will obey you "when you are a Soueraigne, or miniſter execution to "the Lawes that you ſhall make? Wherefore, for this "attempt, in your Fathers name, I commit you priſoner "vnto the Kings Bench, there to remaine vntill his "Maieſties pleaſure be further knowne. With which words the Prince greatly abaſhed, ſtood mute by the Iudge, and fixing his eies vpon his reuerend face, preſently laid from him his weapons, and with humble obeyſance done, departed to priſon. The King vnderſtanding the whole circumſtance, greatly reioyced that he had a Sonne of ſuch obedience to his lawes, and a Iudge ſo vpright to adminiſter them without either fauour or feare of the perſon; notwithſtanding for this, and other like actions of his youth, he remoued him from being Preſident of his Priuie-Councell, and placed in his ſtead Thomas Duke of Clarence his ſecond Brother; to Prince Henries no little griefe and diſcontent.

(8) Howbeit his followers were nothing diminiſhed, but his Court frequented more then his fathers, which bred ſome ſuſpition in the crazie Kings head, leſt among his other wilde parts, he would attempt to play with his Crowne; which was encreaſed by his domeſticall flatterers, who daily buzzed new jealouſies into his eares. This made Prince Henry (as Otterborne noteth) to ſtrengthen himſelfe with his chiefeſt friends and well-willers, and with ſuch a troupe repaired to his fathers Court, as a greater in thoſe dayes had not beene ſeene. The tranſlator of Liuie reports the manner of his approach, euen from him that was an eie-witneſſe, and the ſame no leſſe then the Earle Ormond of Ireland, whoſe relation is this.

(9) The King ſomewhat craſie, and keeping his Chamber, hearing newes daily of his ſonnes looſe exerciſes, too meane for a Prince, and their conſtructions euer made to aime at his Crowne, he both began to with draw his fatherly affection, and to feare ſome violence againſt his owne perſon, which when Prince Henry heard of, by ſome that fauoured him of the Kings Councell, in a ſtrange diſguiſe he repayred to his Court, accompanied with many Lords and Noble-mens ſonnes. His Garment was a Gowne of blew Satten, wrought full of Eylet-holes, and at euery Eylet the Needle left hanging by the ſilke it was wrought with: about his arme he ware a dogs-collar ſet full of S.S. of Gold, the Tirets thereof being moſt fine Gold. Thus comming to Weſtminſter, and the Court of his Father, hauing commanded his followers to aduance no further then the fire in the Hall, himſelfe accompanied with ſome of the Kings Houſhold, paſſed on to his preſence, and after his duty and obeyſance done, offered to make knowne the cauſe of his comming. The King weake then with ſickneſſe, and ſuppoſing the worſt, commanded himſelfe to be borne into a with-drawing Chamber, ſome of his Lords attending vpon him, before whoſe feet Prince Henry fel, and with all reuerent obſeruances, ſpake to him as followeth.

Vpon Trinity Sunday. (12) The obſequies of his Father being ſolemnized at Canterbury, and the King in perſon attending the Corps, fit occaſion was giuen vnto Archbiſhop Arundel to complaine of the Wicklifians, (then termed Lollards) great rubs in the waies of the Clergies pride and proceedings; whereof Sir Iohn Old-Caſtle was thought a chiefe, who by his marriage contracted with a kinſwoman of the Lord Cobhams of Cooling in Kent, obtained the title thereof; he was a man ſtrong and valourous, and in eſpeciall fauour with his Prince. This Knight in a Synode aſſembled at London, immediately after the Kings Coronation, was accuſed by them to haue rent Chriſts ſeameleſſe coat, in maintaining VVicliffes doctrine to be taught, eſpecially in the Dioceſſe of London, Rocheſter, & Hereford: againſt whom alſo ſome choiſe Inquiſitors at Oxford, appointed for Hereſies, (though *that whole Vniuerſity had formerly vpheld both Wickliffe and his doctrine,) informed and preſented his name with two hundred fortie ſixe concluſions, which they had collected to be hereticall.

(13) The King incenſed (by the Archbiſhops ſuggeſtions) againſt theſe diſcontented diſcipliners, was further made beleeue that they themſelues had ſet vp Bills in diuers places, threatning that an hundred thouſand perſons were ready for armes, againſt all that withſtood their reformation, and among theſe that Oldcaſtle his knight was reputed the chiefe.
The King graciouſly inclined, heard the Archbiſhops complaint, and being at Kennington, promiſed to conferre with the Lord Cobham himſelfe, which accordingly he did, inſtantly willing him to ſubmit him-ſelfe to the cenſure of the Church, and obedience of the Archbiſhop: But Cobham, no turne-coate from his profeſſion, humbly told the King he owed his ſubjection onely vnto his Majeſtie, whom God had placed in theſe his Dominions, as his onely Vice-gerent to gouerne his people and Subjects, and that himſelfe forced nothing Romes leaden ſword, vnſhea-

Ex Libro Wigorn.

Archbishop Arundels death.

(15) In the meane time the Lord Cobham wrote his * Beliefe, which was very Christian-like, and presented it himselfe to the King, who (being much prepossessed) in no wise would receiue it, but suffered him to be summoned in his presence, and priuie Chamber, when the Knight for his purgation offered an hundred Knights and Esquires, which would not be accepted; then, according to his degree of Order, and law of Armes, he required the single Combat to fight for life or death, with either Christian or Heathen in the quarrell of his faith, the King and Councell onely excepted. This notwithstanding could not be suffered, but needes must he appeare before the Archbishop his Iudge: where, after diuers examinations (in all which he most religiously justified himselfe and his profession) he was condemned of Heresie, and committed Prisoner vnto the Tower of London, whence shortly he escaped, & got into Wales. Vpon which escape great feares were conceiued, especially of the Clergy, the causers of his troubles, and mortall enemies to him & his wel-willers, for the king was confidently (but as it seemeth malitiously) informed; that Oldcastle with his adherents laid for his life, and that in S. Giles Fields neere vnto Holborne twenty thousand were to assemble in hostile manner, with an intent to destroy the Monasteries of Westminster, S. Albans, all the religious houses in London, and the Cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls. The King therefore in person himselfe, after mid-night, with a great Army came into these Fields, where (if we will belieue their professed enemies) foure-score of that faction were apprehended, who said they came to seeke the Lord Cobham. But as the answerer of Copus, from more ancient times hath obserued, that in daies of persecution, such assemblies often had been made to heare the Gospell preached, which otherwise they could not enjoy: so in this place * then ouer-growne with bushes and vnfit for battell, those few were in likelihood assembled vnto Iohn Beuerley, a godly man their Preacher, without any intent of treason, hauing for their Chieftaines no greater persons then Sir Roger Acton a Knight of no great account, a Minister, and a malt-man. But their Apologies we leaue to *others; onely the Lord Cobham could not be found, though the King by Proclamation had promised a thousand markes to his taker, besides many liberties to the City or Towne that would disclose him; whereby (saith VValsingham) it may be ghessed, that the whole Kingdome, well neere, embraced his opinions, which that Friar cals his madnesse. Thirty seauen of that assembly were condemned, whereof seauen were consumed with fire and strangled, Acton, Beuerley, and Murly, were likewise executed.

(16) As the zeale of this King is much commended for his fauours towards his Clergy, so is his Princely pittie in the commiseration of young Percies distresse, whose father Hotspur slaine at Shrewsbury (as wee haue saide) and he by his Grand-father sent into Scotland for security, was there notwithstanding detained a Prisoner, for that Iames their King was forcibly kept in England by Henry, and as they tooke it against all Iustice. But fit occasion being offered for yong Percies release, and exchange made betweene him and Alrede sonne of Robert Duke of Albany, (who had beene taken prisoner at the battell of Halidon) the King restored him not only in bloud, and to grace in his Court, but also inuested his person with the Title and State of his Grand-father, to his owne no little honour, and faithfull seruice

(17) Vpon Archbishop Arundels death, starued by famine as we haue saide, * Henry Chicheley a stout Champion also against Wicliffes doctrine, was with the Kings consent, by the Monkes of Canterbury elected their Archbishop, which the politicke Elect neither accepted nor refused, but left it to the will and pleasure of the Pope: who first tooke snuffe that it so farre proceeded without his direction, yet was soone pacified by Chicheleys submission, and (as saith mine Author) with other Gratulations besides. The man, though not so rich by birth as Arundel was, yet as strong for the Clergy, and more gratious with his Prince, as the sequel proued.

*Henry Chicheley made Archbishop of Canterbury.

(18) The first assaies of both was made knowne in a Parliament holden at Leicester, where in a Bill exhibited, complaint was made, that the temporall Lands giuen to Religious Houses and spirituall persons for deuotion sake, were either superfluous, or disorderly spent; whose reuenues (if better imploied) would suffice for the defence of the Land, and honor of the King; fifteene Earles, fifteene hundred Knights, sixe thousand two hundred Esquires, and one hundred Almes-houses, for the relieue of impotent and diseased persons, and vnto the Kings coffers twenty thousand pounds by yeare. Which Bill (saith Hall) made the fat Abbots to sweate, the proud Priors to frowne, the poore Friers to curse, the silly Nunnes to weepe, and all her Merchants to feare, that Babell would downe: and indeede here it began to fall, when by the authoritie of this Parliament, one hundred and tenne Priories aliant were suppressed, and their possessions giuen to the King, and to his heires for euer.

(19) But to stop the breach of this searching Spring, no better meanes could be found, then to diuert the Parliament with other businesses, and to driue other projects into the Kings minde; whose "head (as this new Arch-Bishop there tolde him) "had the best right to the Crowne of France: for "not onely the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, "and Anjou, the Counties of Gascoigne, Maine, "and the rest, were his lawfull (though vnlawfully "detained) inheritance; but therewithall the whole "Realme of France, as true heire vnto his great "Grand-father King Edward the third, and vnto "Philip the faire, in right of his mother Queene I-"sabell, the onely daughter and Childe liuing of the "said French King. (20) The Archbiſhops vnexpected, but not vn-premeditated Oration thus ended, ſo ſtirred the bloud of the young couragious King, that his heart was all on a flame; and ſo tickled the eares of his Auditory, as they preſently conceiued that France was their owne; the Title whereof deſcending from Iſabel, the mother of the famous third Edward, and ſhe the daughter and ſuruiuing heire vnto Philip the faire; his right was lineally deriued thence as followeth. Firſt, Philip by Ioane his firſt wife intituled Queene of Nauarre, had three ſons and one daughter, namely Lewis, Philip, and Charles, all three ſucceſſiuely Kings, and this Lady Iſabell, by whom the Engliſh claime. His ſecond wife was Conſtance the daughter of the King of Sicil, who bare him a ſonne after his owne deceaſe, which liued not many dayes after his Lewis Nuncupa. Father. Lewis his eldeſt ſonne, and tenth of that name, ſucceeded Philip in the Kingdome of France, and by Margaret his wife the daughter of Burgundy had his daughter Iane, intituled Queene of Nauarre, who made claime alſo vnto the French Crowne, but neuer attained it; ſo that her Title fell with her death. Lewis by his ſecond wife Clemence of Sicil, had a ſonne named Iohn borne vnto him, but preſently both Father and ſonne departing this life, left the Scepter to his ſecond brother; who by the name of Philip the fift, a while wore the Emperiall Crowne of France: his wife was Iane the daughter of Burgoine, who bare vnto him onely foure daughters, but none of them had iſſue, ſaith Hall.

(21) Vnto King Philip ſucceeded his Brother Charles the faire, the fourth of that name, whoſe firſt Wife was Blanch, detected of incontinency, and brought him no fruit. His ſecond wife was Marie daughter to Henrie Luxembourg the Emperour, who bare him a ſonne that dyed ſoone after his birth, and the mother likewiſe ſhortly came to her graue. Margaret the daughter to the Earle of Eureux was his third and laſt Wife, who at his death he left with-Child, and thus the three ſonnes of Philip were branched, raigned, and dyed, whom Queene Iſabell their ſiſter ſuruiued, and in that right her ſonne King Edward the third, by his royall conſanguinity whilſt the Crowne ſtood thus at ſuſpence, till a Prince ſhould be borne, claimed to be Regent in the Interregnum, and in the non-age of the looked-for iſſue, againſt which, Philip de Valois, ſonne of Charles the hardy, who was brother to Philip the faire, being a ſecond branch from Hugh Capet, and firſt Prince of the bloud of France, maintained that the Regency of the male (if ſo he were borne) as alſo of the Realme (if a daughter, or the ſonne dyed) belonged onely vnto him as the next in bloud. The ſtate thus ſtanding, and a daughter borne, Philip was ſaluted and proclaimed King, no other right alleaged then this foiſted and falſely termed fundamentall law Salique, for no otherwiſe doth Ottoman the French famous Lawyer eſteeme of that vngodly and vniuſt Ordinance, if any ſuch had beene ordained.

(22) The Kings right thus made apparant, and ſufficient poſſeſſions to be had in France: the Bill of complaint againſt the Clergies exceſſe was quite daſht, and all mindes addicted for the affaires that way; thinking it vnreaſonable to pull the Prouiſions from their natiues and brethren, when as the circuit of their inheritance extended more large in compaſſe: and therefore with the Danites they determined no longer to ſit ſo pent with increaſe, ſeeing God had giuen them another Kingdome, but would free their owne ſtraightneſſe by dint of ſword, and ſpread their Tents wider in the continent of France: Neither was there any motiue more forceable in conference, then was the ſucceſſe of thoſe intruding Princes, who aſſaied the Crowne by that vniuſt claime of law Salique. Iudg.18.

(23) For, did not the ſword of God (rather then man) in the hand of King Edward the claimer, cut downe the flower of France in the Battell of Crecie, with the ſlaughter of Lewis King of Bohemia, of Charles the French Kings Brother, of Iames Dolphin of Viennois, the Dukes of Loraine, and Burbon, the Earles of Aumarle, Sauoy, Montbilliard, Flanders, Niuers, and Harecourt, the Grand Prior of France, the Archbiſhop and Biſhop of Zanxinus and Noyone, of Lords, Barons, and Gentlemen to the number of 1500. with 30. thouſand of the French Souldiers, and Philip not able of himſelfe to defend himſelfe, inciting Dauid of Scotland to inuade and weaken England, therein did but onely vexe his own ſpirit, for in that attempt the Scottiſh King was taken priſoner & brought to London, leauing Philip to ſtruggle with his hard fortunes in France, which with bad ſucceſſe hee did to the day of his death? Jo. Sarres.

(24) Iohn his ſonne, by the ſame title and claime felt the ſame ſtroke of iuſtice from the hand of that thunderbolt in warre, Edward ſurnamed the blacke Prince, the ſonne of Englands Mars, who farre inferiour to the French in number, farre exceeded them in marſhall power, when at the battell of Poytiers, the French royall Standard was ſtroke downe, an hundred Enſignes wonne by the Engliſh, the Conſtable, Marſhall and great Chamberlaine of France, with fifty two Lords, and ſeuenteene hundred Gentlemen ſlaine in the field. King Iohn himſelfe, his ſonne Philip, two Biſhops, thirteene Earles, and one and thirtie Lords taken priſoners by the Prince, to his great praiſe and confirmation of his iuſt cauſe. Jo. Serres.

(25) Nor was the puniſhment of the Father any whit leſſened in King Charles the ſonne then raigning, who beſides the inteſtine warres in his own dominions was by Gods iuſt iudgement ſtrucke into a Lunacy, being vnable to gouerne himſelfe, much leſſe his Kingdome, vpon which aduantage (as the French would haue it) King Henry now played; though it be moſt certaine hee ſought his right farre otherwiſe, for ſo it ſtandeth vpon record, dated the ninth of February, and firſt of Henrie the fift his raigne, that he ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto the French King, who could not be admitted to his preſence, and him whom they imployed to procure acceſſe, was by the French committed to Priſon: whereat King Henry moſt iuſtly conceiued a grudge. Paulus Æmilius their owne Story-writer ſaith, that Henry King of England, ſent honourable Ambaſſadors to demaund in marriage the Lady Katherine daughter vnto the French King: which (as he ſaith) was neglected with this anſwere, that the King had no leaſure to thinke on that buſineſſe: whom Franciſcus Roſienius doth further inlarge, ſaying: The King ſcornefully ſmiling, anſwered, that France was neither deſtitute Ex Record. apud Weſtm. of Dukes, nor he at leasure to thinke of the Propositi-on; and being iealous lest Burgoine would match his daughter with Henry, sent him a command to the contrary, and againe at their conclusion of peace, expressly enioyned the said Duke, and all other Princes of the bloud, not to make any alliance of marriage with England, whereby King Henry was further exasperated against France. And lastly, by his counsell and conference vpon the Archbishops Oration, sent a Summons & demand of the Dutchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Guyen, & Aniou; in derision whereof, as Caxton recordeth, the Dolphin of France sent him a Tun of Tennis-Bals, as Bullets most fit for his tender hands, who had spent his youth (as he thought) more among Rackets, then regard of his person or matters of State: so forward is man to be an Actor in common miseries, when the Fates haue made the Subiect of the Scene Tragicall, that he drawes the hand of Destinie sooner to strike, and heauier to fall vpon that proiect decreed to be cast downe: for by these disdaines and vnprincely dealings, the Crowne of France was grasped by the English hard hand, and that faire soile stained with her Natiues owne bloud: for the Present receiued as it was sent, had promise to be repaied with bals of more force, whose stroke should be such as the strongest gates of Paris should not be rackets sufficient to bandy the rebound.

(26) Grudges thus growne, and warres in preparing, the French thought it fittest to make Scotland their friend, whom they incited to molest the English Marches, which accordingly was done, and that with such violence, as it was a question decideable, whether of the kingdoms was first to be dealt with. Westmorland thought it safest to checke the Scots, as the neerer and continuall backe-friends. But Excester held it better policy to begin with France the stronger, especially now disquieted through the factions of Burgundie, and Orleance, and vnto this the most voyces gaue way, whose forwardnes was such, that the Clergy granted a Tenth, and the temporall Lords their aides to the King, as followeth.

To put back the Scots, Sir Robert Vmfreuile was sent, who in a skirmish vpon Mary Magdalens day, tooke 360. of them prisoners, and with great spoyle returned to Rocksborough Castell, whereof he had charge; the newes whereof K. Charles vnderstanding, and the great preparation made against France, being better aduised, vpon the dangerous euent, sent his Ambassadors into England, whereof the Archbishoppe of Bourges was principall, who at Winchester made offer of money, and some other Territories (but none of the best) with the Princesse Lady Katherine to be giuen in marriage vnto King Henry, so that he would dissolue his Army, and conclude a peace. To this Oration the Archbishop of Canterbury made answere, that his King demanded the Dutchies of Aquitaine and Aniou, with the other Seigniories anciently appertaining to his Progenitors the Kings of England, which as they were his most rightfull and lawfull inheritance, so would he with all possible diligence endeauour (if not otherwise) by fire & sword to recouer, which his assertion the King himselfe in presence confirmed.

(27) But Bourges the Archbishop, presuming more vpon his Prelacy, then respectiue vnto whom hee spake, with an vnreuerend boldnesse (liberty obtained) seconded his Ambassage with the termes of an Herauld, and with bended browes thus spake to the "king: *Thinkest thou, ô King, wrongfully to put downe "and destroy the most Christian, the most renowned, "and the most excellent King of all Europe, both in "bloud and preheminence, or thinkest thou that our "mightie Soueraigne Charles hath offered thee lands, "summes of mony, and possessions, with his most beau-"tifull daughter, either in feare of thee, of thy Eng-"lish Nation, or of all thy well-willers whomsoeuer? Moſt dreadfull and Soueraigne Liege-Lord, I Richard Yorke your humble ſubiect, and very Liegeman, beſeech you of grace, of all manner of offences which I haue done or aſſented vnto, in any kinde by ſtirring of other folke, egging me vnto, wherein I wot well I haue highly offended to your Highnes, beſeeching you at the reuerence of God that you like to take me into the hands of your mercifull and piteous grace, thinking yee will of your great goodneſſe my Liege-Lord: my full truſt is, that you will haue conſideration (though that my perſon be of none value) your high goodneſſe (where God hath ſet you in ſo high eſtate) to euery Liegeman, that you longeth plentiouſly to giue; that you like to accept this my ſimple requeſt for the loue of our Lady, and the bleſſed holy Ghoſt, to whom I pray that they moue your heart euer to all pittie and grace for their high goodnes. Notwithſtanding this his humble petition vpon the ſixt of Auguſt following, hee, with Scroope, and Grey, were beheaded, and his body with head interred in the Chappel of Gods-houſe in Southhampton; whoſe apprehenſions, arraignments, and deaths, were ſo followed each after others, as the French knew not, but that the treaſon had ſucceſſe, and their returned Ambaſſadors told it for certaine, that King Henry had either dimiſſed his Army, or (which was thought more true) himſelfe was ſlain by the Conſpirators; ſo eaſie an entrance hath babling report into the wide eares of credulous deſire.

(44) The French Court notwithstanding it swarmed with factions (whilest vnder a weake and braine-sicke King) the great-ones sought to make themselues greater, and the common enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dolphin, his brother of Ponthieu, the King of Sicil, the Dukes of Berry & of Britaine, with the whole force of France assembled at Roan, and in Councell concluded, that the Englisſh should be fought with, before they got Callis, and forthwith decreed to endammage King Henry on his way, which presently was attempted. For besides their continuall skirmishes vpon his marching Army, they brake down the Bridges, plashed the woods, intrenched the wayes, strucke stakes in the Foords, and in places of aduantage, layd store of souldiers to empeach his passage, and conuayed all victuals out of the Countries, through which hee should goe; whereby they well hoped, as a Deere taken in the toyle, so both he and his hoast should haue beene insnared, who now was approached to Virron, with purpose to haue passed the riuer Soame at Blanchetague: but there the French had fortified against him, so as hee well saw that was not the way; and thereupon changing his Councell, hee marched by Wormes, and lodged at Baillew, with an intent to haue passed the riuer at Port le Remy, but that also guarded, he kept along the Riuer to Hargest, the French Army marching vpon the other banke, vnder the leading of Charles de Albert Constable of France.

(45) Henry still seeking to get ouer Soame, meant to assay it, euen to the head, and passing by Amiens, Bowes, and Corby, in a valley adioyning, there lodged his hoast, where hee commanded his Archers to prouide stakes sharpned at both ends, which afterwards stood them in singular good stead: Then hearing by his spyals that the water was passable at Bethencourt, by the negligent guard of them of Saint Quintins, he got ouer the riuer. His souldiers both weary and faint, many of them sicke, and their prouisions spent some twelue dayes before, were forced to feed vpon Nuts, Roots, and Berries, such as they could get, and their drinke was the water that ranne i 1 their way.

(46) The day they spent with great toile and long march, the nights were cold and wet, and no where good lodging, alwaies standing vpon their own guard, and the French alwayes swarming about them without intermission. These things moued Henry, as the French Writers report, to proffer the restitution of Harflew, with other holds in Normandy, & to make satisfaction for the harmes done in France, to suffer him free passage vnto his Towne of Callis. But certaine it is, that great reliefe hee got by the iustice and piety that he vsed in those parts: for albeit he was in the middest of his enemies, and his souldiers pinched with penury and want, yet made hee Proclamation vpon paine of death, that none of his Army should rob any Church: wherein a souldier offending, hee caused restitution to be made, and commanded the stealer to be put to death: the fame of which piety moued the people (albeit they were forbid by the French King) plentifully to supply the fainting Englisſh with their owne prouisions.

True it is, that Henrie was not desirous of fight, his impediments being such as we haue said, and therefore returned answere, that he meant to keepe on his march vnto Callis, and would not seeke them: but if they would disturbe him, he committed the issue thereof to God, assuring himselfe that it would be to their owne great danger and perill, and so passing forward to Forceuil, to Boniers-Lestaillon, to Bangy, vpon Thursday the 24. of October, he came to Azincourt, where the French in a field of aduantage (purposely chosen) in the County of S. Paul (and neere vnto Azincourt) had pitched their Banner-royall, with an infinite hoast, whereof the Constable of France had the conduct.

Whereunto the Constable and Marshall were willing, but the other young Princes despising the small number of their aduersaries, refused all conditions of peace, and were not onely negligent in the duties of Commanders, but with an assurance of victory diuided the pray, disposed of prisoners, and prepared a Chariot to carry the captiue King in triumph; commanding the Cities and Townes adioyning to ring their Bels, and to render thankes vnto God, who had deliuered their enemies into such place of aduantage as an assured victory must presently follow: and so confident were they thereof, that they sent to King Henry to know what ransome he would giue. Whereat the Duke of Bery was highly offended, and aduised the contrary, laying before the King the hazard of warre, out of his owne experience, being himselfe at the battell of Poytiers, where King Iohn vnfortunately was taken by the Englisſh, which proued (as he alleaged) a great breake-necke vnto France.

(51) The morning approached, the French tooke the field, thronging forward, who should be first to this most easie and certaine victory (as they tooke it) their greatest strength consisting in horse. Against whose violence King Henry commanded two hundred strong Bow-men to lodge in a low meadow, where a deepe ditch full of water might secure them from the Horse, and the bushes couer them from sight. These hauing stakes prepared and shod with Iron at both ends, were appoynted to sticke them slope-wise in the ground, yet so that they might bee remoued as occasion was ministred, to guarde them from the danger of the horse: which policy accomplished, King Henry (whose hope was in God, and the goodnes of his cause) about ten of the clocke ranged his English against the French then in field: hee disposed his hoast into three battels, placing his Bow-men on both sides of the maine.

In the maine Battell all in compleate and bright shining armour, the King rode himselfe, his shield quartered with the royal atchieuments of England and France; vpon his helmet he wore a Coronet, the circle whereof glittered with Pearle, and stones of an vnestimable price: his horse of a fierce courage carrierd as hee went, the bridle and furniture of Goldsmiths worke, and the Caparisons most richly embroidered with the victorious Ensignes of the English Monarchy: Before him in gold and glorious colours the Royal Standard was borne, and many other banners in warlike order waued with the winde.

(53) The French had framed their Battels into two sharpe fronts, as intending with their poynts to haue runne through the English squadrons; altogether relying vpon their horsemen, and shining in brauery with an incredible excesse. And surely the beauty and honourable horrour of both the Armies, no heart can iudge of, vnlesse the eye had seene it, the Banners, Ensignes, and Penons, streaming in the aire, the glistering of armours, the variety of colours, the motion of Plumes, the Forrests of Lances, and the thickets of shorter weapons, made so great and goodly a shew; but the silent expectation of the bloudy blast was as the bullet ramd into the Canon, whose roaring voice is not so soone heard, as the stroake of death felt by the aimed-at marke.

(54) The Battels thus raunged, a while stood still, and faced each other euen in the face: The French (whether vpon errour, like to that of Pompeis at the battel of Pharsalia, where Caesar was victorious, or to draw the English farther from their aduantage of ground, is altogether vnknowne) but certaine it is, that King Henry was resolued to open his way for Callis ouer the enemies bosome, or else to dye: and thereupon with a cheerefull countenance and words full of courage, he comforted his followers, and said. "My most faithfull Companions and worthy soul-"diers, we now goe into the field of honour, and to "the worke of man-hood, which your great valours "so long haue expected and prayed for; loe the day "is now come, and your worke the noblest in the "world; poure forth therefore your vtmost forces, "that ages may know what the Lance, the Axe, the "Sword and the Bow can doe in the hand of the va-"liant: Whosoeuer therefore desires riches, honour, "and rewards here he shall finde them. Nimirum hac "medio posuit Deus omnia Campo. When he had thus said, his army fell prostrate on the ground, and committed themselues vnto God, euery man taking into his mouth a peece of earth, in remembrance of his owne mortality, (being thereof made) or of the holy Communion, whereof he was incorporated to be a partaker; and so resolued, arising, the King with cheerefull countenance commanded his Standard to aduance forward, saying, because our iniurious enemies doe attempt to shut vp our way, let vs vpon them in the name of the most glorious Trinity, and in the best houre of the whole yeare.

(55) The ranging of the Battell King Henry committed to an old experienced Knight called Sir Thomas Erpingham: who with a warder in his hand led the way, which when he saw time, he threw vp into the aire, whereat the whole army gaue a great shout; which done, he alighted from his horse, and came to the King, who was in his place on foot. The French beholding this Offer, kept still their owne standing, which the English perceiuing, made forward and came on, giuing another shoute, when immediately the Archers, layd in the meadow, darkened the aire with a shower of sharpe arrowes, most fearefull to the sight, but more deadly to be felt, and withall, the English charged their Battell with an admirable courage; the most of them for nimblenesse being but halfe clothed, without hat, and bare-legged. And such was their courage notwithstanding their wants, as he that ere-while could scarcely bend his Bow, is able now to draw his yard-long-arrow to the very head, whose roauing marke was the flancke of the French, so rightly aimed at, and so strongly stucke on, that their sides were altogether larded with arrowes, whereby the vantgard was instantly distrest, and disordered into such a confused presse, as they were not able to vse their weapons at any aduantage. Their wings likewise assayd to charge the English; but Mounsieur de Lignie in the one not well seconded by his troopes was forced backe; and Guilliaum de Surreres charging home, in the other, was slaine. The Battallions now broken, for safety fled to the Maine, where they bred both feare and confusion by the vnrulinesse of their wounded horses, so galled with arrowes as they could not be gouerned.

The tempests of arrowes still whisling in the aire sparkled fire in their fals from the helmets of the French, and with their steeled heads, rang many thousands their knels that dolefull day, who like to corne cut downe with the sith, fell by whole plumps in that fatall field; the English still following the aduantage: against whom Anthony Duke of Brabant, hoping by his example to encourage others (followed with a few) turned head, and brake into the English Battell, wherein manfully fighting he was slaine.

(58) The French Reregard surprised with feare, at the disaster of the vantgard, & the maine battell, fled, not striking one stroake (except some principall leaders, and they not many) the English horsemen fetched a compasse, and wheeled about vpon their backes, which no sooner was perceiued, but that the taxe of fighting was ended, and the worke of killing began; as by the words of Walsingham doth manifestly appeare: The way (saith he) is at length made by fine force; the French did not so much giue place, as fall dead to the earth: for when they saw those beaten indeed vnder-foot, whom they reputed inuincible, their minds forthwith grew amazed, and such an icie feare slid through their marrow, that they stood still like senseless Images, while our men wrested weapons out of their hands, and slew them therwith as beasts. Slaughter then had lost the stay of it selfe, and fight did follow no longer, but all the war was made at throates, which (as it were) offered themselues to be cut, neither can the English kill so many of the enemies, as may be killed. Thus therefore the whole glory of the French name is almost perished by the hands of those few, whom immediatly before they held in most extreame contempt. But the sword now made weary and drunk with bloud, all danger past, and humanity retired, prisoners were taken, and liues spared, which hitherto was neglected, lest mercy might haue proued the destruction of themselues.

(59) Whilst the King was thus busied, & the successe of the battel in dispute, his carriages (but slenderly guarded) by the French were assailed, and all made spoyle of that was to be had. The Captaines of this cowardly enterprize were Robinet de Bourneuille, Rifflant de Clumasse, & Isambert de Azincourt, with sixe hundred Peasants, who had turned their faces at the first brunt of Battell, as men of better practise to pilfer, then to purchase by manhood the spoyles of the field. Where among other things they found a rich Crowne & Sword, which they bare away in triumphwise, faining that King Henry was taken, and as a prisoner followed their troupes, the sight of certaine English prisoners, by them taken and led away, confirming the report more strongly in the beholders conceit. But King Henry breathlesse, and in heat of bloud, seeing certaine new troupes of the King of Sicils appeare in the field, and the same strong inough to encounter with his weary men, fearing (as he had cause) that the Bourbon Battalion vpon sight of fresh succours, would gather into a body, and againe make head, considering withall how his men were ouercharged with multitudes of Prisoners, who in number surmounted their Conquerours: that the charge would be double at once to guard and to fight, and that the prisoners would be ready vpon euery aduantage to take armes, and free themselues from their takers: these and other necessities constraining, King Henry, contrary to his wonted generous nature, gaue present commandement that euery man should kill his Prisoner, which was immediately performed, certaine principall men excepted. Which done, and falling againe in order, he sent his Heraulds vnto these troupes assembled, commanding them forthwith to come vnto battell, or else to depart the field, either of which if they delayed, he threatned to reuenge with their deaths, without any redemption or mercy; at which seuere sentence their hearts were so daunted, that with shame and dishonour they departed the field. The base surprisall of the Kings carriages, (the onely cause, as some alleage, of the French prisoners death) was so ill-digested by the French themselues, that the Duke of Burgundy imprisoned the actors thereof, and was minded to haue put them to death, had not his Sonne the Count of Charolois mediated for them, vnto whom they presented King Henries rich sword, the guards whereof was gold, set with stones of great price.

(60) The day almost spent in spending French bloud, and euening approaching, neere the set of the Sunne, the field cleared, and no enemy seene, the retreate was sounded, and all were assembled to giue thankes vnto God; which done, while his souldiers pillaged the dead, King Henry sent for Montioy, Herauld at armes in France, and for other Heraulds both English & French: vnto whom he said, we haue not of our selues made this great slaughter, which the sword in our weake hands hath laid at our feet, but the Arme of God for the offences (no doubt) of the French hath done it, whose bloud let now rest vpon their own heads, and we guiltlesse in following our right: and then demanding the name of the place, was answered, it was Azincourt; then said he, to all posterities following, this Battell shall be called the Battell of Azincourt. Thus dismissing the Heraulds, he returned to Maisconcelles, where he lodged the night before. The spoyle was great, and the prey rich in armours, iewels, and apparell, for which by the Countrey Peasants many (left as dead) were stripped starke naked, who afterward crept from the place, but most of them mortally wounded without reliefe, lay in great dolor, and died in the ditches: so certaine is the calamitie of war, and vncertaine the sword till it be quietly sheathed.

Now King Henry vpon Saturday the 26. of October, being the next day after Battell, tooke his march towards Callis, but in paſſing the field wherin they had fought, he cauſed ſearch for all the Engliſh, which he cauſed to be interred according to their eſtates. (29) His hoaſt now refreſhed and courage augmented, it was diſputable in Counſell, whether the King ſhould returne againe into France, to purſue his enterprize already begun, or elſe to imbarke for England. But the time of yeare ſpent, the Winter wet, and the field Camps very much ſubiect to fluxes, wherewith many of his Souldiers were as yet infected, and more vnhealed of their wounds; it was thought fitteſt to make for England, and the ſooner, for that victuals became ſomewhat ſcarce in Callis. Theſe things premiſed, King Henry vpon the ſixteenth day of Nouember ſpread ſailes for England, and in the paſſage was met with ſuch ſtormes, that his French Priſoners were in as great feare, as they had beene in danger at the Battell of Azincourt: but arriued at Douer and all dangers paſt, vpon the three and twenty of Nouember in triumph-wiſe hee made his entrance into London, foure hundred Citizens riding before him in red and white hoodes, the gates and ſtreets were garniſhed with Pageants, and the Conduits plenteouſly powring forth ſweet Wines. The religious men met him with proceſſion, and foureteene mitred Biſhops attended his approach vnto Saint Pauls, where, out of the Cenſers the ſweet Odours filled the Church, and the Quier chanted Anthems cunningly ſet by note: in all which the honour was aſcribed onely vnto God, the King ſo commanding it. And ſo farre was he from the vaine oſtentation of men, that he would not admit his broken Crowne, nor bruiſed armour to be borne before him in ſhew, which are the vſuall Enſignes of warlike triumphes. The Citie preſented him a thouſand pound in gold, two golden Taſons worth fiue hundred pounds more, which were receiued with all Princely thankes.

(31) The calamities of theſe times by the ſtirred ſchiſmes of the Church, and theſe bloudy warres among Chriſtian Princes, Sigiſmund the Emperour a man of great wiſedome and integrity, much lamented at the Councell of Conſtance, and as another Conſtantine ſollicited the three ſtiffe ſtirring Popes vnto vnity, but failing of that purpoſe, from thoſe farre parts he trauelled into France, and thence into England: ſeeking to make peace betwixt theſe two Weſterne Monarchs, the better to withſtand the common knowne enemy of Chriſtendome the Turke. King Charles he ſollicited firſt, finding him in words very forward, with many faire ſhewes to imbrace the motion, whereupon taking with him the Archbiſhop of Rheims as Ambaſſadour from the French King, came vnto Callis, where he was moſt honorably entertained by the Earle of Warwicke, Deputy of the Towne, and diuers other Lords, ſent thither by King Henry to attend him, as alſo thirty of his talleſt ſhips to waft him to Douer, gallantly rigged and manned with a noble traine. That it ſhould be lawfull for the King of England to proſecute his warres againſt France for the recouery of his right, as ſhould ſeeme to him expedient, and for the Emperor, for the recouery of any part of his right reteined by the French. Laſtly, that either of them ſhould aſſiſt other in recouery and Conqueſt of their rights, lands, and dominions, with-held and kept from them, by him that calleth himſelfe King of France, and others, the Princes and Barons of France. Theſe concluſions and agreemenrs bare date the 19. of October, in Anno 1416. In the meane while the French that had felt the hard hand of the Engliſh, and ſeene that Henry had with-drawne his Commiſſioners for peace, King Charles made a league with the States of Genoua, requiring their ayde againſt this dangerous enemy, who ſupplyde him with ſixe hundred Croſſebowes, and eight tall ſhips of warre, and as many Gallies with munition and victuals. Theſe wafting the Seas with many brauadoes, King Henry in perſon meant to haue met with himſelfe, but the Emperour diſſwading his purpoſe, the charge of that Enterpriſe was committed to Iohn Duke of Bedford, accompanied with the Earles of March, Marſhall, Oxford, Warwicke, Huntington, Arundell, Deuonſhire, and Saliſbury; theſe falling vpon the Viſcount de Narbon, a fierce encounter was begun, and long fought, till at length the victory fell to the Engliſh, ſo that the French Nauy was moſt of them battered, ſuncke and taken; amongſt others, three great carricks of the Genoaes were ſent to England, with whom the baſtard of Burbon was brought away Priſoner; and the Viſcount de Narbon, Le Sire de Montaine, and Le Sire de Berrar chaſed into Britaine. This victory obtayned, the Duke paſt forward to the towne of Harflew, and refreſhed it with victuals, without any impeachment; for Armagnac the Conſtable hearing how his Conſorts had kept tune on the Seas, thought it not beſt to ſet to their note, leaſt his meane would not be heard, the baſe of this muſicke ſounding too deepe, and therefore he put vp his pipes, and got him to Paris. This ſeruice performed, was ſo commended by the Emperour, as he openly ſaid, that Realme was happy that had ſuch a King, but the King more happy that had ſuch Subjects, and euer after held Bedford in a moſt ſpeciall account.

But his proceedings proſpering in France he called a Parliament at London, where the Lord Chancellor, Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinall, in the Kings behalfe made an eloquent Oration, declaring the great deſire his Maſter had to make Peace with the French, which the King notwithſtanding reſiſted, and againſt the law of Armes denied, vpon ranſome, to render his priſoners taken at Azincourt, ſo that the peace which was to be expected muſt be with the ſword, concluding with this ſaying; Let vs make warre that we may haue peace, becauſe the end of war is peace. Whereunto the whole body conſented, and granted to the King a Subſidie and a Tenth, which was graciouſly accepted, but was farre too ſhort to defray the great Charge, ſo that he was forced to pawne his Crowne vnto the ſaid Biſhop Beaufort his Vncle, for a great ſum of money, as he did certaine Iewels to the Lord Major of London for ten thouſand Markes.

King Henry offereth great mercy to the beſieged.

King Henry had three great aduantages for the better conquering of France.

(44) But whether by the working of the French, or by inſtigation of the diſcontented reformaliſts (as Walſingham hath it) The Scots would worke wonders in reuiuing a dead King Richard, that ſhould indammage the Lancaſtrians cauſe, and diſpoſſeſſe King Henry of his Crowne: who now abſent and forward of Conqueſt in France, at home was endangered by theſe his emulating neighbours, and his confines in hoſtile manner entered vpon, by the Duke of Albany, together with the Earle Dowglas the Scottiſh Leaders: Theſe bringing with them their ſtage-like King Richard, laid ſtrait ſiege againſt Roxborough, and Barwicke, where all aſſaies were attempted, by vndermining the wals, and turrets, all extremities vſed and nothing left vnattempted, that might annoy, either by Sea or by Land.

(46) The Kings affaires thus effected in the North, the Clergies eye-ſore was alſo ſomewhat eaſed by the apprenenſion of Sir Iohn Ouldcaſtle their diſturber in the South; who not contented to ſet the God of Rome at nought,but likewiſe defaced the faces of his Saints, trimly limmed in their Letanyes and other like maſſe-bookes;a matter indeed of ſuch moment, that the Abbot of Saint Albans (in whoſe precinct they were taken) ſent theſe poore miſvſed and ſcratched-faced pictures, to complaine of their injuries vnto the King,but his peace not broken,(for no bloud was drawne) he remitted the offence and puniſhment thereof vnto Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury,who ſent them to Pauls-Croſſe to ſhew their Countenances vnto the people, the Preacher that day being their mouth, inſinuating the offence to be done vnto the triumphant Saints in heauen.

That N.D. author of the three conuerſions, hath made Ouldcaſtle a Ruffian,a Robber,and a Rebell, and his authority taken from the Stage-players,is more befitting the pen of his ſlanderous report, then the credit of the judicious,being onely grounded from this Papiſt and his Poet,of like conſcience for lies,the one euer faining, and the other euer falſifying the truth: that Copus hath made the Lord Cobham a Traitour: & Stow,from Otterborn,alledgeth indentures drawne betwixt him and the Scots, to bring in a counterfait Richard,and to inuade the Land with forraine power,that he acknowledged no King but the ſame counterfeit in Scotland, and made himſelfe a falſe Chriſt in riſing againe the third day (as Walſingham will haue it) I am not ignorant: but his attainture of Treaſons, I leaue it to the anſwere of Maſter Fox, who largely handled it: and for his combination with the Scots, vnto the letter of King Henries owne hand,who hauing intelligence of the Scots intent, and the meanes by which they meant to worke, ſignifieth vnto his brother and Vncle in theſe words,as from the Originall is taken.

That all the ſtrangers that were not properly Inhabitants of Fallais,& had formerly fought againſt King Henry in any place, beſieged and taken within Normandy, ſhould be left to his mercy. 3. That the Captaines and Souldiers ſhould receiue no prejudice in their Horſes, Armes, or Goods; great Artillery, Shot, powder and Croſſe-bowes excepted: but the ſtrangers formerly ſpoken of in the ſecond Article were exempted from that fauour. 8. That the Artillery, Powder, Shot, and Croſſe-bowes afore-mentioned,ſhould not,during the truce, be embezelled, wilfully broken, or made away. 9. That during the Truce, the ruines made ſhould not be repayred,and no new workes of defence erected. 10. That no oppreſſion be vſed by the ſaid Souldier vpon the Burgeſſe, and if any were found faulty,and not preſently baniſhed for the ſame, they ſhould looſe the benefit which otherwiſe they ſhould haue by the accord. 11. second of Ianuary next: and his Majesty of his grace and mercy, was pleased that all such as would remain in Fallais, should remaine there in safety both in body and goods, so as they would be true subjects vnto him. 14. That none of the defendants of the Castell should be receiued into the Towne, nor their goods secretly kept by the Inhabitants vnder any pretence or colour whatsoeuer. 15. That during the treaty, no assault or offence should be offered by the Kings Army to the Towne, or to the Inhabitants, so as they doe not ayde, assist, or relieue, the defendants in the Castels. 16. That for the true performance of the Articles, twelue Knights and Squires should be deliuered hostage to the King, and to be set at liberty when the Couenants aboue mentioned were fulfilled. These things concluded and subscribed with their names and seales, the 20. of December; vpon the second of Ianuary no succours appearing, the towne of Fallais was accordingly deliuered, but the Castle standing obstinate, the King was as diligent, till the defendants fayling in their spirits, the first day of February demanded a Parley. Whereunto Henry consented, making Clarence his Brother his sole Commissioner. The Articles accorded for the most part were as the former, whereto were added these which ensue.

(51) That vpon the 16. of the said moneth of February, if the King in person, the Dolphin his sonne, or the Earle of Armagnac Constable of France, did not with force raise the siege, then Sir Oliuer de Mauny Knight, gouernour of the said Castell, should render the same vnto King Henry. 2. That the said Gouernour and all other within the Castell should at the day assigned submit themselues to the King, and remaine his prisoners, trusting to his Maiesties royall promise not to receiue offence either in life or goods: (Geoffrey Chasteaux only excepted) who was left simply to the Kings mercy. 3. That after the rendring of the said Castell, Sir Oliuer de Mauny the Gouernour, should at his owne charges repayre all the breaches and ruines made in the wals during the siege, and leaue it in the same sort as it was before the same was besieged. 4. That for the performance of these Articles, eight Gentlemen should remaine Hostages with the King. 5. That when the Castell was repayred, Sir Oliuer Mauny, and all his Company should be set at liberty, and vntill then to remaine the Kings prisoners, Geoffrey de Chasteaux aboue mentioned onely excepted. These agreements concluded, the Indenture subscribed, and King Henries seale of Armes thereunto fixed, at the * prefixed day, according to these Articles, the Castell of Fallais was rendred vnto him: which done, he diuided his army into many parts, vnder the seuerall conducts of the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, and the Earle of Warwicke: who wan diuers Castels, himself the while marching to besiege Roane, where he set downe his siege, and began the assault in a furious manner: the defendants as obstinately bent to hold him out: so that to win the Towne by force, Henry found it very difficult, aswell for the strength of Bulwarkes and Ramparts, as for the number of hands within it, to make resistance, and therefore to reduce them by famine, was his onely designe.

That if they were not succoured by the French power, to surrender.

That they should trust to the kings royall promise, Geffrey Chasteaux excepted.

That the Gouernour should repaire the wals.

8. Gentlemen to be hostages.

The Castell repaired, the Gouernour should be set at liberty.

The City of Roane besieged.

Polyd. Virg.

(52) For Burgogne, from King Charles, had sent many worthy Captaines, with a thousand selected Souldiers to defend the City, and within it besides were fifteene thousand Citizens well trained and furnished: and the Towne stored with victuals for ten months continuance; notwithstanding King Henry quartered about the Towne, and for his safety cast vp a Trench betwixt the walls and his men: Himselfe lodged vpon the East of the City, the Duke of Clarence on the West, and the Duke of Exceſter on the North: betwixt whom, the Marshall lay quartered, and with whom joyned the Earle of Ormond, the Lords Harington, and Talbot. Before the Port of S. Hilary, the Lords Ros, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh, and Sir William Porter, set downe their Battalions. The Earles of Mortaigne, and Salisbury, lodged about the Abbey of Saint Katherines; Sir John Gray about the Chappell-Mount Saint Michael: and Sir Philip Leech vpon the Hill adjoyning. The Riuer Seine was blocked vp with three Iron chaines, one of them laide two foot aboue water; another with the leuell; and the third, two foot vnder water, to impeach all reliefe into the City by Boats; the charge whereof was committed vnto Thomas, Earon of Carew, who nothing fayled in the trust reposed. On the other side of the Riuer, were encamped the Earles of Warren, and Huntington, the Lords Neuill and Ferrers, and Sir Gilbert Vmfreuile, directly before the gate Port de Pont; and for intercourse the one vnto the other, a Bridge was forced ouer the said Riuer Seine, sufficient for carriages, as occasions should be ministred.

The Riuer Seine blockt vp with Iron-Chaines.

(53) With the English, sixteene hundred Irish Kernes were enrolled, from the Prior of Kilmainham, able men, but almost naked; their armes, were targets, darts, and swords, their horses little, and bare no saddle, yet very nimble, on which vpon euery aduantage they played with the French, in spoyling the Country, rifeling the houses, and carrying away children, with their baggage, vpon their Cowes backes. Thus from Iune vnto December the siege had continued, and now Victuals fayling, and the Towne in distresse, the Rouennois sent foure Gentlemen, and as many Burgesses, vnto King Charles, and the Burgogne (then at Beauuois) to signifie their miseries; fifty thousand already famished with hunger, and twelue thousand straruelings put out of the Towne, but not suffered to passe, by the English, dyed by multitudes in the ditches (whose vnburied Carkases did infect the Towne with contagious diseases, so that without present reliefe they must be inforced to render.

(55) And now the Rouennois helpelesse of succor, and despayring of peace, resolued to make a braue sally vpon the Kings quarter: to performe which resolution, ten thousand chosen men, with their leaders, issued out of the Towne: The Vant-gard (which was 2000.) being past & in fight, by misfortune the draw-bridge with ouer-weight of men brake, many were drowned, slaine, and hurt: neither was there any more passage that way, to relieue their followers engaged in fight with the English; whereupon they made hast to the other Gates: but before they could come to giue ayde, the Vant-gard was broken, and most of them slaine, and taken Prisoners. Vpon this diaster the Souldiers within mutined against Guy de Boutellier their General, murmuring that he had contriued the breaking of the bridge.

(56) In these disasters King Charles returning towards Paris, sent the besieged word to make what shift they could for themselues, which vnexpected message stroake a sad feare into the miserable defendants hearts, who now weake in men and victuals, knew no way to subsist, and thereupon in Counsell concluded to send vnto Henry, which presently they did. For whose entertainement, he caused two Tents to be set vp at Port S. Hilarie. Their Commissioners were two Gentlemen, two Clergy-men, and two Burgesses of the Towne. Commissioners for the King were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Warwicke: the demands of the Rouennois were many, but their answers were short; that no conditions would be accepted, but simply yeelding to the Kings mercy; whereupon the conference brake vp, and these returned into the Towne, bred sundry distra-

That the Burgeſſes ſhould giue vnto Henry towards his expenſe in the ſiege, three hundred fifty ſixe thouſand Crownes of gold. 2. That Robert Linet Vicar-generall to the Archbiſhop of Roane, Iehan Iourdan who commanded the Canoniers, and Alen Blanchart Captaine of the Common people, ſhould be left to his mercy without condition. 3. That all the people ſhould ſweare faith and loyalty to Henry and his Succeſſors. 4. That Henry ſhould protect and defend them againſt all men, and confirme vnto them their priuiledges, franchiſes, and liberties, which they had enjoyed euer ſince the time of S^t. Lewis King of France. 5. That all ſuch as had deſire to leaue the Towne, might freely depart, with his garments vpon his back only, and his goods to be confiſcated vnto King Henry. 6. That the Souldiers ſhould bring all their armes to a place aſſigned, and ſhould depart out of the towne vnarmed with a cudgell in their hands, firſt taking their Oath not to beare Armes againſt Henry, for a twelue-month next enſuing.

(57) This agreement was concluded the 16. of Iune, Anno 1418. when as the hungry Citizens in multitudes came to the Engliſh campe to buy Victuals, which ſo abounded with prouiſions, as a fat Mutton was ſolde for ſixe Souſes of Paris money. Vpon the next day following, Henrie triumphantly made his entry into Roane; the Eccleſiaſticks of the Towne, in their Myters and Veſtures, with their reliques, ſinging of Hymnes, conducted him to the Cathedrall Church, where before the high-Altar, vpon his knees, he gaue thankes to God for the Conqueſt of this Towne, which had remained two hundred and fifteene yeares in the poſſeſſion of the French, euen from the time when Philip King of France wan it from King Iohn of England. The day following, Alain Blanchart the Captaine of the common people was beheaded, Robert Linet, and Iehan Iourdan, put to their high ranſomes, the French Garriſons pillaged, vnarmed, and put out of the Towne, but ſafely were conducted ouer Saint Georges-bridge to goe whither they would. Guy de Boutellier, who was Captaine-generall of Roane, became King Henries liege-man, vnto whom he gaue all his lands, and a charge vnder the Duke of Glouceſter. Immediately after the rendering of Roane, ſundry other places of note yeelded themſelues, as Caudebec, Monſtreuillier, Diepe, Feſchamp, Arques, Neufchaſtell, Deincourt, Eu, Moncheaux, Vernon, Mante, Gorney, Harflewr, Pouteur-de-Mer, Mollineaux, le Treict, Tancarville, Abrechier, Mauleurier, Valemont, Neufuille, Bellaucombre, Fontaines, Le Boure, Preaux, Nougonder-uille, Logempree, Saint Germain, Sur Cuylly, Baudemont, Bray, Villeterre, Charles-Maiſnill, Les Boules Guillen-court, Fanifontaines, Le Becq, Crepin, Backeuille, and diuers other places, wherein Henry placed his Garriſons. France generally troubled, and trembling at the loſſe eſpecially of Roane, Henry ready to pierce forward, and Charles declining, through his infirmities increaſing; the Duke of Burgogne (who bare all the ſway vnder that infirme King, and therefore much hated by the Daulphin, whoſe reuenge he feared,) much doubting Henries riſing-fortunes, held it beſt to vphold his owne greatneſſe, by mediating a peace betwixt the two Kings. For which end he ſent his Ambaſſadours to Henry, praying perſonall Conference; to which he aſſented and aſſigned the place, which was at Melun, where in a Field well trenched, and ramparted with ſtrong Gates, two pauillions were arreard, the one for the Kings to repoſe themſelues in, and the other for their Councell to conſult in.

(58) Charles, Iſabell, Burgogne, and Katherine, the Count S^t. Paul, with a thouſand horſe garding them thither, came firſt. King Henry with his brothers of Clarence and Glouceſter, attended vpon with a thouſand horſe, held the appointment; and now met, the two Kings embraced each other; Henry kiſſed Iſabel and Katherine, who indeed became a precious pearle in his eye: Burgogne a little bending his knee, did his reuerence to Henry, who tooke him in his armes: and the two nations though mortall enemies, demeaned themſelues ſo ciuilly, as no cauſe of quarrell was offered on either ſide, much conference paſſed, but nothing concluded; Henries demands ſeeming to the French to be ſo vnreaſonable. The treaty thus diſſolued, and all ready to depart, King Henry not well pleaſed, ſpake thus vnto Burgogne, "Coſen, I may not well digeſt this refuſall, but be you "aſſured, that eyther I will haue your Kings daugh- "ter, and all my demands, or elſe I will baniſh both "you, and them, out of France. You ſpeake your plea- "ſure, ſaid the Duke, but before you ſhall thruſt the "King, them, and me, out of the Realme, you will be "weary of the enterprize.

(59) The treaty thus broke, and danger nothing leſſe, the Burgundian altogether French, and in heart no friend to the Engliſh, reconciled himſelfe vnto the Daulphin, which deed was ſoon-after the cauſe of his owne death; and Henry diſpleaſed with this combination, quickened his thoughts (full of reuenge) to proſecute the warre more ſharpely then heretofore: the firſt enterprize he made, was vpon Ponthois, vnto which Towne the laſt day of Iuly hee ſent three thouſand foote, which before the breake of day, and not diſcouered by the Centinels, ſet their Ladders to the Wals, mounted vp, crying, Saint George, and ſo opening a Port let in their companions. The Signeur de L'Iſle-Adam, Marſhall of France, and Gouernour of the Towne, affrighted at the ſurprize, fled out at another Port towards Paris, after whoſe example aboue tenne thouſand inhabitants did the like, ſo as the Engliſh, without reſiſtance, were Maſters of the Towne, wherein great riches fell to the Souldiers ſhares. When King Charles at Paris heard of the loſſe of Ponthois, in great feare, with his wife, daughter, Burgundy, and many Noble-men, to be further from the fire ſo neere at hand, went vnto Troyes en-Champagne, leauing Paris vnder the Gouernment of the Count Saint Paul, and Euſtach de Lactre Chancellor of France, whilſt Henry went forward with his intended enterprizes.

(60) For his brother of Clarence by three weekes ſiege wanne the Caſtell Giſors by compoſition, the Earle of Huntington ſacked Preaux, burnt Bretuiell, Clermont, and the Caſtel of Vendueil, and Henry himſelfe beſieged the Caſtell of Guillart, and Rochguien, two of the ſtrongeſt holds in Normandy; which vpon compoſitions were ſurrendred, and further preuailed more then the French wiſhed. For the Daulphin, the only man that ſtood for the publike defence of France, was miſerably poore, and for want of pay could make no great ſhew of followers in the Field, whoſe chiefe Counſellor was the Conſtable Armagnac an old craftie Foxe, that had euer ſided with Orleance againſt the Burgundian. And now fearing leaſt his owne eſteeme ſhould be leſſened, or that Burgundy ſhould be the Archite to croſſe him the wiſe Achitophel, or rather indeede thruſt forward by deſtinie to be the ſcourge and fall of France, he counſelled the young Daulphin to ſeize vpon his Mothers money, jewels, and plate, for his further ſupply to the publike vſe, (which immediately he did) to aduance the eſtate: but Queene Iſabel impatient of theſe wrongs receiued, in a womaniſh ſpleene ſtudies the reuenge; wholly neglecting the common cauſe, which gaue the Engliſh ſurer footing in France: but the Daulphin to make good what he had done, leades the King in jealouſie that the Queenes deſignes were dangerous, and altogether ſet for the alienation of the Crowne, which he, weake man, no ſooner heard then beleeued, being Annals of Burgundy.

(61) Theſe ſparkes of ſedition thus blowne in the Court, ſuſpitions increaſing, and maligners ſtill working, Queene Iſabel, with her ſiſter in law the Dutcheſſe of Bauier, were ſent priſoners to Blois, and from thence to Eours, where they were kept with ſtrait guard, three Gentlemen in Commiſſion to take care of their ſafeties: till then her fauours had gone with Orleance, and with him had conteſted euer againſt Burgogne, but now to quit her impriſonment, ſhe reconciled her ſelfe vnto him, and ſollicited his aſſiſtance for her deliuerance. Burgogne well perceiuing how much it would aduance his part, to draw the Queene to be of his faction, brake vp his ſiege then laide before Corbeill, and with certaine choyſe troupes repayred toward Trours, from whence immediately he ſent the Queene word of his comming. She faining deuotion to the Abbey of Marmonſtier, ſeated ſomewhat without the towne, made it knowne to her Keepers, and they not daring to contradict ſo great a Princeſſe, miſtruſting no danger, attended her thitherward with a competent guard as they ſuppoſed, where Foſſeux and Vergie, two ſpeciall men in the Dukes truſt, were laid in the Ambuſh neere vnto the Abbey, and hauing notice the Queene was come to Church, came to ſalute her, and to ſignifie that the Burgogne was in perſon to attend her ſeruice. Her keepers conceiuing their ſeconds were not farre off, as men diſmayed, told the Queene of ſome feare, & that an enemy was neere at hand; whereunto ſhe anſwered, I am not ignorant who they are, and thereupon commanded to apprehend thoſe her keepers: Her liberty thus got, ſhe became wholly for Burgogne, and by his meanes was made the Regent of France, and her picture ſtamped vpon the Seale of that State.

(42) By birth ſhe was a Germane, and daughter to Stephen Duke of Bauier, of an imperious ſpirit, and vn-reconcileable enuy, not ouer-much beloued of her Husband, and (as the nature of moſt women are) not ouer-much fauouring his fauorites, whoſe femall authority and hatred againſt her owne ſonne Daulphin Charles, ſore bruiſed the Growne, which her weake husband ware: his fore-gone infirmities and her new-ſprung Regency, were now as two ſludgates, ſet open to let in the deluge of France; hers is to be ſpoken of in the intercourſe of the Engliſh; his, many times hath beene, but not made knowne how it came: therefore a while in that ſubject, before we paſſe forward; in this place let vs reade what others haue writ.

Iohn Serres. The cauſes why the French were the eaſier conquered by King Henry.

(43) This Charles the ſixt, and ſicke-braind King of France, was the ſon of King Charles, ſurnamed the wiſe, who with Salomon his wiſer, might haue demanded this queſtion; Who can tell whether his ſonne ſhall be a wiſe man, or a foole? for the flower of his youth, and commendable diſpoſitions of his middle age, promiſed great hopes of a valiant, moderate, and moſt happy Prince, onely inclined to choller and reuenge, as by the occaſion of his lunacy is eaſily ſeene, which chanced on this manner.

Eccles. 2. 19.

(44) Peter Craon a Courtier, his minion, and an inward fauorite of the Duke of Orleance the Kings Brother, blabbed out ſome ſecrecy of the ſaid Dukes amorous paſſions vpon a wanton Lady, vnto his Dutcheſſe Valentine; who but lately married, and ſo ſoon deceiued of bed, took the wrong no leſſe then it was, nor letted ſhe (as who can let a Woman to ſpeake) to tell him his faults on both ſides of his head, the Duke could not hide what ſhe too-well knew, and therefore ſought to ſatisfie her with complements of kinde words, but the Curtaine-ſermons nightly enlarged vpon the ſame Text, made him many times to lye awake with little deuotion (God wot) to heare, and often to riſe when hee would faine haue ſlept, which cauſed him laſtly to complaine to the King that Craon had, and would, betray their ouer-much truſt. The cauſe no more, but yet too much againſt a Prince,* Craon with all diſgrace was diſcharged the Court, who not able to brooke ſuch an open indignity, aſſaulted Cliſton the Conſtable in a murthering manner, as the only man (as he thought) that wrought his diſgrace, and eſcaping Paris, fled into Britaine, whoſe Duke was his kinſeman, and an enemy to the Conſtable.

The occaſion of King Charles diſtemper.

Orleance newly married, is in loue with another.

* Craon diſmiſt the Court, for telling the Dutcheſſe of the incontinency of her Husband

(45) King Charles tranſported with choller of this double offence, mindes to draw Craon by force out of Britaine to juſtifie himſelfe, whom the Councell had declared guilty of high-Treaſon, and enemy to the Crowne of France, and reſolues in perſon to enter into Britaine: forthwith the expedition for men, and manner of proceeding, made Charles to looſe both meate and ſleepe, ſo as the vexation of minde, and diſtemperature of body, carried apparant ſhewes in his face: inſomuch that the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne miſtruſting the worſt, counſelled that his journey might be ſtaid; his Phyſitians diſſwade him in regard of his health, the ſummer extreame hot, and his bloud as then ouer-ſubject to dangerous Feuers. New deuiſes were wrought to ſtay him at home, giuing it forth that Craon was fled Britaine, and in Arragon was impriſoned by the Queene. All this notwithſtanding, needes would he forward, ſo forward is man when his fate will ſo haue it.

King Charles purſueth Craon into Britaine.

Notwithſtanding his ſickneſſe he continueth his journey.

(46) He departed Meaux in Iuly: the yeare very hot, his head couered with a great Cap of ſcarlet, his body wrapped in a thicke veluet Ierkin, warme enough for winter, his mind diſtempered with choller, griefe, and deſpite, and his body wearied with watching, diſtaſture, and want of reſt. Thus entring the forreſt of Meaux about noone-tide, a man bare-headed, and bare-legged, attired in a coat of white rugge, ſtepped ſodainely forth from betwixt two trees, and caught hold of his bridle, ſtaid his horſe, ſaying; King ride no further, but returne backe, for thou art betraied. Charles, whoſe ſpirits were otherwiſe dulled, and his bloud greatly diſtempered, was amazed at the voyce: which ſeene, his ſeruants ranne to this man, and with blowes forced him to leaue the reines of the horſe: and ſo without any further ſearch the man vaniſhed away.

Charles in the forreſt, at Noonday ſeeth an apparition.

(47) The troupes of his nobles, diuided becauſe of the duſt, King Charles was followed by the Pages of his Chamber, who ouercharged with heat and diſtemperature, tooke no great paines to guide their horſe, ſo that thronging together, he which bore the Kings Lance, let it fal vpon him, who had on his head the Kings helmet, and in the falling made a clattering noyſe. The King much muſing vpon the words ſpoken, and now withall hearing this vnexpected noyſe, was from a penſiue melancholy ſuddainely ſtrucke into a raging Lunacy, ſuppoſing himſelfe to be betraied indeed: and tranſported with this frenſie he drawes his ſword, and made towards his Pages with a maine cry: his brother Orleance not knowing the cauſe, haſted among them, whom Charles likewiſe purſued, and with the like rage ranne at his vncle of Burgogne; thus ſpending himſelfe, and his horſe out of breath, all incompaſſed the ſtill raging man, tooke from him his ſword, diſ-robed him for heate, and cheared him with flatterings and faire ſpoken words; his brother and Vncles ſaluted him, but he knowes them not, ſits mute, ſighing and panting, and with troubled amazement moues both body and head, ſo that all ſignes of Phrenſie appeared in this poore Prince, and the eminent miſery that was to fall vpon France, very apparant to the in-ſeeing Statiſts: but now to proceed.

His followers thronging confuſedly to helpe, doe diſtemper him the more.

He runneth diſtractiuely at euery one with his Sword.

(48) Iohn Duke of Burgogne ill digeſting the threats that King Henry had giuen, and joyned in league with the Daulphin, as we haue ſaid: was notwithſtanding ſuſpected to be a great enemy to the State, and as the Giants are faind, to heape mountaine vpon mountaine, for ſteps of aſſent to pull Iupiter out of his Throne, ſo by ſiniſter Counſellors Burgogne was accuſed of ſome intended ſtratageme, as meaning to mount the Chaire where the Daulphin ſhould ſit: Charles therefore from Monſtreau-

(49) The Duke miſtruſting no Snake in the graſſe, thought all things as ſure as they were faire in ſhew: and accompanied with many Noble-men, fiue hundred horſe, and two hundred Archers, he repayred to Monſtreau, at whoſe Gate the Daulphin had built 2. Barricadoes, and himſelfe in armes ſtood there to receiue the Duke. Burgogne approached, kneeled downe vpon one knee, and with an honourable reuerence ſaluted him moſt humbly, the Daulphin neglecting all courteſies to him-ward, charged him with breach of promiſe, for that the ciuill warres and his garriſons were not ſurceaſt and with-drawne, the Dukes ſword hanging too-farre backe, and ſomewhat troubling his kneeling, he put his hand vpon the hilt, to put it more forward, whereat Robert de Loire ſtanding by, ſaid, Doe you draw your ſword againſt the Lord Daulphin? at which words, Tanneguy de Chaſtell with a Battle-axe ſtroke him on the face, and cut off his Chin, and others with other wounds made an end of his life, before he could ariſe from his knee, or get out his ſword.

Burgogne repayring to the Daulphin, is charged with breach of promiſe.

(50) Queene Iſabel, another cruell Medea, and vnnaturall mother, hauing a double offence done her, re-doubled her wrath, and continued her tragick paſſions againſt her ſonne the young Daulphin, who not onely incites Philip now the new Duke of Burgogn to reuenge his murthered fathers death, but torments her poore husbands ſpirits, in perſwading him to diſherite Charles their ſonne, and to giue in marriage Lady Katherine vnto King Henry, who now had ſet his foote farre into France. Duke Philip for his part ready for reuenge, ſent the Biſhop of Arras with other his Ambaſſadors vnto Roane to King Henry to entreat a peace, and againe not many daies after their returne ſent backe the ſaide Biſhop, whoſe meſſage was ſo pleaſing, that Henry ſent the Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Earle of Warwicke & Guien vnto Arras, who were as welcome vnto Duke Philip; ſo that betwixt Roane and Arras meſſengers continually paſſed till a peace was concluded; which was proclaimed to continue from that day (then about the Feaſt of the Epiphanie) vnto mid-March enſuing, betwixt King Henry, King Charles, and Philip Duke of Burgogne.

(51) King Henry thus farre gone in his affaires for that Crowne, ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto the new made Pope Martin the firſt, ſuch was the fate of Romes Apoſtolicall fathers in thoſe faire Sun-ſhine and Golden daies, that the greateſt Monarch was but a vaſſal to attend vpon their ſtirrop, & their Crowns ſubject to be ſpurned off, with their feete. Henrie therefore minding to ſtop the violence of theſe narrow Seas, and to make the ſtreame milde betwixt his two Realmes, had now none to let, but onely him that was all in all, and bare an Oare in euery mans boat: and therefore from King Charles, Burgogne, and himſelfe, his Ambaſſadors ſollicited his fatherly conſent, to admit him his moſt Chriſtian ſonne of France, and to giue his holy bleſſing for the confirmation of the marriage, and peace concluded betwixt thoſe two famous Princes. King Henries right to the French Crowne they plainely laide forth, what calamities France had felt in their reſiſtance, Azincourt, Normandy, and Aquitaine (as they ſhewed him) were moſt lamentable witneſſes, and the hold that the Lyon had got (at that day) of the Flower de Luce, was not to be wreſted out of his faſt graſped pawes. But his dull eare was deafe hereunto, anſwering that this peace was prejudiciall to the right of Charles the Daulphin, and therefore he denied to confirme it.

(52) But with what quill theſe wines were vented from the ſetled Lees for the Daulphin, vnleſſe it was the golden vice, (a powerfull key indeed to vnlocke the Popes ſilent lips,) I know not; moſt true it is, the conditions went forward, and the place for the confirmation of couenants was Troyes in Champagne, where King Charles, and his Queene then lay, and whither Burgogne, Guien, the Lord Roſſe, and others, attended with fiue hundred horſe, were ſent Ambaſſadors from Henry. In their way they beſieged (and after fifteene daies wan) the Towne of Creſpie that held for the Daulphin, demoliſhed the Caſtell, razed the wals, and departed vpon compoſition.

Ambaſſadours from King Henry.

Theſe comming to Troyes were honorably receiued, and louingly concluded on a finall peace, where Lady Katherine was attended as the Engliſh Queene, and ſome left to guard her by King Henries commaund. His Ambaſſadors returned, and affection enflamed, himſelfe attended with the Dukes of Clarence, and Glouceſter, his brethren, the Duke of Exceſter, the Earles of Warwicke, Huntingdon, Salisbury, Guienne, and many other Nobles, (his guard conſiſting of 1600. Launces and Archers) departed from Roane to Ponthois, to S. Denis, and from thence into Prouince, where he was met neere vnto Troyes by the Duke of Burgundy, and many other French Lords; and with all Princely attendance was conducted into the Towne. The joy was great with which he was receiued, eſpecially of the King, the Queene, and Lady Katherine, whom he found in S^t. Peters Church expecting his comming, where forthwith he and the Lady was affianced; and falling eſtſoones into conference of the conditions of amity, theſe were conſented vnto by the French and King Henry.

Hiſtory of Normandy.

1. That K. Henry ſhold take Lady Katherine to wife.

2. That Charles and Iſabel ſhould retaine the name of King and Queene, and ſhould hold all their dignities, rents, and poſſeſſions belonging to the Crowne of France, during their naturall liues.

The Articles agreed vpon betwixt the two Kings.

3. That the Lady Katherine ſhould haue her Dowry in England, as Queens heretofore were wont to haue, that is to ſay, the ſumme of forty thouſand ſceutes, that is, two to a Noble.

Queene Katherines Dowry.

4. That the ſame ſumme of forty thouſand ſceutes yearely, ſhall be confirmed vnto Queene Katherine by our Lawes, according to our vſuall rights, at the time of our death.

5. That the ſaid Lady Katherine ſo ouer-liuing vs, from the time of our death, ſhal haue for her Dowry in the Kingdome of France, the ſumme of twenty thouſand Francks yearely, out of the Lands, Places, and Lordſhips, that Blanch ſometime wife to Philip Beauiſall held and enioyed.

The Crowne of France intailed to England.

6. That after the death of Charles our ſaid father, the Crowne & Realme of France ſhall with all rights and appurtenances remaine vnto vs, and to our heires for euermore.

7. And for as much as our ſaid father is infirme by reaſon of ſickneſſe, & may not entend in his owne perſon to diſpoſe of the affaires of the Realme, therefore during the life of our ſaid father, the faculties and exerciſe of the gouernement, and diſpoſition of the publique vtility of the Realme of France ſhall be, and abide to vs, ſo that thenceforth we may gouerne the Realme, and admit to our Councell and aſſiſtance to the Councell of France ſuch of the Engliſh Nobility as we ſhall thinke meete.

The gouernement of France aſſigned to King Henry.

8. That alſo we of our owne power ſhall cauſe the Court of France to be kept and obſerued in as full authority, and in all manner of places, that now or in time comming, is, or ſhall be ſubject to our ſaid father.

9. Alſo that wee to our powers ſhall defend and helpe all, and euery of the Peeres, Nobles, Cities, Townes, Cominalties and ſingular perſons, now or in time to come, ſubiects to our father, in their rights, Cuſtomes, priuiledges, freedomes, franchiſes, belonging, or due vnto them, in all manner of places, now or in time comming ſubject to our father.

10. Alſo that we ſhall to our power trauell truely and and diligently, to ſee that Iuſtice be adminiſtred in the ſame realme of France according to their Lawes, Cuſtomes, and Rights of the ſame Realme, without perſonall acception; and that we ſhall keepe and hold the Subjects of the ſayd Realme in tranquillity and peace to our power, and ſhall defend them againſt all manner of violence and oppreſſion.

11. Alſo that we to our power ſhall prouide that able and profitable perſons ſhall execute the offices aſwell of Iuſtices and other offices belonging to the gouernance of the demaines of the realme of France, for the good and peaceable Iuſtice of the ſame, and for the adminiſtration that ſhall be committed vnto them.

12. Alſo that wee of our power, ſo ſoone as it may commodiouſly be done, ſhall trauaile to put into obedience of our ſaid father, all manner of Cities, Townes, Caſtels, Places, Countries, and perſons within the Realme of France, diſobedient and Rebels to our ſaid father, ſyding with them that be called the Daulphin, or Armagnac.

13. And that we may the more commodiouſly and freely exerciſe and fulfill theſe things aforeſaid, it is accorded, that all worthy Nobles and eſtates of the ſame Realme of France, aſwell ſpirituals as temporals, and alſo the Nobles, Citizens, Burgeſſes, and Comminalties of France, in obedience at this day to our ſaid father ſhall make theſe Oathes vnto vs.

The ſubjects of France ſworne to King Henry.

14. Firſt to vs hauing the faculty, exerciſe, diſpoſition, and gouernance of the foreſaid common profit at our heſts and commandements, theſe ſhall meekely and obediently obey in all manner of things concerning the exerciſe of Gouernement in the ſame Realme.

15. Alſo that the worthy, great, and noble Eſtates of the ſaide Realme aſwell ſpirituals as temporals, Citizens, Burgeſſes, and Comminalties of the ſame Realme, in all manner of things, well and truely ſhall keepe, and to their power ſhall doe to be kept in aſmuch as to them belongeth, or to any of them, all thoſe things that be appoynted and accorded betweene our foreſaid father, our mother, and vs.

The tenor of the Oath.

16. And that continually, from the death, and after the death of our ſaide father Charles, they ſhall be our true Liege-men, and our heires, and they ſhall receiue and admit vs for their Liege, and Soueraigne, and very King of France, and for ſuch to obey vs without oppoſition, Contradiction or difficulty, as they be to our father during his life. And neuer after, this Realme of France ſhall obey to man as King and Regent of France, but to vs, & to our heires. Alſo they ſhall not be in Counſell, helpe, or aſſent, that we looſe life or limme, or be taken with euill taking, or that we ſuffer harme or diminution in perſon, eſtate, worſhip, or goods, but if they know any ſuch thing to be contriued or imagined againſt vs, they ſhall let it to their powers, and ſhall doe vs to witten thereof, as haſtily as they may by themſelues, by meſſage, or by letters.

17. That all manner of Conqueſts that ſhall be made by vs in France vpon the diſobedient in the Dutchies of Normandy, ſhall be done to the profit of our ſaid father, and that to our power, all manner of Lands and Lordſhips, that be in places to be conquered, belonging to perſons, obeying to our fore-father, which ſhall ſweare to this preſent accord, ſhall be reſtored to the ſame perſons, to whom they belonged.

18. That all manner of perſons of the holy Church beneficed in the Dutchie of Normandy, or any other places in the Realme of France, ſubject to our father, and fauouring of the parts of the Dukes of Burgundy, which ſhall ſweare to keepe this preſent accord, ſhall peaceably injoy their Benefices of holy Church in the Dutchie of Normandy, or in other places next aforeſaid.

19. Likewiſe that all manner of perſons of holy Church, obedient to vs, and beneficed in the Realme of France, and places ſubject to our father, that ſhall ſweare to keepe this preſent accord, ſhall enjoy peaceably their Benefices of holy Church, as is aforeſaide.

20. Alſo that all manner of Churches, Vniuerſities and Studies-generall, all Colledges of Students, and other Colledges of holy Church, being in places now, or in time comming, ſubject to our father, or in the dutchy of Normandy, or other places in the realm of France ſubject to vs, ſhall enjoy their rights, poſſeſſions, rents, prerogatiues, liberties, and franchiſes, belonging, or due to them in any manner of wiſe, in the ſaide Realme of France, ſauing the right of the Crowne of France, and of euery other perſon.

Churches, Vniuerſities, and Colledges to enjoy their liberties.

21. Alſo by Gods helpe, when it happeneth vs to come to the Crowne of France, the Dutchy of Normandy, and all other places conquered by vs in the ſaid Realme, ſhall bow vnder the Commandement, obeyſance, and Monarchy of the Crowne of France.

Normandy to be vnder the Crowne of France.

22. Alſo that we to our power ſhall ſee recompence to be made by our ſaid father, without diminution of the Crowne of France, to perſons obeying him, and fauouring the party of Burgundy, to whom Lands, Lordſhips, Rents, and poſſeſſions belongeth in the ſaid Dutchie of Normandy, or other places in the Realme of France conquered by vs hitherto, giuen by vs in places, Lands, gotten, or to be gotten in the name of our ſaid father vpon Rebels and inobedients to him; and if ſo be that ſuch manner of recompence be not made to the ſaide perſons in the life-time of our ſaid father, we ſhall make that recompence in ſuch manner and places of goods, when it happeneth by Gods grace to the Crowne of France, and if ſo be that the Lands, Lordſhips, Rents, or poſſeſſions belonging to ſuch manner of perſons in the ſaid Dutchie and other places, be not giuen by vs, the ſame perſons ſhall be referred to them without any delay.

23. And during the life of our father in all places, now, and in time to come, ſubject to him, letters of common juſtice, grants of offices, gifts, pardons, remiſſions, and priuiledges, ſhall be written and proceed vnder the name and Seale of our ſaid Father. And foraſmuch as ſome ſingular caſe may fall that may not be fore-ſeene by mans wit, in the which it may be neceſſary and behouefull, that we write our letters; in ſuch caſe if any hap, for the good and ſurety of our father, and for the gouernement that belongeth to vs, as is aforeſaid, and to auoid perils which otherwiſe might fall, to the prejudice of our ſaid father, to write our letters, by the which we ſhall command, charge, and defend, after the nature and quality of the need in our fathers behalfe, and ours, as Regent of France.

Letters, Grants, Gifts, &c. ſigned by King Charles,

And by King Henry.

24. Alſo that during our fathers life, we ſhall not call, nor write vs King of France, but ſhall verily abſtaine from that name, ſo long as our ſaide Father liueth.

25. Alſo that our ſaid father during his life, ſhall name, call, and write vs in French in this manner. Noſtre treſchier Filz Henry Roy d'Engleterre heretere de France: & in Latin in this manner; Præclariſſimus filius noſter, Henricus Rex Angliæ, & Hæres Franciæ.

King Henries Stile during King Charles his life.

26. That wee ſhall put no impoſitions or exactions to charge the Subjects of our ſaid father, without cauſe reaſonable and neceſſary. No otherwiſe then for common good of the Realme of France, and according to the Lawes and Cuſtomes prouided for the ſame Realme.

27. Alſo that we ſhall trauell to our power, to effect that by the aſſent of the three ſtates of the Realmes of England and France, all manner of obſtacles may be done away, and this chiefly, that it be ordained and prouided, that from the time that wee, or any of our heires come to the Crowne of France, both the Crownes, that is to ſay, of France and England, perpetually be together in one, and in the ſame perſon, that is to ſay, from our fathers life to vs, and from the terme of our life thence forward, in the perſons of our heires, that ſhall be one after another, and

and that both Realmes ſhall be gouerned from the time that we, or our heires, come to the ſame, not ſeuerally vnder diuers Kings in one time, but vnder the ſame perſon, which for the time ſhall be King of both Realmes, and our Soueraigne Lord, as is aforeſaid, keeping neuertheleſſe in all manner of things, to either of the ſaid Realmes, their rights, liberties, cuſtomes, vſages and lawes, not making ſubiect in any manner of wiſe, one of the ſame Realmes to the rights, lawes or vſages of that other.

28. That thenceforth perpetually ſhall be ſtill reſt, and that in all manner of wiſe diſſentions, hates, rancours, enuies, and warres, betweene the ſame Realmes of France and England, and the people of the ſame Realmes drawing to accord of the ſame peace may ceaſe and be broken.

The vnion of the Subiects.

29. That from henceforth for euermore, peace and tranquility, good accord and affection, and ſtable friendſhip ſhall be betwixt the ſaid Realmes and the Subiects of the ſame, and ſhall keepe themſelues with their Counſels, helpes, and common aſſiſtance againſt all men that inforce them to doe, or to imagine wrongs, harmes, diſpleaſures, or grieuances to them or either of them, and that they ſhall be conuerſant in marchandizing freely and ſurely together, paying the Cuſtomes due and accuſtomed, and that all the confederates and allies of our ſaid Father, and the Realme of France, as alſo our confederates of the Realme of England, ſhall in eight months ſpace from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, ſauing neuertheleſſe their obedience to either of the ſame Crownes, and to all manner of actions, rights, and reuenues, that belong to our ſaid Father and his Subiects, and to vs, and our Subiects againſt all manner of ſuch Allies and Confederates.

No peace with the Daulphin.

30. That our Father, neither our Brother the Duke of Burgundy, ſhall begin nor make with Charles, calling himſelfe the Daulphin of Viennes, any treaty, peace, or accord, but by Counſell and aſſent of each of vs three, or of other the three eſtates of either the ſaid Realmes aboue-named.

31. Alſo that we, with the aſſent of our brother of Burgundy, and other of the Nobles of the Realme of France, which ought thereunto to be called, ſhall ordaine for the Gouernance of our ſaid Father, ſurely, louingly and honeſtly, after the degree of his royall eſtate and dignity, in ſuch wiſe, as ſhall be to the worſhip of God, of our ſaid Father, & of the Realme of France.

32. (53) In whoſe preſence alſo, vpon the third of Iune, (being the morrow after Trinity Sunday) the marriage of King Henry and Lady Katherine, with all pompous ſolemnity was celebrated in Saint Peters Church at Troyes, the Biſhop of that See doing the Ceremonies. And after royall feaſts and Princely entertainments, before the diſſolution of that royall aſſembly, King Henry, inuiting the French King and others his great Peeres to a ſumptuous banquet, made a pithy and pleaſing Oration vnto them, thus teſtifying his Princely deſire to aduance their weale, and demerit their loue.

" (54) As the chiefe marke whereunto my cares "and endeauours haue hitherto leuelled, hath beene, " to vnite and concorporate theſe two Kingdomes "of Fraunce and England into one, which now by "Gods goodneſſe is moſt happily effected; ſo is it "ſtill, and euer ſhall be, both my deſire and care, that "vnto poſterity we may leaue it ſetled in the ſame "ſort, and free from all empeachments of factious "diſcords: that being (as it is) the greateſt, it may "be alſo the happieſt Monarchy of Europe. For the "cleere accompliſhment of which worke, there reſts "now nothing, but the depreſſing of the Daulphin, "who is by your doome already, not onely depriued "of that dignity, but of ſucceſſion to the Crowne, "and proſecuted as a Traitour to the State; and of "whom this we muſt be aſſured, that while he liues France cannot but be in a perpetuall combuſtion. "For preuenting whereof, I both neede and intreate, "both your Counſels and aide, nothing doubting "of our readineſſe in either; for how can we expect "any ſafety, or you any goodneſſe at his hand, who, "in his young yeares, did ſo perfidiouſly murther the "Duke of Burgundy his Vncle? I am now, you ſee, "your Regent in preſent, and Succeſſour to the "Crowne in hope; Let it not therefore ſticke in "your hearts, that I am an Engliſhman borne, for "you know I haue much French bloud in my vaines, "which warmes my affections as well to French as "Engliſh; but looke on me as the lawfull heire to the "Diademe, both by iuſt Title, and your owne con"ſents, who therefore am, and ought to be, wholly "yours; and your kindneſſe and iuſt dealing bind me "ſo to be. (55) Theſe affaires thus accompliſhed at Troyes, the Kings, the Queenes, and the reſt of the Peeres, in great eſtate rode vnto Paris, where all faire countenances were ſhewed, and great entertainment giuen to the Engliſh. But the Daulphin and his followers neither feared nor fainted, though the preſent courſes pleaſed not their palats. Their firſt Counſell therefore was how to preſerue themſelues in ſo eminent danger; to ſit ſtill and doe nothing, they knew it was but to increaſe and aduance the ſucceſſes of the Engliſh; and to riſe without ſtrength, was to fall into into further misfortunes, hauing no meanes to hold warre with so potent an Enemy. In this distraction their voice was best heard, that spake most for the safety of the Daulphin, (whose onely life gaue breath vnto the after-hopes of France) & for the strengthening of those places which might be of most aduantage to themselues, and offence to the Enemie. This then past by decree in that Counsell of warre, that the Daulphin should at no time hazard his person in field, and that a leuy of Souldiers should be had, to lie in Garrison in places conuenient; for Time, which neuer stands still, they well hoped might yet turne the rice for them, fortune being (said they) as subiect to fawne, as to frowne; in which resolution each man tooke to his charge, and all to withstand the doings of Henry.

(56) As these consulted for the state of the French, so in Paris a Parliament of the three estates was assembled, wherein such as were guilty of the death of Burgundy, were iusticed, the disherizing of the Daulphin confirmed, and wars prepared against those Townes which held for him. Against Sens the two Kings with their Queenes, Clarence, and Burgundy, marched; which after 12. daies was rendered vpon composition of life, those excepted as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundies death. Monstreau was the next, which by force was entred, where the body of the Duke of Burgundy, vndecently buried by the Daulphinois, was taken vp, & by his sonne Philip sent in great pompe to Dijon in his Dutchy, and there honourably interred. The Towne being taken, the Castle held out: vnto whose Captaine twenty Captiue Gentlemen were sent, whose liues from King Henries mouth (say the French) were sentenced to death, vnlesse they could perswade the Castellan to surrender; but those men (say our English, to mollifie that seuere doome) were all especiall friends of that Captaine, and such as had giuen opprobrious words to the Kings Herauld, being sent vnto them in the siege of Monstreau. Howsoeuer, in this extremity they sollicited Guily vpon their knees, vrging their owne deaths, and his great danger if he held out; but Guily a true Frenchman, and friend to the Daulphin, withstood the assault, and thereupon these Gentlemen Petitioners were presently hanged in the sight of the defendants: so bloudy is Mars to maintaine his owne Lawes, and so eager was Henry of his full conquest of France, whose thirsting sword had heretofore beene somewhat ouer-lauish in bloud, but neuer more (perhaps) then in this bloudy act; which I wish might be obliterated from the number of his other glorious actions. Yet at length was that Castle enforced to surrender vpon composition of life, excepting the guilties of Burgundies death.

(57) Then was the siege remoued to Melun, a Towne of great strength, and made more strong by the valours of her Commanders, who were Signieur Barbason an absolute souldier, Pierre de Bourbon a Prince of the bloud, Preaux, and Burgeois, whose Garrison was seuen hundred Daulphinois: & indeed no default in defence could anywise be imputed, but the Canon opening a breach, the English and Burgundians made an entry into the Bulwarke, and ouer the Riuer Seine built a Bridge with Boates; so that from either quarter they had passage one to the other without impediments, and encamped themselues for their best aduantage; vpon whom the enemy neuertheless made diuers sallies, with the losse of either parties. King Henry inforced his siege to the vtmost, and made a myne vnderneath the wals, which being perceiued, the defendants countermined against him; where the King (too forward) as the very first man entring his myne, and Barbason likewise his within the Towne, met each other at point of sword, where they performed nobly the parts of priuate souldiers, (nobly indeed, if priuate souldiers they had been, but Princes should remember they are not such) till lastly they agreed to discouer themselues, and first Barbason made knowne his name, then King Henry did his, whereupon the French Lord suddainely getting backe, caused the Barriers to be closed, and Henry returned to his Campe.

(58) This enterprize failing, King Charles himselfe came into the Campe, to induce the defendants to render, at the presence of their naturall Lord; which neuertheless was little respected; for answer was made, that if their King were at liberty, and free from King Henries power, they would doe him the duty of naturall subiects, and yeeld him their charge as their Liege-Lord: but being as he was, they desired to be excused, for to the mortall enemy of France they would not yeeld.

(59) Whilest King Henry lay at the siege of Melun, the Duke of Bauier (who was Palsegraue of Rhyne, Elector) came to King Henry, hauing married his sister, and thence sent a defiance vnto the Daulphin, his kinsman by Queene Isabell his mother; the Prince of Orange likewise came thither vnto Henry, but because he required an Oath of him, as a subiect of France, he went away displeased, saying, he was a free Prince, and ought neither obedience to England nor France. At which time the Parisians, with more respect of their owne safety, committed their Citie vnto K. Henries deuotion, who deputed his brother Clarence (though Count Saint Paul with his French displeased) Gouernour thereof, and put Garrisons into the Bastile of *S. (60) The distresse of Melun was wonderfull great, as well vpon the siegers, as defendants; the one afflicted, and their troupes sore weakened with mortality, the other oppressed with famine, and other defects incident to a long endured siege. In this state eighteene weekes were spent, and more had beene, but that the English were supplied with souldiers out of Picardy, whose colours displayed a farre off, put the Towne in hope of relieue as sent from the Daulphin, but vpon their neerer approach, Melun was rendred by these capitulations. 1. That the Towne and Castle should be deliuered to the King. 2. That aswell the men of warre, as the Burgesses, should submit themselues to King Henry, to be dealt-with as pleased the King. 3. That all such as should be found guilty of the Duke of Burgundies murther should suffer death. 4. That all the rest of the souldiers should be receiued to mercy, but to be prisoners vntill they put in good caution for their true obedience in after-times. 5. That the Natiues of France should be sent home to their owne Countryes. 6. That all the moueables and Armes in the Towne should be carried into the Castle. 7. That all the Prisoners they had taken either before or during the siege, should be enlarged ransome-free, and acquitted of their promises. 8. That for the performance of these Articles, 12. of the principall Captaines, and 6. of the wealthiest Burgesses should deliuer themselues in hostage. 9. That all the English and Scots, should be deliuered to Henry, and left at his disposition.

(61) Melun being rendred, and theſe things thus diſpoſed, the two Kings with their Queenes moſt honourably attended, returned to Paris, before whoſe entrance the Citizens and Students met them in moſt ſolemne manner, hauing beautified the City with flags, ſtreamers, and rich hangings, throughout the ſtreetes where they ſhould paſſe. The two Kings rode together vnder a rich Canopy, Henry vpon the left hand, next vnto whom followed the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and vpon their left hand the Duke of Burgundy clad all in blacke, the Princes and Nobles of either Nation mingled together in their degrees, the Clergy with proceſſions, and their venerable reliques, going before them to Noſtre dame Church; and the next day the two Queenes entred the City with as great a ſhew. King Henries Pallace was prepared in the Loure, which was moſt rich and magnificent, and Charles his Court in the Hoſtel of S^t. Paul, being but homely and meane; for (ſaith Millet) young Henry commanded all, and his brethren exerciſed ſupreame authority, whiles olde Charles ſtood as a Cypher, and the French Nobility had nothing to doe.

(62) During the two Kings abode here, a great Aſſembly was called as well of the Spiritualty, as of the ſecular Nobility, in whoſe preſence, in the great Hall of the Hoſtell, a State for Iuſtice was prepared, where the two Kings ſitting as ſupreame Iudges, vnder one Cloath of eſtate, the Court was furniſhed with Princes and Officers in moſt ſolemne wiſe. Before whom, Nicholas Rollin Aduocate from the Duke of Burgundy, & the Dutcheſſe his mother, craued audience (& had it granted) vnto an inuectiue & long Oration againſt Charles Viſcount Narbone, Tanneguy, Barbaſon, and others, for the cruell murther of Iohn Duke of Burgundy; and not only that the murtherers might be accordingly executed, but withall, that a Church might be founded and furniſhed with ſacred Ornaments for twelue Channons, ſixe Chaplaines, and ſixe Clerkes to pray for his ſoule for euer, euery Channon to haue yearely two hundred pound Paris money, euery Chaplaine one hundred, and euery Clerke fifty, to be leuied vpon the Lands of the Daulphin, and his aſſociates in the murther: that the ſame foundation ſhould be engrauen vpon the Porch thereof, and the like inſcription ſet vp publikely in the Cities of Paris, Roane, Graunt, Dijon, Saint Iames of Compoſtella, & Ieruſalem. This motion was ſeconded by a Doctor of Diuinity appointed by the Rector of the Vniuerſity, who concluded with an humble requeſt to the King and thoſe Princes, that iuſtice might be done. Whereunto the Chancellor of France, in the behalfe of King Charles, promiſed that no endeauour on his part ſhould be lacking; and thereupon cauſed his ſonne to be ſolemnely called to the Marble-Table, to anſwere his accuſation, by the name of Charles Duke of Touraine, and Daulphin de Vienne, which done three ſeuerall times, and he not appearing, by arreſt of the ſame Court of Parliament, he was baniſhed the Realme, and iudged vnworthy to ſucceed in any of the Signiories, as well preſent, as to come. But the Daulphin appealed from this ſentence, to God and his ſword, and ſtill was the ſame, though his fortunes were changeable. Mounſieur de Barbaſon was vehemently accuſed to haue his hand in the murther, and therefore King Henrie accordingly gaue ſentence on him to ſuffer death; but he in open Court defended himſelfe, not to bee guilty of the crime, although he confeſſed to be a true ſeruant to the Daulphin. Notwithſtanding, had he not appealed to the Officers of Armes, King Henries iudgement of death had gone againſt him: for the Law-Military, as he there alleaged, forbiddeth, that any man, hauing his brother in Armes within his danger, ſhould afterwards put him to death for any cauſe or quarrell, and proued himſelfe to be the Kings brother in Armes, for that he had in the Countermine coaped in combate with the King. Thus by a quirke of Heraldry acquitted from death, he was neuertheleſſe retained in priſon the ſpace of nine yeares, and laſtly at the winning of Caſtle-Galliard from the Engliſh, was deliuered out of moſt ſtraight impriſonment, to the great ioy of the French.

(63) This execution of Iuſtice on thoſe Murtherers, was a great, but not the onely act of K. Henry at this great Parliament of three Eſtates of France in Paris. For therein alſo was the finall accord betwixt the two Kings openly acknowledged by the French King, as made by his free aſſent, and with aduiſe of all the Councell of France; whereupon it was there alſo ratified by the generall ſtates of France, and ſworne vnto particularly vpon the holy Euangeliſts, by all their Nobles and Magiſtrates, ſpirituall and ſecular, who alſo ſet their ſeales to the Inſtruments thereof, which were ſent into England to be kept in the Kings * Exchequer at Weſtminſter. King Henries glory thus aſcended to the higheſt verticall in France, his Court was not onely honoured daily both with Courtly and military ſhewes and paſtimes, but alſo was ſtill frequented both with forraine Ambaſſadours, and domeſticke Commiſſioners, whoſe directions depended only vpon his voluntary aſſigne, himſelfe redreſſing all things at his pleaſure, placing and diſplacing Officers and Gouernours, cauſing alſo a new Coyne to be made, called a Salute, wherein were the Armes of France, and the Armes of England and France, quarterly ſtamped. King Charles the while in his Pallace, was but for faſhions ſake viſited, and but by ſome of his olde ſeruants, his Sunne was drawne ſo neere vnto the ſetting. The great affaires of France thus ſetled, (as well as that vnſetled time would permit,) King Henry minding to Crowne his Queene in England, ordained his brother of Clarence, (a wiſe, valiant, and a great Captaine) his Lieutenant-generall of France, leauing alſo the Duke of Exceſter with 500. men of Armes to keepe Paris; and ſo attended with great ſtate, he came to Amiens and Callis, where taking to Sea, he arriued at Douer vpon the third of February, and was receiued of his Subiects as an Angell from heauen, or another victorious Cæſar on Earth.

(66) Neither was his haſt more then needed: for Iohn Earle of Bucquhanan, and Archbald Dowglas, two valiant leaders of ſeauen hundred reſolute Scots, repaired into France to ayde the Daulphin, and ioyning with the French in Anion, meant to haue ſurprized the Duke of Clarence before he had been aware: in which enterprize, foure ſtragling Scots, taken and brought to his preſence * as he ſate at dinner, reuealed the intent and ſtrength of the Enemy, whoſe approach was very neere at hand. This newes no ſooner came, but the Duke ouer-haſtily got to horſe (ſaying, they are all ours) leauing his troupes to follow him with as much celerity as they might. The * cauſe of this ouerthrow, is imputed to the Dukes haſt in not ſtaying for his Horſemen. Clarence that day vpon his Creſt ware a Circlet ſet with precious ſtones, which being taken off his Helmet by a Scot, was ſold to Iohn Steward of Derby, for a thouſand Angels. For this fortunate dayes ſucceſſe (wherein yet the Enemy alſo loſt eleauen hundred, and ſundry of them men of principal note,) the Daulphin made the Earle of Bucquhanan Conſtable of France. This loſſe receiued, the Earle of Salisbury (who followed with the other forces, but came too late to the encounter,) thought to requite, and bringing forward his troupes, the enemy gaue ground, whereby yet hee recouered the dead body of Clarence, and ſent it to Roane, from whence it was conuayed into England.

Wherefore ordaining his other brother Iohn Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and leauing his faire Queene moſt honorably attended, vpon the tenth of Iune he landed at Callis, hauing in his company Iames king of Scotland, in hope either to draw the Scots vnto his ſeruice, or elſe to withdraw their ayds from the Daulphin, by the ſight of their own king vnder his royall ſtandard. But the Scots, conſtantly French, being demanded why they would fight againſt their Soueraigne, anſwered directly, that they might not acknowledge any duty vnto Iames, who as yet liued vnder the obedience of another. (70) The morrow after his arriuall he diſpatched the Earle of Dorſet, & the Lord Clifford with twelue hundred horſe and foot vnto Paris, to relieue the Duke of Exceſter, who was ſtraightned of victuals by the Dolphinois, that harraſed the Country adioyning, taking Bonneual, Galandon, and ſome other forts, and in his fortunate ſucceſſes, and new conceiued hope then marched to Chartiers with ſeauen thouſand men at Armes, foure thouſand Croſſe-bowes, and ſixe thouſand Archers ſtrong, where he began the ſiege, whom the Baſtard of Thian brauely reſiſted, and ſent to King Henry for aide.

Enguerrant.

(71) Henry, after a few dayes ſtay in Callis, marched to Monſtrelet, and there lodged, quartering his Army in the villages about, where he found the Duke of Burgogne ſomewhat impaired of health: three daies ſpent in conference, King Henry marched into Ponthieu, and the Duke to Abbeuill vpon Some, to facilitate his paſſage there to be made, whereof ſome doubt was held by reaſon of the Inhabitants diſpoſition, altogether vnſetled, and as ready to offend, as affect. Henry in his way tooke the Fort called La Ferte, commanded by the Baſtard of Belluy, which vpon ſummons rendered, and being committed to the cuſtody of Borfflers a Picard, was betrayed againe by him vnto the Daulphin: from hence departing, he paſſed the riuer at Abbeuill, where hee was royally receiued, and richly preſented, whence he marched to Beauuois, Giſors, & ſo to Bois-de Vincennes, where Charles and his Queene reſided, and receiued him with great honour, and laſtly to Paris where he was receiued in triumph.

Hiſtory of Normandy.

(72) But more minding a Conqueſt then the delicate pleaſures of Court, after he had conſulted vpon his affaires, and leuied French forces to adde to the Engliſh, he marched toward Meaux, intending (in reuenge of his brothers death) to fight with the Daulphin, who had now laine before Chartiers the ſpace of three weekes, and giuen it forth hee would come into the field. But hearing of King Henries comming, and that his Army by the acceſſe of ſupplies from Paris, and Normandy, was much increaſed, he brake vp his ſiege and departed: which newes related, Henry marched to Dreaux, and ſate downe before it. The Inhabitants and Garriſon ſenſible of the danger, praied parley, and accorded to render the Towne, if the Daulphin did not relieue them by a certain day, which expired, the Towne was deliuered, and eight hundred of the Daulphins ſouldiers permitted to depart vpon their Oathes, not to beare Armes againſt King Henry, nor his allies, for the ſpace of one yeare: then following the Daulphin (who fled ſtill before him) in his march he tooke Baugency, Rougmont, and other places of defence.

Enguerrant de Monſtrel.

(73) Seeing his purſuit of the flying Daulphin to be fruitleſſe, hee diuerted his Army vnto Luigny vpon the riuer of Marne, where * he cauſed many engines and habiliaments for the warre to be made; hauing a deſigne to beſiege Meaux in Brie, and infeſt the Faulxbourg, ſending before him the Duke of Exceſter with foure thouſand ſtrong, to preuent the burning of Meaux, by the Inhabitants, and a * few daies after followed himſelfe. His firſt worke was to ſecure his Armie, by entrenching his Quarters, which done and the Artillery mounted, hee beganne to batter the wals, and to make his Mines, wherein neither his induſtry nor perſonall labour was ſpared; and within, the Baſtard of Vaurus, with many men of marke, beſides the Inhabitants, and a thouſand trained Souldiers, were as buſie and reſolute for the defence. Meane-while Iaques de Harecourt, in ſeruice of the Daulphin, with ſeuen hundred ſouldiers harraſed the parts about Vimeu, againſt whom, ſome Engliſh Garriſons thereabout aſſembling, ſlew three hundred of his retinue, himſelfe hardly eſcaping by the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe.

An.D.1421. December 6.

(74) Whilſt King Henry lay in his ſiege before Meaux, newes was brought him that his Queene, at the Caſtle of Windſore, was deliuered of a Sonne, named alſo Henry, whereat he exceedingly reioyced, though (as ſome will haue it) he liked not well the place of her deliuery, hauing before commanded the contrary, and prophecying, that what Henry of Monmouth ſhould get, Henry of Windſore would looſe. At the ſame time likewiſe he heard that Auranches in Normandy, was ſurprized by the Daulphinois; and aboue three hundred Engliſh there in Garriſon put to the ſword, or taken Priſoners; to remedy which, King Henry ſent part of his owne Armie vnto the Earle of Salisbury his Lieutenant of Normandy, who within few daies recouered Auranches and reuenged the death of the ſurprized.

Holinſh.

(75) But Henries ſiege leſſened through theſe ſtirs in Normandy, and his minde buſied vpon his affaires that way, fitted opportunity to Signieur de Offemont, vnto whom the beſieged had many times made knowne their deſires to haue him their Gouernour; on a night therefore (ladders made ready to put ouer the wals to receiue him) he ſecretly approached the place, but being diſcouered by the Centinels, and the alarum taken, he, not able to recouer the ladders, fell into the ditch, whence by reaſon of his heauy armour he could not free himſelfe, and in taking was wounded in the face: the King eſteeming the taking of ſo braue and valiant a Captaine, as a prize of much importance. The Defendants now hopeleſſe of ſuccour, and finding themſelues not able to hold out, carried all their goods from the Towne into the * Caſtell: but the aſſailants diſcouering their actions, and perceiuing their feare, gaue a fierce aſſault, and by force made way into the Towne with their ſwords: Then Henry planting his Canons, began to batter the Caſtell, and ſhortly brought it to that extremity, that beſides want of bread, moſt of their hand-weapons were broken, and all of them in a manner dangerouſly wounded; yet deſiſted they not to prouoke the Engliſh with opprobrious words, which cauſed ſuch heauy conditions to be laid on them, as the like had not beene of any ſurrender before.

* Called the March. Enguerrant.

1. That the march of Meaux ſhould be rendred vpon the eleuenth of May next enſuing. 2. That Meſſier Louis de Gaſt, the Baſtard of Vaurus, Iehan de Romieres, Tromagon, & Barnard de Meureuille ſhould be left to K. Henry to execute. 3. That Guicchard de Siſſayi, Pierron de Luppe, Robert de Geraines, Philip de Gamaches, & Iohn de Ouraye ſhould be at the kings will vntill they had rendred, or cauſed to be rendred, all the Townes, Caſtels and Fortreſſes which they or any of them held in France, and then to be ſecured of life. 4. That all the Engliſh, Welſh, Iriſh, and Scots that heretofore had beene in the Kings obedience ſhould be left to the Kings diſcretion. 5. That all the reſt, aſwell Souldiers as Burgeſſes ſhould be left to the Kings pleaſure, their liues only excepted. 6. That the Earle of Conuerſon, who had been priſoner to Pierron de Luppe, and at the beginning of the ſiege of Meaux, was deliuered at the inſtance of Henry for a ranſome, ſhould now bee freed without ranſome. 7. That all the Armes and goods in the March ſhould be brought to one place, there ſafely guarded, and an Inuentory of the ſame deliuered vnto King Henry. 8. That all the Reliques and Church-ornaments ſhould likewiſe be put in ſafety. 9. That all the Priſoners, aſwell in the March, as in any other place, vnder any of their commandements, ſhould be ſet at liberty, ranſome-free, and acquitted of their promiſes. 10. That no man vntill the aſſigned day of rendring ſhould goe out of the March, and that none ſhould be admitted to enter into it, but ſuch as King Henry aſſigned. 11. That theſe Articles ſhould be ſubſcribed & ſealed by an hundred of the beſt men amongſt them. 12. That for the true performance of the concord, foure and twenty perſons, elected by King Henrie, ſhould remaine in hoſtage.

Enguerrant de Monſtrelet.

(76) The place thus rendred vnto the King, hee preſently ſent eight hundred ſelected perſons priſoners to Paris, Roane, and England. The Baſtard of Vaurus, and the Gouernour of Meaux, the King cauſed to be hanged before the Towne on a Tree, named (by the Baſtard himſelfe) Vaurus, whereon he had formerly hanged many Engliſh and Burgundians, and his head was fixed vpon a pole on the top of the ſame tree. Meſſier Louis de Gaſt, Denis de Vaurus, brother to the Baſtard, Iehan de Romieres, and Barnard de Meureuille were ſent to Paris, and there executed; the goods of the March were diſtributed by Henry amongſt his Captaines, & deſeruing men. Then order was taken for repairing of breaches, and a ſtrong Garriſon left in Meaux and the March. After whoſe ſurrender, Creſpi, the Caſtell of Pierrepont, Merlau, Offemont, and ſundry others, ſubmitted themſelues to Henry, whileſt the true Daulphinois ſet fire on theirs, before he could attaine to their ſiege.

(77) Queene Katherine, in England, daily hearing of the Kings ſucceſſe, deſired greatly the ſight of his perſon, and to that end prepared her voyage for France, vnder the conduct of Duke Iohn, the Kings brother, then Regent of England, who deputed for the time of his abſence his brother Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter, & tooke ſhip at Southampton. The winds proſperous, the 21. of May ſhe landed at Harflew, and with ſtill-encreaſing troupes of Noblemen, by eaſie iournyes came to Roane, and thence to Bois de Vincennois, whither her Husband, her Father and Mother with great ſtate came to meete her, of all whom ſhe was receiued as ſome Angelicall perſon, who together remoued to Paris, where King Henry and Queen Katherine in the Lowre, vpon the Feſtiuall of Pentecoſt, ſate in their royall roabes, with their imperiall Crownes on their heads, and kept their Court with great confluence of people, King Henry aſſigning the affaires of the Prouinces.

Enguerrant de Monſtrel.

An.D.1422.

(78) But though Champagne, Picardy, Brie, and Normandy, with the Iſle of France, were in Henries poſſeſſion, yet was not all reduced to his quiet obeyſance, a great and ſtrong part holding out ſtill for the Daulphin, who with 20. thouſand ſtrong, beſieged La Charity vpon Loire, and tooke it, from whence he marched to Cone vpon the ſame Riuer, whoſe Defendants agreed, that if Burgundy did not raiſe the ſiege by the 16. of Auguſt, they would ſurrender; which the ſaid Duke accepted, and thereupon ſent proffer of battell to the Daulphin, who was likewiſe as ready (& by his Herauld gaue his faith) to trie his fortune in the field: The day aſſigned, and preparation made, the Duke of Burgundy ſent to king Henry for his aſſiſtance; whoſe anſwere was, that himſelfe and his forces would not faile to be with him that day, and run the ſame fortunes with him in the field.

Enguerrant de Monſtrel.

(79) But great Henries ſtout minde was croſſed with his now crazy body, his health being ſo impaired with a burning feauer and fluxe, that he was diſſwaded from the March; ſo the command of the Army was committed to his brother Iohn Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Warwicke, who ioyning their forces, for auoyding of contentions, through all their rankes intermingled the Engliſh, Burgundians, & Picardes together, and ſo the night before the deſigned day of battell, came to Cone, and encamped neere to the Towne; yet vndaunted Henry, who neuer miſcarried in any of his perſonall enterpriſes, taking his leaue at Senlis of K. Charles, and the two Queenes, in his horſe-litter (with a guard for his perſon) marched (though weake) after them; but at Melun finding his ſickneſſe to encreaſe, and himſelfe (who erſt could endure all things) now vnable to endure trauel, he returned to Bois de Vincennois.

King Henries ſickneſſe.

(80) The Engliſh colours diſplayed in the Daulphins eye, and his power inferiour in ſhew vnto them, howſoeuer he had vaunted, he thought it not beſt to aduenture the field; and therefore diſlodging from Cone, he marched to Barry, both to protract time, and to weary the enemey. Cone thus relieued, the Dukes marched to Troyes in Campagne, and ſet downe their Army for the ſiege; but before the cords of their Tents could be ſufficiently made faſt, the Duke of Bedford had heauie newes of Great Henries encreaſed ſickneſſe, and danger of death: wherefore leauing the Duke of Burgundy with the Army, he poſted to Bois de Vincennois, where finding the relation too true, he greatly lamented his dying brothers eſtate: but the King much reioycing of his brothers comming, cheerefully comforted his mourning friends and Nobles, and made vnto them this graue and his laſt dying ſpeech.

His cheerefulnes in his ſickneſſe.

His laſt exhortation.

"(81) I well ſee you lament my death; but I doe "not ſo: for this ſhort life of mine ſhall leaue behind "me the witneſſe of my faith, integrity, iuſtice, hone- "ſty and mercy, which ſhal crowne my memory with "glory, and free me from blame and ſlander, which "in long Raignes can hardly be auoided: but you "haue iuſt cauſe to mourne at my vntimely death, "and it cannot be but a generall griefe to my people, "that in ſuch an Ocean of buſineſſe yet depending, I "ſhall leaue you and them deſtitute of a Prince able "to gouerne: but your ſorrow ought to be ſo much "the leſſe, when you call to mind the frailty of world- "ly things, and that euermore there will be ſomewhat "wanting which we deſire. My firſt requeſt vnto you "ſhall be this, that with an vnanimous affection to "aduiſe, fore-ſee and prouide, that the counſel which "I name may be followed. I further earneſtly en- "treat you to loue my Infant Henry, to inſtruct him "with your wiſedomes, that by your counſell, care "and loue, he may be made able and worthy to weild "ſo great an Empire. Comfort my deare Wife, the "moſt afflicted creature liuing, extend your loues vn- "to her in the ſame proportion as I haue euer loued "you. Touching the publique, I admoniſh and ex- "hort you to brotherly concord, and neuer to breake "league with Philip Duke of Burgundy; and if you "ſhall thinke it good, let my brother Humfrey Duke "of Gloceſter gouerne England, and not depart vpon "any occaſion whatſoeuer, vntill my Sonne Henrie "be of yeares to ſway the eſtate; and my brother "Iohn Duke of Bedford, with the aſſiſtance of Philip "D. of Burgundy, to manage the Realme of France. "Concerning Charles (commonly called the Daul- "phin) either he muſt by your ſwords be made to ſub- "mit himſelfe, or elſe you ſhall neuer be in quiet; and "it were as good to render him the poſſeſſion of what "you haue: wherefore ſleep not, and while you haue "meanes and oportunity be induſtrious. Laſtly, I be- "ſeech, charge, and command you, (howſoeuer time "or occaſion may perſwade, or inuite you to the con- "trary) that Normandy, receiued by my induſtry, and "your ſwords, being the ancient inheritance of the "Crowne of England, be not alienated for any cauſe "whatſoeuer. Among other things then enioyned, he willed that the Duke of Orleance, the Earle of Eu, Guacourt, and Guicchard de Siſay, ſhould not be ranſomed, vntill yong Henry were of yeares to gouerne.

Enguerrant de Monſtrel.

(82) This ſaid, and drawing neere to the period of his ſhort but glorious life; he demanded of his Phyſitians how long (in their iudgement) he might liue? whereunto when one of them anſwered, Sir, thinke on your ſoule, for your time is not aboue two howers: he made his confeſſion, and his Chaplaines afterward kneeling in prayer, when one of them out of the Pſalmes made mention of Ieruſalem, the king no ſooner heard the name, but with a loud voice he ſaid; Lord, thou knoweſt that my purpoſe was to conquere Ieruſalem from the Infidels, if it had pleaſed thee to haue giuen me life: and then in a right faith, aſſured hope, perfect charitie, and ſound memory, he * rendred his ſoule to his Creator, after hee had raigned nine yeares, fiue moneths, and * foureteene dayes, leauing none like vnto him amongſt all the Kings and Princes of Chriſtendome, for which cauſe his death was not only bewailed of the Engliſh, whom he glorioufly had ruled, but alſo of the French, whom he had victorioufly conquered. This was the manner of this triumphant Monarchs end, which moues men iuſtly to wonder

And (which had ſurpaſſed all the reſt) he intended (ſuch was his loue to learning, and to the place where himſelfe was a learner) to haue founded in the great Caſtell at Oxford, a magnificent Colledge for Diuines, and Students of the ſeauen liberall Sciences, * the plot and ordinations of which foundation he had already drawne, & * reſolued to endow it with all the lands in England, belonging to Priors-Aliens; but his vntimely death preuented both that, and many other noble workes. To leaue a domeſticke teſtimony of his affection to Armes, he firſt inſtituted Gartar principall King at Armes: beſides other augmentations to the Order of Saint George. In a word, neuer liued Engliſh King with more true glory, nor euer died any in a more vnſeaſonable time, nor more lamented: for he was godly in heart, ſober in ſpeech, ſparing of words, reſolute in deeds, prouident in Counſell, prudent in iudgement, modeſt in countenance, magnanimous in action, conſtant in vndertaking, a great Almeſ-giuer, deuout to Godward, a renowmed Souldier, fortunate in field, from whence he neuer returned without victory. Theſe, with many other (I might almoſt ſay, all other) vertues are attributed to this moſt renowned amongſt Engliſh Kings; the more to be admired in him in ſo ſhort a raigne, and in thoſe yeares, he being but of 36. yeares, when he breathed forth his glorious ſoule.

(84) His bowels were interred in the Church of Saint Mauro de Foſſes, and his embalmed Corps was cloſed in Lead, and attended vpon by the Lords of England, France, Normandy, & Picardy, was brought vnto Paris (where in the Church of our Lady ſolemne exequies were performed) and thence to Roane, where it reſted till all things were ready to ſet forward for England; though the Cities of Paris and Roane ſtroue, and offered great ſummes of gold to haue Henries royall remaines enterred amongſt them. His picture artificially was moulded of boyled hides, and countenance painted according to life, vpon whoſe head an imperiall Diademe of gold & pretious ſtones was ſet, the body clothed with a purple roabe, furred with Ermine, in his right hand it held a ſcepter royall, and in the left a ball of gold; in which manner it was carried in a Chariot of State, couered with red veluet, embroidered with gold, and ouer it a rich Canopy, borne by men of great place. Thus accompanied by Iames king of Scotland, many Princes, Lords and Knights of England and France, he was conuaied from Roane to Abbeuile, to Heſdin, to Menſtruill, Bologne, and Calais, the Chariot all the way compaſſed about with men all in white garments, bearing burning Torches in their hands; next vnto whom followed his houſhold-ſeruants, all in blacke, and after them the Princes, Lords, and Eſtates in veſtures of mourning adorned; then two miles diſtant from the corps followed the ſtill-lamenting Queene, attended with Princely mourners, her tender and pierced heart more inly mourning, then her outward ſad weeds could in any ſort expreſſe.

(85) And thus by Sea and Land the dead King was brought vnto London, where through the ſtreets the Chariot was drawne with foure horſes, whoſe Capariſons were richly embroidered, and embоſſed with the royall Armes; the firſt with Englands Armes alone, the ſecond with the Armes of France and and England in a field quartered, the third bare the Armes of France alone, and the fourth three Crowns Or in a field Azure, the ancient Armes of King Arthur, now wel-beseeming him who had victoriously vnited * three Kingdomes in one. The body with all pompous celebrity was enterred in the Church at Westminster (for so Henry had by his last will commanded) next beneath King Edward the Confessor, vpon whose Tombe Queene Katherine caused a royall picture to be laid, couered all ouer with siluer plate guilt, but the head thereof altogether of massy-siluer. All which at that Abbeys suppression, (when the battering hammers of destruction did sound almost in euery Church) were sacrilegiously broken off, and by purloyning transferred to farre prophaner vses, where, at this day, the headlesse monument, (worthy to be restored by some more Princely and sacred hand) is to be seene, and with these verses written vpon his Tombe.

She was his Queene two yeares, and about three months; and surviuing him, was re-married vnto Owen Theodore of Wales, vnto whom she bare three sonnes, Edmund, Iasper, & Owen, and a daughter, who liued not long. Owen tooke the habite of religion at Westminster, the other two by King Henry the sixt (their halfe-brother) were honorably preferred; Edmund was created Earle of Richmond, and marrying Margaret, the sole heire of Iohn Beaufort Duke of Sommerset, was Father by her vnto Henry (the onely heire of Lancaster) afterwards King of England. Iasper the second brother, was created the same yeare Earle of Pembroke, who requited his brothers kindnesse with continuall assistance against the house of Yorke; and when that faction preuailed, he was forced to flye into Flanders, but it againe waning, he was both restored, and to his greater honor created Duke of Bedford, dying without any issue legitimate. CHAPTER XVI.

*Dan.ca.2. v.21. HAd God Almighty (the *giuer and transferrer of Kingdomes) thought good that the Engliſh ſhould haue ſetled in the Continent of Europe, and not haue beene ſhut vp within their Ilands, he would not ſo ſoone haue depriued them of their late incomparable Captaine and Soueraigne Henry the fifth. But it ſeemes that God hauing humbled the French Nation vnder Henries victorious hand, ment now again to reſtore them to his wonted fauour by taking away their terrour and triumpher, ſubſtituting his Son (an Infant) in his place, Henry of that name the 6. born at Windſor, who was crowned about the eight month of his age. The prety hands which could not feed himſelfe, were yet made capable to weild a Scepter, and he that was beholding to Nurſes for milke, did neuertheleſſe diſtribute the ſuſtenance of law and iuſtice to ſo great and warlike Nations. Counſell ſupplies the defect of age. At his Fathers death he had Vncles, men of approued valour and diſcretion, to whom the principall care of all publike affaires by the Fathers laſt prouiſions was committed. Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter (the yonger brother of two) had the *gouernment of England entruſted to his fidelity: the regency of France was aſſigned for Prouince to Iohn Duke of Bedford, the eldeſt liuing vncle of the King, as to a Prince of much magnanimity, proweſſe and felicity in conduct, with whom was *ioyned Philip Duke of Burgundy. The guard and cuſtody of the royall Infant was aſſigned to Thomas * Duke of Exceſter: the nurture & education to his *mother, the Queene Dowager: vpon the two Vncles (as betweene the two Poles of the Engliſh Empire) the whole globe of gouernment moued: whatſoeuer is done by the Kingly power is ſaid to be done by the King. may affect the body politique with good or euill. If Hiſtories were ordayned to ſtirre affections, not to teach and inſtruct, neuer any Princes raigne ſince the Conqueſt did better deſerue to be deſcribed with a tragicall Stile, and words of horror and ſorrow, although the beginning (like the faire morning of a moſt tempeſtuous day) promiſed nothing more then a continuance of paſſed felicities.

(2) For the State of the Engliſh affaires was great and flouriſhing, England without tumult, the naturall fierce humors of her people conſuming or exerciſing themſelues in France, and France her ſelfe (for the nobler parts, together with the grand City of Paris, head of that Monarchie) was at their deuotion. There wanted nothing which might aduance the worke begun. Moſt noble and expert Leaders, as thoſe which had beene faſhioned in the Schoole of Warre, vnder the beſt Martiall-Maſter of that Age, the late Henry, armes full of veterant Souldiers, moſt of which were of skill ſufficient to be Commanders themſelues: their friends firme, no defect nor breach (by which diſſipation might enter to the ouerthrow of the Engliſh greatneſſe) as yet diſcloſing themſelues. Wiſdome, piety, riches, forwardneſſe at home, courage and like forwardneſſe abroad. It is a fruitfull ſpeculation to conſider how GOD carrieth his part in the workes of men, alwaies juſtly, ſometimes terribly, but neuer otherwiſe then to bring all worldly greatneſſe and glory into due contempt and loathing, that the Soule may be erected to her Creator, and aſpire to a Crowne celeſtiall. The firſt diſaduantage which happened to the Engliſh cauſe (after the late Kings deceaſe) was the death of Charles the French King, who ſuruiued the other but * fifty and three dayes. This we may worthily call the firſt (as it was a great, aſwell as the firſt) diſaduantage, for the imbecilities of that Prince were a ſtrength to the Engliſh; On the other ſide (God obſeruing a talio and parilitie) the infancy of young Henry was an aduantage to Charles the Daulphin of France, now by them of his faction called King of France, as the Engliſh vſed in deriſion to enſtyle him King of Berry, becauſe little elſe was left vnto him.

(3) In England (whoſe condition the order of nature wils vs firſt to deſcribe, becauſe there was the ſeat of Counſell, by which all the actions of the generall State were directed) a Parliament was aſſembled to eſtabliſh the Crowne vpon the Infant, and to prouide for the publique vſes and neceſſities of State. Money *(alwaies one of them) was liberally granted. It was a ſtrange ſight (and the firſt time that euer it was ſeene in England) which in the next yeare happened, an Infant ſitting in the Mothers lap, before it could tell what Engliſh meant, to exerciſe the place of Soueraigne direction in open Parliament. Yet ſo it was, for the Queene to illumine that publique conuention of States with her Infants preſence, remoued from Windſor to London; through which Citie (her ſelfe royally ſeated, with her young ſonne vpon her lap) paſſed in majeſticke manner to Weſtminſter, and there tooke Seat among all his Lords, whom (by the ordinary mouth of that high Court) he ſaluted and ſpake to them at large concerning the premiſes; where, as he vttered the minde of his place by anothers tongue, ſo he elſewhere proſecuted all affaires by other mens hands and Organs.

(4) The Duke of Bedford (as the nature of his place exacted) to ſettle and preſerue the State of France for his young Nephew the King, together with Philip Duke of Burgoigne, who as yet continued a ſtedfaſt friend to the Engliſh Soueraignetie, (knowing the Daulphin buſie to recouer France) ſtrengthned the confines of their gouernement with Garriſons, aſſembled their powers, and laboured to retaine the hearts of their owne party. The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, had * words to them to this effect in open aſſembly: That they ſhould not violate their plighted and ſworne Alleageance, neither by themſelues endeauour, nor endure that by others their Soueraigne Lord young Henry ſhould be defrauded of his inheritance; or that the hatreds and enmities which now began to die between the French and Engliſh names, ſhould through the practiſes of moſt faithleſſe men be renued, and re-inflamed: That they would remember how (by Gods ſpeciall fauour and goodneſſe) the two Kingdomes of France and England were vnited vnder one moſt faire and goodly Monarchie in an eternall league, and lately ſo eſtabliſhed that no humane force could reſiſt. That albeit they had ſuſtained dammage by the warre, yet the ſame would be recouered with aduantage, if they honoured, loued, and obeyed their lawfull Soueraigne Lord King Henry, and proſecuted his enemies with extremity, according to bounden dutie. This Oration found plauſible admiſſion in ſhew: Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and ſuch chiefes as were preſent did their Homages, taking oath to be true: The like Obligation and Sacrament of alleageance was put vpon all the French through the Engliſh Dominions in France.

(5) Charles, (who as ſonne and heire to the late King, entitled himſelfe King of France, by the name of Charles the ſeauenth) being then about the ſeauen and twentieth yeare of his age, full of courage and new hopes, gathered what force he could: his chiefe Leuies were made in Daulphinois and Italy, from whence (for money) he drew ſundry troupes. But the beſt ſinewes of his Army moued in certaine thouſands of the Scotiſh Nation, which ſerued vnder him. The firſt ſtep which the Charolines, or forces of Charles made into hoſtile action was vnfortunate, for comming to raiſe the ſiege which the Engliſh held about *Crepan they were put to flight, with the loſſe of about two thouſand of their numbers. This was noble in Charles, and his Charolines, that their minds ſunke not at the horrour of ſuch an euill Omen. It was, ſaith Aemylius of them, reſolued to encounter aduerſe fortune with encreaſe of courage. The Regent on the other ſide was vigilant vpon all occaſions: the power of his Regency extended it ſelfe without contradictiõ through Vimew, Ponthieu & Picardy, from Paris to Reines, Chalons and Troyes, vp to the water of Loire, and the Sea: A goodly ſcope of territory, and abſolutely the beſt of France. That late loſſe and foile of the Charolines was repayred ſhortly after by an ouerthrow in skirmiſh which they gaue to the Engliſh party, from whom (with the ſlaughter of about fifteene hundreth) they recouered a great booty, ſpecially of Cattell which the Engliſh had gotten in the Countries of Nugion and Main, but thus intercepted vpon their returne into Normandie. Charles (which Paul. Aemylius omitteth) doubleth that ſucceſſe: for * Meulan vpon Sein is by him taken where all the Engliſh are put to the Sword: but the poſſeſſion was ſhort, and the reuenge ſpeedy: Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury (a man (ſaith Polydor) more like the old Romans than people of that age, ſo great was his vertue and cheualry) hauing with him Iohn of Luxemburg, Generall of the Burgundian horſemen, recouers the place, killing all the French which were found therein.

There they renued the League, adding, that each ſhould be others friend, and that all of them ſhould defend King Henries right with their beſt forces. For the better aſſurance of this profitable amity, the Regent (then a Bachelour) tooke to wife the Lady Anne, ſiſter to Philip Duke of Burgundy: while the Regent was abſent from Paris vpon theſe juſt occaſions, the Pariſians (who not long before had * ſent Ambaſſadors into England, to acknowledge their obedience to King Henry) practiſed with Charles to deliuer their City. time there arriued out of England ten thousand fresh Souldiers. Ouer them he ordained Captaines, the famous Earle of Salisbury, William Pole Earle of Suffolke, Robert Willoughby and others. Himselfe led about with him for the generall seruice, eighteene hundred horsemen, and eight thousand foote. With these field-forces the maine of the English estate in France was held together, though not without difficulty, and diuers aduentures. In them he tooke from Charles sundry strong Townes, and Fortresses * as Crotoy, Baside, Riol, Rula, Gyrond, Basile, Mermound, Milham, Femel, Seintace, and many other.

(7) The Regents chiefe designe was to draw Charles to fight, hoping by his ouer-throw to conclude many dayes workes in one. For this cause he drew into Normandy. Charles was then in Tourain, where hee mustereth his people. The Regent prospers in the meane time, and takes by siege a place of good importance, presuming so to dare the French out to a Battell. Iohn Duke of Alanzon is sent with an Army and instructions to fight, if occasion serued, but Charles himselfe was not suffered to hazard his person. Not farre from the Towne * of Vernoil, which the * English had taken before the * Duke of Alanzon, and his Charolines could succour it, the two Armies embattelled themselues. The fight began with shot, which seeming not quicke enough to dispatch the worke, the Battels came to hand-stroakes, where for some houres, there was maintayned a constant and doubtfull Battell, with great fury on both sides. The English enured to the French Warres, hauing borne the first heats of their enemies, (which are in that Nation most ragefull:) by perseuerance vtterly brake and put them to flight. The Regent * himselfe with a Battle-axe fought most fiercely, winning immortall honour in that bloudy journey. There were slaine of the enemies side: Iohn * Earle of Boughwhan Constable of France: Archenbald Dowglas Duke of Tourain, and Lieutenant of France; Archembald his sonne Earle of Wigton, with many other of the Scots. Of the French there were slaine the Earle of Vantadowr, and sundry others. In all there died vpon that side certaine thousands: None writes of fewer then foure or fiue thousand, nor any of aboue fifteene. The great number of the slaine, is not the measure of a victory, but the vse and effects which it drawes. The Duke of Alanzon himselfe was taken Prisoner, with about two * hundred others of speciall worth. The English payed for this noble victory, the bodies of about two thousand of their Souldiers which lost life there, for it was fought vpon faire tearmes in the open Fields, and carried by meere man-hood. That which followeth till the siege of Orleance, Paul * Æmylius comprehendeth in some few Lines. The fierce Conquerour besiegeth Mantz in Main, and with Ordnance beates downe part of the wals. It yeelds hereupon. The English Garrison left therein, after the taking not being sufficient to containe the Towne in due subiection, is compelled to flie to a Tower for their safetie, the enemies which were admitted into it by the Burgers enjoying the rest. The Lord Talbot (the most noble Captaine of the English) presently arriues to the rescue, and puts the malefactors to death. The English Empire extends it selfe to the Riuer of Loire. Charles they call in scorne the King of Berry. Thus roundly he.

(8) The chiefe things which passed in England, during these happy proceedings in France, were briefly these:

Iames Steward the young King of Scots, hauing beene casually taken vpon the Sea, in the raigne of King Henry the fourth; and after his fathers death not sufficiently tendered nor respected by the Scots, remained still a Prisoner. The rather therefore to hinder the Scots, (that was the hope) from ayding the French, it was now thought fit by the Councell of England to enlarge him. Which was accordingly done vpon pledges. Not long after the which, he married the Lady Iane, daughter to Iohn Earle of Sommerset, neere Cosen to King Henry. Principall setters-forward of this marriage (as by likelihood of his liberty also) to honour their Family with a Kingly alliance, were the Earle of Sommerset and the Bishop of Winchester, both of them Beauforts, who together with sundry other of the English Nobility, conducted the new married Couple to the Scottish Borders. Much of his ransome was abated, and his new kinsemen bestowed vpon him * store of Plate, Gold, and Siluer, and among other gorgeous Ornaments suits of hangings, in which the labours of Hercules were most curiously wrought. But this wise King (hauing had the benefit of excellent and Princely education in England) did not suffer any obligations contracted in the time of his durance, to preponderate with him the Generall State of Scotland, whose freedome did much depend vpon the fortune of France, whereby the maine drift of his enlargers was not much aduanced. The reason notwithstanding which led this action was probable, and so much the more commendable, for that it was tempered with humanity. The forreine mischiefe thus howsoeuer intended, hereby to be auoyded or qualified, Sir Iohn Mortimer, (a dangerous fire-brand at home) being Prisoner in the Tower, was arraigned for many treasonable speeches vsed to a yeoman, (seruant to Sir Robert Scot *, Keeper of the Tower of London) to draw the said yeoman to let him escape: promising him great matters. The poynts of his speeches were as that fellow charged vpon him in open Parliament.

1. That the said Mortimer meant to flie into Wales to the Earle of March, and with an army of forty thousand men to enter England, and strike off the Protectors head, and the Bishop of Winchesters.

2. That the Earle of March ought by right to be King of England, and if the Earle would not, that then he himselfe was next Heire.

The title of Mortimer to the Crowne, sought to be crusht.

3. That if he could not safely reach to the Marches, he would saile to the Daulphin of France, and there serue with honor, which he was assured of.

For these ouertures of escape, and conspiracie, the Knight was drawne, hanged, and headed: Of whose death no small * slander arose. Perhaps he that writes so, doth meane that the whole was but a stratageme to rid him out of the way. Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, the party whom the said Knight mentioned, was sent not long after with many other Lords, and competent numbers of men, into Ireland, where he deceased without issue, whose great Patrimony descended to Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, the fatall disturber of the realme of England, vpon the pretence of Mortimers title to the Crowne.

(9) The amity with the Duke of Burgoin, which the English had hitherto found so auaileable toward their Conquests, hauing otherwise receiued some few slight flawes, was now in danger of vtter breaking vpon this occasion: Humfrey Duke of Gloucester Protector of the Realme, following councell vnworthy of his person and place, contracted himselfe with the Lady Iaqueline of Bauaria, Inheritrix of Holland, Zeland, Henault, and many other faire Dominions in the Netherlands, notwithstanding that Iohn Duke of Brabant, her former husband was then liuing, and that the suit of diuorce commenced by Iaqueline * depended still betweene them. The Duke of Burgoin held with Brabant. This bred bitter humor in the Duke of Gloucester, who being not vsed to meete with any rubs or confrontments, and now when in person he came with an army to take

Court-factions in England.

Mean-while the Court of England doth well ſhew that the King was an Infant, for it was full of dangerous emulations and ſidings, the Duke of Glouceſter (whoſe high office it was to tender the wel-fare of the King and State) laying ſundry grieuous accuſations againſt the Cardinall Beaufort (ſonne of Iohn Duke of Lancaſter) Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Lord Chancellor, as being a perſon very dangerous vnto both.

See Foxe his Martyrologie in Hen. 6.

(10) The newes of theſe home-contentions comming to the Duke of Bedford into France, eaſily drew him home, though the State of that Realme could not well want his preſence. For Iohn Duke of Britain, (notwithſtanding his late renouation of league with the Regent at Amiens) jealous of the * Engliſh greatneſſe, turned ſuddenly to Charles, and with him, Arthur, Earle of Richmond his brother. This puts freſh ſpirit into the drooping Prince. Arthur is by Charles made Conſtable of his France, in place of the Scottiſh Earle, who was ſlaine at the bloudy Battell of Vernoil. The Duke of Britaine ouer-liues this reuolt but a ſmall time. Arthur, to declare his forwardneſſe on the behalfe of Charles, aſſembleth about twenty thouſand men, and with them ſodeinely beſiegeth S. Iean a towne of Normandy, vpon the Frontier of Britaine; which Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Gouernour of Normandy, had lately fortified and ſtuft with Souldiers. The vnexpected arriuall of the French, did greatly at the firſt perplex the Engliſh, but vpon better aduiſe, they valiantly ſallied out vpon them, both before and behind, which ſtroke ſo great terrour into the enemy, that with loſſe of their Artillery, and many of their people they forſooke the ſiege. To redeeme this diſhonour, he turnes his fury vpon the Countrey of Anjou, which in many parts hee depopulates and ſpoyles. The Regent being reſolued to returne into England, leaues behinde him Beauchamp * Earle of Warwick; as lieutenant, who was lately arriued in France, hauing ſix thouſand freſh Souldiers in his company.

The Duke of Bedford returnes into England to appeaſe the Court-factions.

(11) The preſence of the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, was to the State of England very neceſſary. For the wiſdome and authority of ſo great a Prince, being eldeſt Vncle to the King, and one whom many great deedes made famous, allayed the diſtemper which he found at his arriuall. It was a worke worthy of his labour, and he alſo found it to be a worke indeede, and not eaſily effectuable. The differences were debated firſt at S^t. Albans, then at Northampton, laſtly in a Parliament at Leiceſter, which continued there till toward the end of Iune. The Duke of Bedford himſelfe, to auoid the note of partiality, for that his brother of Glouceſter was a party, did not intermeddle otherwiſe then as in Generall words to perſwade amity, but the whole cauſe was referred to arbitrators of greateſt Nobility and prudence: by whoſe endeuours all thoſe differences and grieuances were equally thruſt into one ſacke, to be ſealed vp for euer by obliuion, and without mention of amends on eyther ſide, the Duke and Biſhop, (the one hauing ſworne by his * Prince-hood, the other by his Prieſthood, truely to obſerue the award,) ſhooke hands; and were fully for that time reconciled. After which holy and neceſſary worke of priuate attonements, enſued acts of feſtiuitie and honour. For in the ſame Towne of Leiceſter the young King, not then fiue yeares of age, was at the high Feaſt of Pentecoſt dubbed Knight by the Regent of France. Immediately whereupon the King honoured Richard Earle of Cambridge, (who by the fatall errour of the Counſell, was at this Parliament created Duke of York, the ſame who was father to Edward the fourth) with the order of knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Richard Duke of Yorke was hee, who brought vpon this Kingdome and nation moſt dolefull diuiſions, to the vtter extirpation of all the male Lines of either Houſe, that is to ſay, his owne, and that of Lancaſter, whereof the young King was head. From Leiceſter the King was conueighed to Killingworth, and Thomas Duke of Exceſter dying, Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, was conſtituted Guardian and Tutor to the King.

The Duke of Alenzon (taken at the Caſtell of Vernoil) was ſet at liberty vpon payment of two * hundreth thouſand Sceuts of gold. At Mountarges about Orleance the Engliſh receiued an ouerthrow with the loſſe of about fifteene hundreth of their numbers, and in Britaine the French ſuſtained great dammages by a Captaine of the Duke of Sommerſets. Theſe were petty matters: They of Mantz in Maine had drawne in the French by night, who maſſacred the Engliſh. William Earle of Suffolke, Captain of the place ſends to Iohn Lord Talbot for ſuccour. It came, and that ſo vnexpectedly, that the French were alike diſtreſt. All but Souldiers were ſpared, and many alſo of them, though thruſt into Priſons. The Traitours which had cauſed ſo much miſchiefe, had their deſerts by death. From hence the Lord Talbot marched to other enterpriſes. The quality of our taske cals vs to the maine.

(13) Thomas Lord Montacute Earle of Saliſbury, being with the Regent at Paris, and conſidering what forces of men, and all prouiſions the Engliſh then enjoyed, be-thought himſelfe of ſome action which might anſwere the greatneſſe of his owne name, and of the publique meanes. The ſiege of Orleance is by him propounded to the Councell; The credite of the Motioner was alone an argument of power to conuince the poſſibility. His deſires were therefore furniſhed with all competent prouiſions. They of Orleance hearing what a ſtorme was comming (for the name of this Earle was worthily terrible) with great diligence ordaine for their defence. The * Suburbes (anſwerable in bigneſſe to a good City) they leuell with the earth, that the enemy might not from thence annoy them. Parliament-towne, and Vniuerſity, richly ſcituate vpon the riuer of Loire, whoſe beſt glory it is, being the chiefe City which that renowned ſtreame watereth. No enemies appearing abroad, hee * approacheth cloſe to the wals. Aſſaults * prouing vaine, he entrencheth about it, and to ſecure his campe, caſts vp ramparts and other workes, one of which (by reaſon of the hugeneſſe thereof) was called London, by the name of the chiefe City of England. The Fort which ſtood at the Bridge-foot beyond the Loire, he ſeiſeth vpon, and cloſeth them vp on euery ſide. Charles of France could miniſter no ſufficient ſuccor. God, when mans helpe failes interpoſeth his hand, which as all of vs daily feele, ſo is it moſt conſpicuous in the deliuerance of Nations. The City is driuen to ſome miſerie through the beginning want of all things; for the ſiege had now endured about 60. daies, * not without much bloud-ſhed on both ſides. The Earle of Salisbury impatient of ſuch delay, purpoſeth to giue a generall aſſault. The better to conſider vpon the courſe, he ſtands to take view at a window, barred with Iron, which ouer-lookt the City toward the Eaſt. Behold how God began to vncut the knot of thoſe bands with which the Engliſh held France bound; a bullet of a great piece (which lay ready leueld at that window) diſcharged by the Gunners * ſonne, a lad, ſtroke the grates, whoſe ſplinters ſo wounded the Earle, and one Sir Thomas Gargraue, that they both dyed of the incurable hurts within few dayes. Heare now the common judgement of Writers concerning this Earles loſſe: * Preſently after the death of this man the fortune of the war changed. * Now both mortall and immortall powers began to looke fauourably vpon the State of France. This to the * Engliſh was Initium malorum: for after this miſhap they rather loſt then wan, ſo that by little and little they loſt all their poſſeſſion in France: and albeit that ſomewhat they got after, yet for one that they wan, they loſt three. So that Polydor not without cauſe (after many other great praiſes) doth elſe-where call him the man in whom the ſafety of the Engliſh State conſiſted. The vertue therefore of a fortunate Generall is ineſtimable.

(14) Howbeit the ſiege did not determine with his life, William Earle of Suffolke, the Lord Talbot, & the reſt maintayned the ſame all the Winter. The wants of the Campe were relieued from Paris by a conuoy, vnder the guard of Sir Iohn Faſtolfe and fifteene hundred ſouldiers, who arriued ſafe in deſpite of all the attempts to diſtreſſe them, which the French made. The City would yeeld it ſelfe, but not to the Engliſh. The Duke of Burgundy they were content ſhould haue the honour. A ſubtle ſtratagem, rather then an offer of yeelding, for there was likelihood in it to breake thereby the amity betweene the Engliſh and him. The Regent and his Counſell being ſent vnto, thought it not reaſonable (Æmylius erroniouſly makes the late Earle of Salisbury the Author of that refuſall) neither indeed was it, theirs hauing beene the coſt and labour. The Duke of Burgundy conſtrued this repulſe ſowerly, which marred his taſte of the Engliſh friendſhip euer after: yet the Regents anſwer was juſt and honeſt. That the warre was made in King Henries name, and therefore Orleance ought to be King Henries. Among theſe difficulties ſtood the French affaires. Charles of France vnderſtanding the miſerable ſtraites of his deare City, and ignorant how to remedy ſo neere a miſchiefe; there preſented herſelfe vnto him, at Chinon, a young Maide about eighteene yeares olde, called Ioan of Loraine, * daughter to Iames of Arck, dwelling in Domremy neere Vaucaleurs, a * Shepheardeſſe vnder her father, whoſe flockes ſhe tended, bids him not faint, and conſtantly affirmes, that God had ſent her to deliuer the Realme of France from the Engliſh yoake, and reſtore him to the fulneſſe of his fortunes. She was not forthwith credited; but when the wiſe of both ſorts, as well Clerkes as Souldiers had ſifted her with manifold queſtions, ſhee continued in her firſt ſpeech ſo ſtedfaſtly, vttering nothing but that which was * modeſt, chaſte, and holy, that honour and faith was giuen vnto her ſayings. An * old woman directed her. Ioan armes her ſelfe like a man, and requires to haue that ſword which hung in * S. Katherines Church of Fierebois in Touraine. This demaund encreaſed their admiration of her; for ſuch a * ſword was found among the old Donaries or Votiue tokens of that Church. Thus warlikely arrayed ſhe rides to Blois, where forces and freſh victuals lay for the reliefe of Orleance. She with the Admirall and Marſhall of France enters ſafe. (16) This letter was entertained by the Engliſh with laughter. Ioan reputed no better then a Bedlam, or Enchantreſſe. Though to ſome it may ſeeme more honourable to our Nation, that they were not to be expelled by a humane power, but by a diuine, extraordinarily reueiling it ſelfe. Du Serres deſcribes this Parragon in theſe words: She had a modeſt countenance, ſweete, ciuill, and reſolute, her diſcourſe was temperate, reaſonable, and retired, her actions colde, ſhewing great chaſtity without vanity, affectation, babling, or courtly lightneſſe. Let vs not diſſemble what we finde written: By her encouragements and conduct the Engliſh had Orleance pluckt out of their hopes, after they had ſuffered the Duke of Alanzon to enter with new force, and with much loſſe were driuen to raiſe the ſiege. Ioan her ſelfe was wounded at one ſally in which ſhee led, being ſhot through the arme with an arrow. Iudge what ſhee eſteemed of that hurt, when ſhe vſed theſe admirable and terrible words: This is a fauor, let vs goe on; they cannot eſcape the hand of God. In all aduentures ſhe was one and formoſt. The Engliſh loſt at this ſiege, the Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Molins, the Lord Poynings, and many other. But doe not raſhly beleeue Serres in ſaying, that of all ſorts were ſlaine in ſuch Sallies, as the martiall Virgine made eight thouſand. Our Writers ſay but * ſixe hundreth. The Lord Talbot marched away with aboue nine thouſand, whom Ioan would not ſuffer the French to purſue. In memorie of this admirable deliuerance, they of that City erected a monu-

(17) There was an interchangeable taking and recouering of Townes and places of importance vpon both ſides. The Lord Talbot tooke Lauall, and the Earle of Suffolke puts himſelfe into Iergeaux. Thither the Duke of Alanzon with Ioan and other great Captaines come, which they force by aſſault. Sir Alexander Pool the Earles brother was ſlaine, with many others in the fight; the Earle himſelfe remayned priſoner. The Duke added ſome other places to this Conqueſt: Soone after his numbers are augmented by the repayre to him of Arthur Conſtable of France; the Earle of Vandome, the Lord Dalbret and others, ſo that now their whole Army contayned about twenty and three thouſand men. With theſe they encounter the Lord Talbot (who had ſcarce the fifth part of their numbers) at a Village called Patay, whom they charged ſo ſodainly, that his Archers had no time to fortifie their battels (after their manner) with a Palizado, or empalement of ſtakes, ſo that the chiefe fight muſt be made vpon horſe-backe. After three houres bloudie reſiſtance, the Engliſh were put to the worſt. *The Lord Scales, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rampſtone, and euen the Lord Talbot himſelfe (being firſt wounded in the backe) were taken. The footmen enforced to truſt to their ſwords, vnder the ſhelter of ſuch horſemen as remained, retreated in order, and came to a place of ſafetie. The Engliſh loſt aboue a thouſand, the French aboue 600. This blow ſhooke the whole fabricke of the Engliſh greatneſſe in France at the very foundations, awaking multitudes (euen of thoſe who before had vowed fealty to the Engliſh, and now had colour of diuine warrant for violating that vow) to joyne with the victors for the recouery of common liberty. There followed the preſent reuolt of ſundry Townes; neither was it long before Charles himſelfe iſſues out in Armes, recouers the City of Aunerre and Rheimes; where, according to the Maides direction, hee was ſolemnely crowned King. Hitherto ſhe might be thought prophetical and fortunate. It ſhould ſeeme now that the chiefe part of her imployment was accompliſhed, yet ſhe flouriſhed a while longer. The Duke of Bedford to buttreſſe the ſhrinking ſtate of Engliſh affaires in France, and to encounter euill fortune in the face, vpon the vnpleaſant newes of Orleance reſcued, and Talbots taking, muſters his whole preſent forces, which made aboue tenne thouſand Engliſh, beſides certaine wings of Normans: with theſe hee marcheth out of Paris, and oppoſeth himſelfe to the Current of Charles his new hopes, who meant to attempt that City, ſome of whoſe Citizens held ſtrict & ſecret correſpondence with him. But vpon this affrontment, hee ſuſpended the execution of that deſigne, hauing as then no hope to atchieue it. The Regent returnes to Paris, Ioane the Pucell diſſwaded Charles from fight.

(18) Places of ſpeciall note, as Campaigne and Beauuois yeelded themſelues voluntarily to Charles. The Regent hauing ſetled the Eſtate, and Garriſons of the chiefe City, paſſeth into Normandy, to prouide for a ſafe retreat there, if perhaps the Engliſh (by the ineuitable will of God) ſhould be enforced to quit their other holds and dominions: which hee began to ſuſpect, for that he had intelligence of a ſecret purpoſe, which the French purſued; to winne the Burgundians from King Henries ſide. While the Regent was abſent vpon this occaſion, Charles got the Towne of Saint Denis, (a neighbour to Paris) though hee held it not long by practiſe. From thence he ſends the Duke of Alanzon and Ioan to try their friends and fortunes at Paris. They found not hoped ſucceſſe, for the Engliſh gaue them ſo rough an encounter, that Ioan her ſelfe was * wounded; and the reſt with much ſlaughter driuen to fall off. New ſupplies came out of England. The next enterprize was to reduce Champaigne to obedience. Iohn of Luxemburg with Burgundians and ſome Engliſh beſiegeth it. Here the glory of Ioan vnfortunately ended; for comming to the reſcue ſhee entred indeede, but afterward ſallying forth, her troupes were beaten, and her ſelfe (being betrayed, ſay her fauourers) taken priſoner by the ſaid Burgundian * Knight, who for the value of her ranſome (ten thouſand pounds Turnoys, and three hundreth Crownes yearely rent) deliuered her vnto the Engliſh. The ſiege was notwithſtanding rayſed; they ſent her to Roan, where ſhe (about nine or tenne moneths after) was burnt to death. Clelia was ſaued by * Porſenna; and it is not to be doubted but that the magnanimity of the Engliſh would haue ſpared her, had they not found it neceſſary to deface the opinion which the French, euen with ſuperſtition, had conceiued of her. Our * Writers ſhew how the courſe of her life being legally examined by the Biſhop of Beauuois (in whoſe Dioceſſe ſhee was taken) and ſhe thereupon for ſorcerie, bloudſhed, and vnnaturall vſe of man-like apparrell, and habiliments contrary to her Sexe, condemned to dye, was notwithſtanding, vpon her ſolemne abjuring of ſuch her lewde practiſes, pardoned her life, till againe conuicted of perjurious relapſing, though acknowledging her ſelfe a * ſtrumpet, and fayning to be with child, ſhe deſeruedly vnderwent that puniſhment which ſhe ſought to delay. The rumor of her end, and the ignominious cauſe thereof, was ſomewhat incommodious to the affaires of Charles. It was thought that the comming of King Henry to Paris would be much more.

K. Henry is to come in perſon into France.

(19) Hee had already with great ſolemnitie receyued the Crowne of England at Weſtminſter, being about nine yeares olde, a moſt faſhionable and waxen age for all impreſſion either of good or bad. The next yeare after his Coronation in England, he paſſeth ouer into France; there alſo to receiue the Diademe thereof. The Conſtableſhip of England, was before his departure, aſſigned by Patent, for tearme of life, to Richard Duke of Yorke (which gaue him a more feeling of greatneſſe, and ſecretly whetted his ambitious appetite,) vpon this occaſion. One Iohn Vpton of Feuerſham in Kent Notarie, accuſed Iohn Down of the ſame place Gentleman, That he and his complices did imagine the Kings death at his Coronation: The Combate was graunted, and in Smithfield (the Duke of Yorke exerciſing the office of high Conſtable) they fought in liſts. In the end the Kings name was vſed to part and forgiue them. It is a vice to ſuſpect too farre. The Duke of Yorke (a moſt ſubtle man) ſeemes neuer in heart to haue beene a true ſubject to King Henry: yet no man ſaith, he was any author in this. Henry, (the Common-wealth hauing yeelded to liberall grants of mony) is now ready to enter Paris. England remayned vnder the gouernement of the Duke of Gloceſter.

Richard Duke of Yorke made Conſtable of England.

(20) There is no doubt that the Engliſh there, at their Kings preſence, ſet forth their greatnes to the full ſhew. The young King attended vpon with two Engliſh Cardinals, Yorke and Wincheſter, and great Princes of his bloud, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Prelates, and the flower of our nation, with many, aſwel French and Burgonians, as Normans and others, excellently well appoynted, makes a triumphant entry into the head City of that moſt noble Monarchy. There was no ſigne in the People but of joy and welcome; the ſhowes were many and magnificent. Vpon the ſeauenth day of December, he was ſolemnely Crowned King of France, by the * Cardinall of Wincheſter, his great vncle, in the * chiefe Church of Paris, called of our Lady. minds of the Assembly with a set speech, wherein he declared, King Henrie his Nephewes vndoubted title to that Crowne, and commended the same to their fidelities, adding ample promises of honour and emolument. Such of the French Nobility as were present, did their homage. The people had good and gratious words giuen vnto them and certaine * quantities of money, corne, and wine, in the nature of a donatiue, liberally distributed among them. Proclamations were made, that all French-men who came in by a day there named, should be protected. The Kings Patents and grants touching French matters, passed vnder the Seale & stile of Henry King of the French-men, and of England*, which Seale (for variety) wee haue prefixed, as we found it annexed * to a writing directed by the King to his Court of Requests in his Pallace at Paris; but for English affaires he vsed another Seale, being in euery poynt like vnto that * of King Henry the fourth, and (as some thinke) the very same stampe, (which therefore we haue here omitted,) as likewise some * Charters of his there are, whereunto he affixed the seale of his father. Charles of France esteemed not himselfe the lesse a King for all this, but pursues his affaire. His people tooke the City of Chartres by a stratagem, the Bishop whereof (because a Burgundian) they also put to the sword with others. Neither were the English idle. Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke, the Earle of Suffolke, and others, made vp this losse with aduantage. Their actions are placed by some, as done before the Coronation, which is likely. The King hauing thus taken possession of France, not long after tooke his farewell thereof. His returne was by Roan, and so ouer land to Callis, from whence vpon the eleauenth day of February, he arriued safe at Douer. His vncle the Duke of Gloucester was able to giue an honest, and good account of the Gouernement during the Kings absence. The suppression of an Insurrection, beginning at Abington in Oxfordshire was not the least seruice. A weauer (the Bailiffe of the Towne) was the vlcerous head, to which that corruption gathered; who had changed his owne name, and called himselfe; Iacke Sharpe of Wigmores land in Wales. The speciall colour of his attempt was, * to haue massacred Priests; whose heads (hee said) hee would make as cheape as Sheepes-heads; that is, two or three, or ten for a penny. But the mention of Wigmores lands, the ancient inheritance of Mortimer, (then the possession of the fatall Duke of Yorke, who afterward in the right of that name, challenged the Crowne of England from King Henry) insinuates somewhat further. The varlet forfeited his head and foure quarters for his attempt. It is to be wondred that the Councell of Estate vnder King Henry, hearing that title so often glanced at, prouided not better against the mischiefe. But the eies and hearts of the wise are blinded, when God hath a purpose to reserue a scourge, or to hide the fire which shall afterward be vsed to consume a nation. Vnquiet humors were aswell abroad as at home. The souldiers of Callis discontented with their wages, as too little, began to be mutinously troublesome. The Regent comes thither in person in Easter weeke, where he exerciseth necessary discipline seuerely. Foure, the most faulty lost their heads, one hundred and ten are cashiered, and banisht from the Towne, as sixe-score others had formerly beene. Why dwell wee vpon so petty accidents? The losse of the Kingdome of France is imminent. Let vs diligently note the degrees which God found out to depriue our Nation of that honour. In this journey of the Regent, King Henries interest was not aduanced. The Regent (a widdower) roade from thence to Turwin, where (without the Burgundians priuitie) he married the Lady Iaquet, aged about * seuenteene yeares, * daughter to Peter of Luxembourg Earle of S. Paul. no friend to the Burgundian. This was nothing prosperous to the English affaires. For Anne, the Regents former wife, sister to the Duke of Burgundie, being, while shee liued, a strong reason and assurance of amitie, weakened the same by her death; and this second marriage, not pleasing the Burgundian, did yet more diminish it. These were but degrees.

In the meane space, the accidents of warre between the English and French, were manifold and perplext, now wee, now they leesing, or gaining, as opportunity serued: which vncertainties brought forth their ordinary progenies, fearefull outrages, and * scarcitie of all things needfull for the vse of man. It would be wearisome, and not much necessary, to recount the particular lesser actions, neyther indeede is it easie; for who can readily tell the sieges, surprises, skirmishes, and the like, being so confusedly set downe by Authors, wherein diuers of both Nations wanne to themselues much honour, and serued the vses of those times, and their owne? The vttermost effect of those great labours, was, that the English Regency fell not forthwith into nothing. Permanent leaders in those publique seruices were the Regent himselfe; their maine Pillar and chiefe life, Thomas Earle of Arundel, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Henry his Son, the Lord Willoughby, the thrice noble Iohn Lord Talbot, (who was now at libertie,) the Lord Scales, besides Knights, Esquires, and other valiant Captaines a multitude.

(21) The fortune of Renate Duke of Barre, is not to be omitted, for that afterward, our King vnluckely married into his house. He had to * wife Isabell the daughter, and heire of Charles Duke of Loraine, by whom he had issue two sonnes, and two daughters, the youngest of which was Lady Margaret, whom King Henry afterward tooke to Wife. Charles Duke of Loraine dying, Renate thinkes to succeede in that Estate. Anthony Earle of Vallemont, brother to Charles, presumes he hath a neerer right. The matter comes to be determined by blowes. Charles King of France was a stedfast supporter of Renates claime, in lieu of like offices performed by Renate to him in the times of most difficulty. The Regent, and Philip Duke of Burgundy, stood for the Earle. Their aides preuailed so much, that Renates forces were beaten, with losse of about * three thousand, from the siege of Vallemont, and himselfe with not fewer then two hundred others remained prisoner to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whose subiects commanded in chiefe at that enterprise. This * Renate was afterward entituled to the Crowne of Naples, and Sicilia, by the testament of Ioane Queene of them. The King of France might seeme to haue sustained a grieuous losse by the enthralment of this Duke: but the English gayned nothing thereby: for his perswasions, and priuate offices on the behalfe of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Burgundians heart (which now was knit to the English, but with feeble Arteries) to accept in time the holy impression of reconcilement. The French, who liued vnder the Regency, or in danger of the English, made choise of the Burgundian to protect them, which could not be embarred to them, for that he was as yet King Henries pretended friend. Indeede this Scene and vnstable state of affaires was full of horrour, which Polydore Virgil describeth well enough. While the English and French (quoth he) contend for Dominion, Soueraignty, and life it selfe, mens goods in France were violently taken by the licence of warre, Churches spoiled, men euery where murthered, or wounded, others put to death, or tortured; Matrons rauished, Maides forcibly drawne from out their parents armes to be deflowred, Townes daily taken, daily spoiled, daily defaced, the riches of the Inhabitants carried whither the Conquerors thinke good; houses and villages round about set on fire: no kinde of cruelty is left vnpractised vpon the miserable French; omitting many hundreth kindes of other calamities, which all at once oppressed them. Adde hereunto that the Common-wealth being destitute of the helpe of Lawes, (which for the most part are mute in times of war and mutiny) floateth vp and and downe, without any anchorage at right or iuſtice. Neither was England her-ſelf void of theſe miſchiefes, who euery day heard the newes of her valiant Childrens funerals, ſlaine in perpetuall skirmiſhes and bickerings, her generall wealth continually ebd, and wained, ſo that the euils ſeemed almoſt equall, and the whole Weſterne world ecchoed the groanes and ſighes of either Nations quarrels, being the common argument of ſpeech and compaſsion throughout Chriſtendome.

(22) The courſe certainly which the Engliſh held, did onely faintly keepe aliue the generall State of the Regency, without giuing period to the warre, eyther by finiſhing the Conqueſt, or ſetling that which was conquered. Some would haue had large ſupplies of men, and treaſure leuyed, that King Charles might no where haue any reſt: Of this opinion were Bedford * himſelfe, the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerſet. This Counſell was not followed, but another, in lhew more frugal, which fed the euils, but redreſſed none. Preſent ſparings doe oftentimes draw after them infinite waſtes, and no husbandry proues ſo ill as vnſeaſonable Parſimonie. In the meane time, the Earle of Arundel, and the Lord Talbot, carry about victorious Armes, and terrifie Anjou, Main, and other places, with their ſucceſſes. In Normandie, neuertheleſſe the common people drew together in huge multitudes. There were three-ſcore * thouſand of them rebelliouſly knotted together in Vexin, Norman, and twenty thouſand in Caux. Their purpoſe was, (through diſlike of the Engliſh Gouernement, or practiſe of the French) to haue reacht one hand to King Charles, and to haue thruſt King Henries Officers out. What is a Multitude without aduiſe? To ſtop their inſolency and courſe which * they held toward Cane, the Earle of * Arundel, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with about thirteen hundred light horſe, and ſixe thouſand Archers, march againſt them, by direction of the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerſet, who had the chiefe Lieutenancies in Normandy. They diuide their forces to vſe them with the more aduantage. The Earle ſtayes in Ambuſh with two parts, the Lord Willoughby drawes them into it with the third. A thouſand of the Rebels were cut downe before the ſouldiers hands could be ſtayed to ſpare the reſt, who baſely (as it became them) threw away their weapons, and fel to the earth, crying mercy. The multitudes were ſuffered to returne, their ring-leaders loſt their liues. All that the World could collect by this popular Inſurrection, was, that the Normans would be gladly rid of the Engliſh. Nothing elſe was done. This Earle of Arundel hauing done ſundry noble deedes during the warres in France, receiued his deaths-wound ſhortly after in a skirmiſh at Gerberoy in Beauuoſine, where La Hire (a famous Captaine among the enemies) had the day.

(23) The Regency yet held, and the miſeries of France (being burnt vp by the fiery reflections of two Counter-Suns) were nothing diminiſhed: Who ſhould giue to them a Period? while the Duke of Burgundy continued Engliſh, it could not be. To prepare therefore a ſeparation between them, ſuch of the Nobility as went ouer to the Burgundian Duke told him, * That King Charles vpon all occaſions (when ſpeech was miniſtred) ſpake of him honourably, and inwardly wiſhed him well, and that he neuer heard any mention of the murther committed vpon the Duke his father, (cauſe of the ſonnes hatred to France) but hee heartily ſighed, proteſting hee was neither partie nor priuy thereunto. Theſe and the like mollifying ſalues applyed to the tumors of his reuengefull affections, did worke ſtrongly, the rather for that his minde heretofore poſſeſſed with the Engliſh amitie, was now vacant in that part, the ſame (by the meanes of ſundry jealouſies and auerſions) lying open to contrary impreſſions. There wanted but an outward honourable meanes to faſhion him entirely to the French party. Let vs heare * Serres in this poynt: The Deputies of the Generall Councell preſſe both French, Engliſh, and Burgundians to end all quarrels by ſome good compoſition. The Citie of Arras is allowed of them all to treat in. From the * Pope and Counſell of Piſa, there came the Cardinals of S. Groſſe and Cypres, with twelue Biſhops. For the King of France, there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Conſtable of France, the Archbiſhop of Rheims, Chancellor of France, & many others, great, noble, wiſe, and learned men. For the King of England, the two Cardinals of Yorke and Wincheſter, the Earles of Suffolke (* Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington) the Biſhop of Saint Dauids, Iohn Ratcliffe Keeper of the great Seale, the Lord Hungerford, Ralfe, the wiſe Officiall of Canterbury, and ſome Doctors of Diuinity. For Philip Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Guelders, the Earle of Naſſau, the Biſhop of Cambray, Count Vernambourg, the Biſhop of Leige; fiue other great Earles, beſides the Deputies of many his beſt Townes, ſufficient to ſhew, that though he was in title but a Duke, yet that his greatneſſe was equall to a King. When it came to communication, the Engliſh being alſo in poſſeſſion, *vrged farther for themſelues the right of deſcent, and the act of Charles the ſixth, father to this Charles, by which act the Crowne of France was ſetled vpon Henry the fifth, and the iſſue of the Lady Katherine his wife, and therefore they propounded no other condition of peace, but that Henry their King might haue all, and * Charles to hold of him. The French offered Normandie and Guien.* There ended the hope of agreement betweene them, for neither party would accept. King Charles therefore reſoluing to mayme the Engliſh faction vpon any termes (how baſe ſoeuer) ſends Duke Philip a blanke, bids him therein to preſcribe his owne conditions and demands: he did ſo: and his Conditions were ſo vnreaſonable, and ſo many, euen a great volume full, (ſaith a French man) as it is ſtrange, ſo great a Monarch ſhould ſtoope ſo much to his ſubject and vaſſall, but that neceſsity hath no law. They * joyne hereupon moſt firmely, and the Duke (a man wholly tranſported by profit) declares himſelfe a publique enemy to all the enemies of King Charles, and friend to all his friends. This was the firſt parting-ſtroake which ſeuered the French Dominions from the Engliſh Soueraigntie: the euent declared, that the Engliſh had done more wiſely, if they had accepted Normandy and Guyen; but as the caſe ſtood then, they could not in honour doe it; and Councels are not to be meaſured by euents; for ſo the moſt fooliſh may ſometimes paſſe for prudent. King Henry not onely loſt now hereby a moſt needfull friend, but was compelled to relye vpon his ſingle ſtrengths, aſwell againſt King Charles his naturall enemy, as againſt the Duke of Burgundy, who plainely ſeemed to haue betrayed the cauſe. To ſet a gloſſe vpon this fact, the Duke * diſpatcheth Ambaſſadors into England to King Henry (who, as * Æmylius erroneouſly ſaith, was preſent at this treaty of Arras) to make knowne the reaſons of his peace with King Charles, and to perſwade the King to entertaine the ſame. This Ambaſſage was ſo odious to the Engliſh, that they forbare not to call the Duke a deceitfull man, a turn-ſeruer, a perjured perſon, and a Traytor.

(24) The popular hatred alſo was ſuch againſt the Dukes Subjects, reſiant in London, that they were beaten and ſlaine many of them, before the furie thereof could be ſtayed by Proclamation. The Ambaſſadours returne with honeſt admonitions to their Maſter, againſt which, his eares and ſenſes were ſtrongly mured; for King Charles had ſet about them as it were a Barricado of royalties, priuiledges, honours, money, Cities, Townes, and whole Prouinces, which he confirmed to the Duke, onely to with-draw him from vs. The whole Counties of * Aux, Erre, Ponthieu, Bolein, Artois, the towne of Abbeuile, and other lands, the Cities and Townes in Picardy, vpon the water of Some, Amiens, Corbie, Peron, *S. After his Ambassadors returned, he sends backe all contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounceth the alliance of England with a watch-word, that euery one should looke to himselfe.

(25) Each man hereupon (saith * Serres) sharpens his sword, and scoures his Armes, to recouer that by force which they could not obtaine by reason; Serres might better haue said, reasoning. All things certainely fauoured the French designes; for this was the generall estate of the English affaires. King Henry scarce out of his Child-hood; and when he came to mans age, not Man enough to manage so turbulent occurrents; the Princes of the bloud weakely vnited in loue, for the common good; the Protector vigilant ouer England, the Regent carefull for France, but both priuately enuied; Richard Duke of Yorke (whose strenghts daily increased, which in time he meant nothing lesse then to vse for the benefit of King Henry,) ambitiously reseruing himselfe for a deare day; most of the great warriours slaine; and in briefe, a great inability (for want of a Soule, willing and fit to looke so sterne and dismall aduentures in the face) through the whole body of the English forces; which though otherwise they might haue lingred out the warre, and kept their footing, yet the death of the great Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, doubled the difficulty, or rather the impossibility. In taking this triumphant Peere away, God made it manifest, that he held the English vnworthy and vnfit to continue their Empire among the French any longer. This Prince not long after this reuolt of Duke Philip, dyed at* Paris, vncertaine to some, whether through griefe of the euils he foresaw, or other malady. But the Analogy and colour of his whole former life, doth contradict their conceit, who think that such a griefe should determine his daies, because it could not but proceed from a kinde of feare and despaire, an humor absolutely opposite to Magnanimitie, wherein hee abounded. How mighty a Prince he was this his * style sheweth; Regent of France; Duke of Bedford, Alanzon, and Anjou, Earle of Maine, Richmond, and Kendale; and Constable of England. But (which excelleth his greatnes) he was one of the best Patriots and Generals, that euer blossomed out of the royal Rosiar of England. His valour was not more terrible to the enemy, then his memory honourable. For (doubtfull whether with more glory to him, then to the speaker) * Lewis the eleuenth being afterwards counselled by certaine enuious persons to demolish and deface his stately Tombe, (wherein, with him, *saith one, was buried all the Englishmens good fortune in France,) which was erected ouer his body in the North-side of the high Altar in our Ladies Church at Roan, vsed these indeed most Princely words.

King Lewis his Princely testimony of the late Regents vertues.

(27) The Regent being now dead, the late peace made at Arras betweene King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgundie, presently disclosed, and put forth effects most dangerous to the English; for many Townes voluntarily yeeld, and multitudes of the French, (who hitherto through feare contayned themselues) starting away, all the English Dominions were full of priuate conuenticles, practises, and correspondences with the Enemy. Such English as then were in France, are not altogether sloathfull, but yet, through a fatall either security or negligence at home, there was not speedy sufficiencies of resistance ministred.

(28) Richard Duke of Yorke, (whose seruices neuer did good to the English common-wealth) is created Regent of France, and Edmund Duke of Sommerset (his perpetuall riuall, or perhaps an intelligent censor of his manners) continues his commands in Normandy. The Duke of Sommerset * opposed the aduancement of Yorke to that slipperie dignity. He was no babe in so doing, but more fore-seeing then the Protector, and all the Councell of England: Yet his opposition was vnseasonable, and fruitlesse; for the others carriage had wonne such a party about the King, (whom he meant by embracing to pull down) that notwithstanding the disaduantage of his silenced title, which was alone a great cause to haue made him euerlastingly incapable of so great trust & means, he preuailed. But before he could arriue, Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was Gouernour there for the English, who had with him but about two thousand, the faith of the Citizens was presumed vpon to make vp the rest at a pinch, for a common resistance. On the contrary, they perceiuing vpon what tearmes the English affaires stood in France, chiefly after the late Regents death, conspire against them. The treason was carried so cunningly by some of the principall Magistrates of the Towne, who capitulated for a generall pardon from King Charles (which was gladly yeelded vnto,) that the mischiefe sooner tooke effect, then it could be discouered. Thomas Lord Beaumont began the losse with his misfortune; for Arthur Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, houering about Paris, in hope to recouer the same, the Lord Beaumont, with certaine hundreths of English, fell into his danger about Saint Denis, and were distressed. While as yet the terror of this discomfiture (not great in regard of the numbers slaine, but in regard of the Circumstances) was freshest, the French aduance their Banners vp to the City, where a gate was opened vnto them by their partisans. What should the English doe in this generall mischiefe? The townesmen, lately vassals, turne enemies on a sodaine: women and children assaile the English from their windowes with all sorts of missill things. Many are beaten downe and massacred in the streets. The Lord Willoughby Gouernour of Paris, Lewis of Luxemburg Bishop of Therouenne, Chancellour of France for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux and Meaux, with other, flie to * S. Anthonies gate, and the Bastile, places which they had reserued for defence till extreame necessity. Many more had beene saued in those places, but that the perfidious Citizens drew chaines thwart the streetes, and empeached their retreat. Heare the rest in a * Frenchmans words.

Who of the Engliſh reades theſe things without indignation? but they are the perpetuall manners of the baſe multitude, and the fortune therein of the Engliſh, the ſame which followeth all like accidents. Some will thinke that the Lord Willoughby, and his people might haue done more nobly, to haue taken vp their graues in the place which they pretended to make good againſt the French. Fortitude is neuer ſeparated from Prudence. Succour was deſpaired. The Duke of Yorke was not as yet arriued, and in maintaining their ſtrengths againſt the whole City of Paris, and all the preſent French forces, for the ſpace of about ten dayes, they ſufficiently cleared themſelues both in point of honour and loyalty. Paris * is thus loſt in the worſt time for an Army to march in. They did wiſely to chooſe ſo vnſeaſonable a ſeaſon, their market might haue elſe beene marred; for the new Regent (not ſo much hindred from ſooner comming by the Duke of Sommerſets emulations, which ſome affirme, as by the very quality of the winter weather) arriued afterward, accompanied with the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke, the Lord Falconbridge, and other worthy perſons, with an Army of eight thouſand men. But this Regent did neuer good in France: He who ſo* writes, might haue alſo ſafely added, nor elſewhere. The Engliſh affaires were not as yet come to the very breake-necke poynt. They held (in the late conquered parts of France) Normandy entire, though not without much trouble; for the people againe rebell in Caux: but that miſchiefe was deſtroied with the greater and more mercileſſe confuſion of the authors and actors, then the former. About fiue thouſand of them were trampled to death by the iuſt fury of the Engliſh, vnder the leading of the Lord Scales, the Lord Hoo, and others. They burnt all their dwellings, made booty of their goods, draue their whole numbers out of the country. The Lord Scales not long after diſcomfited La Hire, and his Company not farre from Roane. The war was handled on all ſides without full or compleat armies: Skirmiſhes were the ordinary formes of fighting. The French were ſchooled from ſetling their reſt vpon a pitcht field. Thus houered the affaires.

(30) Philip Duke of Burgoigne had as yet in perſon giuen no proofe againſt the Engliſh of his affection to King Charles. Now he addreſſeth himſelfe to an enterpriſe worthy of that expectation, the recouery of Callis. You would ſuſpect that he continued ſtill a friend to the Engliſh, in making choyce of a ſeruice, wherein he was moſt likely to waſte his time in vaine, and yet make ſhew of much forwardneſſe; but he was reall, though the rather ſtirred thereunto by the deſire of priuate reuenge. The Engliſh, vpon his forſaking their alliance, had attempted to kindle the Gauntois, and other of the Flemiſh Townes (Subiects to the Duke) to riſe in rebellion: but the opinion that king Henries fortunes in France were deſperately ſtooping, made their wils too danke to take fire. The notice notwithſtanding of this attempt came to the Duke, which ſharpened him to reuenge, whereof (as the former paſſages abundantly declare) hee was not ordinarily thirſty. He brings his Army before Callis. Chiefe commanders there for King Henry, were the Lord Dudley who had charge of the Caſtel, and Sir John Ratcliffe of the Towne. The Dukes purpoſe was to haue cloyed the harbour by ſinking ſhips laden with ſtones, and ſuch like choaking materials; but vpon the ebbe-water the Caliſians deliuered the hauen from that perill. The King of England aduertiſed that his precious Fort and Towne of Callis were thus emperilled, Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter the Protector comes in perſon with a very great Fleete (ſome write fiue hundreth ſaile) to the reſcue, and in it a great puiſſance, with full purpoſe to giue battell, glad perhaps that he might now reuenge old grudges. It is able to moue choler, to conſider how Writers torter vs with the diuerſities of reports; but the generall agreement is, that the D. of Burgundy did raiſe his ſiege before he was fought with. Some * ſay the very rumor of the Protectors approach draue him away, and that the Protector came the next day after the Burgundians flight. Others excuſe him (probably enough) in ſaying that the Flemings grew vnweildy to his commandements, and would needes home.

This moſt noble Lady, when her Husband the King was dead, being not of iudgement (by reaſon of her tender yeares to vnderſtand what became her greatneſſe, or hauing found perhaps that greatneſſe was no part of happineſſe,) ſecretly marrieth one Owen ap Theodore or Teder, * the moſt noble and moſt goodly Gentleman of all the Welſh Nation, and endued with * admirable vertues, who drew his deſcent from holy Cadwallader, laſt King of the Britaines. This Husband had by her ſundry children, two of which, Edmund and Iaſper doe beare a part in the royall hiſtory, and King Henry the ſixt (their halfe-brother) created the firſt of them Earle of Richmond, the other of Pembroke. (34) But let vs ſee the ſequell. Out of this Matrimony alſo ſprung Queenes; for her Husband (afterward made Earle of Riuers) had ſundry children by her, whereof Elizabeth being one, had the honour to marry Edward the fourth King of England, and hereby was both her ſelfe a Queene and a Progenitreſſe of thoſe glorious Kings and Queenes which followed: for from her and this match ſprang another Elizabeth, the renowned Wife of King Henry the ſeauenth, as King Henry himſelfe did of the former: both thoſe marriages proued moſt fortunate to England: but another marriage which then threatned preſent danger to King Henry, was that which Iames the firſt King of Scots made with France, who gaue his daughter the Lady Margaret, to Lewis the Daulphin for wife, and ſent new ſupplies of men againſt the Engliſh: hee meant alſo to haue attempted ſome perſonall hoſtility, but that hee was moſt wickedly murthered by certaine bloudy Traitors in Perth, ſuborned thereunto by Walter Earle of Athol, (his

The ſilence at this time is euery where very great, yet had he opportunity to haue atchieued ſomewhat. Two thouſand French horſemen were mutined, and roued vp and downe in great diſorder. Paris was fearefully puniſhed with famine, and the attendants of famine, peſtilentiall maladies. The Countries about lay open: the Courtiers were diſcontented and diuided: Nothing is yet done by our Regent, which * ſome impute to Edmund Duke of Sommerſets oppoſition, who out of enuy and diſdaine hindred his diſpatch. Wee muſt in the meane time finde out them that did ſomewhat. The Duke of Sommerſet himſelfe, accompanied with the Lords Talbot & Fauconbridge, with other Gallants, and a competent force of the Engliſh, beſiege Harflew, which the Normans in the late rebellion tooke from them, and ſtill maintained againſt them vnder French Captaines: King Charles ſends ſome of his principal Commanders, with foure thouſand men, to reſcue the Towne; who did their beſt, but not able to effect any thing, Harflew was rendred to the Duke.

The Earle of Warwicke comes Regent into France, and Yorke returnes.

(36) In Nouember Richard Earle of Warwicke came as Regent into France, being ſurrogated in that office to the Duke of Yorke, who returned into England. Hee carried with him a thouſand freſh Souldiers, and arriued at Harflew, from whence he repaired to Roane, the chiefe ſeat (Paris being now loſt) of the Engliſh Dominions in North France, as Burdeaux was in the South; whither now the Earle of Huntington, with certaine troupes and companies of Souldiers, was ſent as Seneſcall. This new Regent buſied himſelfe in the generall affaires of his place. Vnder him the Duke of Burgoins forces were driuen from Crotoy: Abbeuile freed from the danger of a Baſtile, with which the Duke had pent that Towne in; and the Engliſh for twenty dayes ſpace together tooke their pleaſure in ſpoyling the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Artois. Theſe and ſome other actions hauing beene worthily carried during this Regents gouernment, himſelfe dyeth. The Duke of Yorke againe ſucceeds him. Our intereſt in France was retained, not ſo much by King Henries miniſters and Armies, as by remiſſeneſſe of King Charles, whom alſo Lewis the Daulphin (afterward King) did greatly trouble by rebellious deceſſions, and abſentments of himſelfe. The feare of the Engliſh reconciled the ſonne to the Father the ſooner. King Charles was now fallen in diſlike with his people, but to redeeme his credit, he attempts the recouery of Pontoyſe (a towne neere to Paris) which the Lord Clifford had not long before ſurprized by ſtratageme and money (an ordinary meanes as then for the expugnation of places) and comes in perſon to the enterpriſe. There attended vpon him for that ſeruice about ten or twelue thouſand men. The Lord Clifford is within, and makes a braue defence.

The ſiege of Pontoyſe.

(37) The Duke of Yorke lately landed in Normandy, as Regent, aſſembleth his maine ſtrengths, being about ſeauen or eight thouſand; offers the French King battell. Hee keepes himſelfe within his trenches. The Duke (according to the ancient humor and diſcipline of the Engliſh, who loue to ſet all vpon a puſh) deſirous to fight, vnexpectedly paſſeth the Riuer of Oyſe, which ranne betweene the two Campes. King Charles diſlodgeth ſo fearefully, that the French doe not ouer-boldly excuſe him of * flying. The Duke hauing had the ſpoyle of the French Kings Campe, re-fortifies Pontoyſe, and aſſaults a Baſtile, where Charles had left three thouſand Souldiers to maintaine the face of a ſiege. It was held better to purſue the King, who was gotten to Poiſie. There the Duke of Yorke againe very nobly prouokes him to a field. It would not be; King Charles ſaw the hazards were not equall, and therefore endures his bravado. He could doe no more, but is of neceſſity to returne to the maine of his charge in Normandy, and doth ſo. King Charles ranne into ſuch obloquie and contempt with his people by this diſhonourable retreate, but chiefly with the Pariſians; that if he had not attempted againe and preuailed againſt Pontoyſe, it might haue ieoparded his whole eſtate; for there was a faction which would haue made vſe of his diſgrace. He returnes in great fury to the ſiege, and finally enters the Towne, not without much bloudſhed. Serres ſaith, that fiue hundred Engliſh left their dead bodies at the breach. The King was one of the firſt that entred, chooſing rather to be thought temerarious then timerous. This exployt eſtabliſhed his opinion among the people. A ſatiety of warre filled both ſides, and the eſtate of England vnder King Henrie, whoſe ſoftneſſe and lenity gaue way to ſundry dangerous Court-factions, needed quiet Commiſſioners to meet at Callis: nothing is concluded but the enlargement of Charles Duke of Orleance, for the ſumme of three hundred thouſand Crownes. He had beene Priſoner in England about twenty and ſixe yeares, euer ſince the Battell of Azincourt, where hee was taken. The Duke of Burgundie was a ſpeciall Actor in his enlargement, with a purpoſe to ſecure his owne greatneſſe by benefites: this high-borne Prince, for the murther of his Father, being naturally the head and chiefe of that deadly fewde, which had moſt mortally raged betweene the houſes of Burgundie and Orleance. Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter prudently foreſeeing the dangers like to enſue on Orleance his enlargement, ſtoutly oppoſed himſelfe thereunto, and that vpon important reaſons which * hee required to haue regiſtred, that they might remaine on Record for a teſtimony and diſcharge of his duty in that behalfe.

1. Firſt, for that the French King wanted diſcretion and iudgement to order his affaires, which defects might be ſupplyed by the Duke, (being a man of experience and very ſubtle) if he ſhould be ſet at liberty.

2. That the ſaid Duke might procure an vnion of the factions (now hotely maintained in France among the Nobility) to the preiudice of the Crowne of England, and hazard of the loſſe of the Kings territories in France.

3. That the Dutchy of Normandy (hauing ſuſtained a great charge in maintaining the warre) ſeeing the Duke of Orleance deliuered, and no royall Army on the Engliſh part to withſtand the common enemy, was likely enough to reuolt.

4. That if the Duke ſhould be deliuered, it might be probably coniectured, that he would ſooner break his oath, which hee ſhould (being priſoner) make to the King of England, then the oath of his alleageance to the French king his Soueraigne Lord, of whom he holdeth his lands and dignity.

5. If the Articles concluded betweene his Maieſtie and the French on the Dukes behalfe, ſhould not be performed, what remedy might his Maieſty haue or expect?

6. That conſidering his coſen of Huntington was to leaue the Dutchy of Guyenne, and for that the alliance betwixt the ſaid Duke, and the Earles of Armignack and Foix, and the Lord de la Bret, was to be ſuſpected as dangerous, it was very neceſſary that good prouiſion ſhould be made for defence of that Countrey, being his Maieſties ancient inheritance.

7. That his Maieſty hath no allyance with any Chriſtian Prince, but only the King of Portugall (being but of tender yeares, and farre off:) and therefore it was not ſafe for his Maieſty to deliuer him, that was likely to proue his Capitall enemy, and to ſeeke seeke meanes to depriue him of thoſe lands which his noble Father had left him.

8. That if any of his Maieſties kindred, or other Lords on that ſide the Sea, ſhould happen to be taken priſoners, the ſaid Duke of Orleance might ranſome foure or fiue of them.

9. That it were fit to take aduiſe of the Lords, and other his Maieſties Subiects in the Realme of France, and Dutchy of Normandy, whether they thought it expedient that the ſaid Duke ſhould be deliuered or not. Otherwiſe the world might crie ſhame theron, when men ſhould cal to mind the loſſe of his Brethren of Clarence, and Bedford, and other noble Perſonages, in defending and keeping thoſe Lands.

10. If he (the ſaid Duke of Gloceſter) ſhould conſent to the ſaid Dukes deliuerance (the ſame being alſo quite contrary to the laſt will of his Maieſties Father) ſuch inconueniences as would enſue thereupon, ſhould be imputed to him.

(38) Notwithſtanding, the weight of ſo many thouſand Crownes ouer-peyſed all theſe important and ponderous reaſons; and the warre eates on ſtill in the body of France, but not with ſo ſharpe teeth, nor ſo full engorgement as before. Townes and people are taken on both ſides. The County of Amiens was ſpoyled by the Engliſh Lords, Willoughby & Talbot; The Regent and the Duke of Sommerſet, march into Anion, where they charged their carriages with much ſpoyle, and returned. The contemplation of theſe mutuall violences touched all Chriſtendome: for the Turke, common enemy thereof, encreaſed. Ambaſſadours are ſent from all parts, to determine theſe bloudy differences. William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, was chiefe for the Engliſh. A truce was hereupon taken for eighteene months, betweene King Henry & King Charles, and an hope of perpetuall amity, weakely grounded vpon a match which the Earle of Suffolke contracted for King Henry, with Margaret the daughter of Renate, titulary King of Sicile, Naples, and Ieruſalem, Duke of Anion and Loraine, Prince of the bloud. To effect this, the Earle couenanted that the Engliſh ſhould abandon the poſſeſſion of Anion, and Main to her Father. A ſtrange purchaſe of a wife, who though ſhe brought youth, beauty and hope of a perpetuall peace with France, (the more profitable opportunity whereof, the Engliſh had more bruely then happily neglected) yet was ſhe otherwiſe without portion. The Earle notwithſtanding (whoſe drift herein could not be without manifeſt ambition, to make himſelfe one of the greateſt of England, by this gratification of the French, with his Maſters charge and diſhonour) is not abaſhed to expect publique thankes for this high ſeruice, and an whole fifteene for the charge of her tranſportation. Sundry Lords of Councell, and the King himſelfe, thought him worthy, and according to his deuiſe & ouerture, the whole affaire was carried. Suffolke made Marqueſſe is ſent ouer with many honorable perſons, both men and women, to conduct the faire and goodly (but moſt vnfortunate and fatall) Bride into England. * Polydore giues vs no vnfitting Character of this Lady. She was prouident enough, very deſirous of glory, abounding in diſcourſe, counſell, gracious behauiour, and manly courage; but not free from womens humour, which (ſaith he) is vſually vehement and apt to change. In England ye may eaſily ſuppoſe, that ſhee was moſt roially entertained; Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, among others, meeting her with a traine of * fiue hundred horſemen in a liuery, that worthy Poet Iohn Lydgate Monke of Burie, deuiſing the ſpeeches for ſuch gratulatory triumphs as were made at her entrance into London. The King being married lawfully enioyes her embracements, from which he was often afterward violently ſeparated by the miſeries of a moſt cruell warre, wherein ſhe had her piteous portion. Suffolke in the meane time hauing the moſt aſſured fauour of the Queene, purſues his ambitious purpoſes. She in the meane time was ſolemnely crowned Queene of England at Weſtminſter vpon the * thirtieth of May.

Many great Lords were drawne on (at the time of a Parliament then * holden at Saint Edmunds-Bury) to concurre for his ruine, not perceiuing, that thereby they pluckt vp the floud-gate, at which the Duke of Yorke entered, ouerwhelming all of them in a deluge of bloud. ſhe confeſſed, for which ſhe was put to publike and ſolemne penance in London, vpon three ſeuerall daies, with wonderfull ſhame to her perſon, and after ſhee was committed to perpetuall priſon vnder the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the Caſtle of Cheſter, but from thence remoued to Kenelworth. Her pride, falſhood, auarice, and lechery were cauſes of her confuſion, ſaith Stow; who hath ſet forth that buſineſſe very diligently, though not ſeeming to attribute much credit to that accuſation of treaſon. The Duke of Gloceſter her vnhappy Lord and Husband (whom ſhee by loue-cups and enchantments was ſaid to haue enueigled, vſing therein one Margery Gurdmain a witch of Ey in Suffolke, who was burnt in Smithfield) ſtung with this reproach, might reaſonably be thought not vnwilling to doe ſomewhat. Howſoeuer that was, his deſtruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at Burie, was arreſted of high treaſon by Iohn Lord Beaumont high Conſtable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Sommerſet, with others. Certaine of the Kings houſhold were appoynted to guard him. Not long after hee was found dead. His body was ſhewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had died of a palſey or an apoſteme. Of thirty and two of his ſeruants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlaine Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Turſey Eſquiers, and Richard Nedham Gentleman, were condemned of high treaſon, & had this vnexampled puniſhment. They were drawne from the Tower to Tiburne, hanged, let down quick, ſtript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a Charter of pardon ſhewed for their liues by the Marqueſſe of Suffolke. But the yeoman * of the Crowne had their liuelyhood, the executioner their cloathes. Their pardons were thus obtained by the earneſt diligence of Doctor Gilbert Worthington, a famous Preacher, Parſon of Saint Andrewes in Holborne. Thomas Wilde Eſquire, the Dukes ſeruant alſo, being condemned and pardoned among other, had for a preamble in his Letters Patents words importing, * that he had beene one among many other traitours againſt the King, with Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, who went about, and practiſed, to deliuer Eleanour, late wife to the Duke, from out of priſon, for which purpoſe he had gathered a great power & number of men, to come to the Parliament at Burie, there to haue contriued the Kings deſtruction.

(42) Such was the end of this great Prince, who, notwithſtanding this open ſhewing of his body, and theſe pretended crimes, was by the people of England thought to be doubly murthered, by detraction, and deadly practiſe. He was not only a true louer of learned men, but himſelfe alſo * learned, and (ſaith our Author) a father of his Countrey. His maine opinion concerning the gouernment of King Henries French dominions, was as mainely oppoſed by the Cardinall of Wincheſter, and others, who altogether perſwaded Peace, to which the noble Duke (ſtanding preciſely vpon the honour and Maieſty of the Engliſh name,) was * an abſolute enemy. From this troubled fountaine of diuided Councell many following blacke aduentures did flow. The Duke thus brought to his end, good men (ſaith Polydore) fearefull of their own ſafeties, did of their own accord forſake the Court, into whoſe roomes many ſucceeded, who for the more part looking how to riſe in dignity made open an eaſie way for new factions. The Cardinal of Wincheſter (the other halfe-arch of the Kingdome) ouerliued not the Duke aboue fifteene or ſixteene dayes. The whole frame of gouernement was thus drawne to repoſe it ſelfe vpon the Queene, and ſuch fauourites, as the King by her commendation the rather liked.

The Cardinall of Wincheſter deceaſeth.

(43) The Marqueſſe of * Suffolke, prime man in grace, was created Duke, which made him a more conſpicuous marke of enuie, then that any ſhadow of the King or Queene could ſhelter or protect. *After the Cardinals * death, the affaires in Fraunce (where Sommerſet was now Regent) were neither duly looked vnto, nor the gouernours of the Countrey well aduiſed.* But the King and Realme of England lay, much more then France, open to the ineuitable, deepe, and pernicious conſpiracies of Richard Duke of Yorke. He (by the errour of King Henrie, and the euill ſtarres of our Countrey) being of himſelfe a great Prince, and growne ſtronger by affected popularity, perceiuing the King to be a Ruler, and not to Rule, began ſecretly to allure his friends of the Nobility, and priuily declared to them his title to the Crowne, as likewiſe he did to certaine Gouernors of Cities and Townes, which attempt was ſo politickly and cloſely carried, that his prouiſion was ready, before his purpoſe was opened. The very ſtate of things inuited this fatall conſpiracy: a milder King then England was worthy of; a Councell out of fauour with the people; manifold loſſes and diſhonours abroad; a turbulent and iealous condition of things at home. Of all which and much more, the Duke of Yorke, hauing King Henry the fourth (the enemy of his houſe) for a perillous example, made his pretious vſe, cheriſhing the popular auerſions, without ſeeking to redreſſe any euils, but repreſenting them worſe then they were, thereby to ripen that breach of loyalty in the hearts of men, which his ambition wrought vpon. His diſplacement from the Regency of France, did not a little (perhaps) offend him at firſt, becauſe the Duke of Sommerſet got it ouer his head; but it will not be long, before Sommerſets euill carriage of that truſt, and the declining fortune of England, will giue him occaſion to reioyce at the foile of his dreaded enemy. Let vs not be long in the rehearſall of the publique ſhame and dammage of our nation.

Reſtitution is demanded. The Duke of Sommerſet (a proud man (ſaith Serres) who thinking to do better then the reſt, did abſolutely ruine the Engliſh affaires) contrary to good diſcipline, cheriſhing his ſouldiers in their riots and diſorders, neglected the iuſtice of Nations in that poynt. The French make this their example, and ſurprize Port de l'Arch, and towne after towne, ſo many and ſo faſt, that King Charles (who, that he might haue God on his ſide, and wrong on his enemies, contained himſelfe with great modeſty, till * he ſaw all quiet reſtitution deſperate,) recouered Roan, Cane, and all Normandy within a ſhort ſpace after.

(45) Thus Sommerſet, and the Engliſh, are compelled to quit Normandy, not only inglorious, but alſo in England it ſelfe vncommiſerated. The next maine parcell of the Engliſh inheritance, beyond our Ocean, was Gaſcoine. King Charles and his people deſirous (againſt plaine right) to make all that theirs, whatſoeuer was comprehended within the French language, inuaded that Dutchie alſo, and within very * few yeeres after (the fortune of warre, and diſloyalty of the people euery where fauouring them) extorted the ſame out of the Engliſh-mens poſſeſſion, after it had continued theirs about two hundreth foure-ſcore and nine yeares, to the immortall diſhonour and dammage of our nation. The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, who thirſted for the Crowne of England, hath occaſion miniſtred to impe more feathers into his aſpiring wings. Ireland is in tumult. Thither the Duke paſſeth, and not onely appeaſeth the diſorder of that Nation, *but * wan ſuch fauour among them, as could neuer be ſeperated from him, and his linage*. Thus diligently the Pioner makes his mines into the quiet and felicitie of his Countrey, calling his cauſe the quarrell of right and iuſtice, as pertending that the Crowne of England appertained to his name and family.

folke ſuffer obloquie for theſe effects in the generall iudgement. The Common-wealth is not ſilent. A Parliament is called to be holdē at Weſtminſter, which from thence was aſſigned to be kept at Leiceſter. The place likes not; few appeare. It is brought backe to Weſtminſter. There the whole body of publike counſell meetes. Many * Articles are exhibited by the lower houſe againſt the Duke of Suffolke, wherein hee is charged with euill demeanour, miſpriſion and treaſon: who thereupon is committed priſoner to the Tower: from thence, within foure or fiue weekes he is diſcharged, which more augmented the generall indignation then his commitment had miniſtred ſatisfaction. The perilous Duke of Yorke warmes himſelfe at theſe blazes, and vnder-hand cheriſheth them as opportunity will permit, hauing his cunning factors and inſtruments fit for ſuch occaſions ſecretly ſpread ouer the Realme, to inſtill the poyſons of diſcontentment, and deſire of change into the giddy multitude. When we reade in our vulgar Chronicles, that about this time Adam Molins Biſhop of Chicheſter, Keeper of the Kings Priuy Seale (through the procurement of Richard Duke of Yorke) was by ſhipmen ſlaine at Portſmouth, and yet no cauſe of ſo foule and wicked a murther expreſſed, it cannot but offend any curious Reader, who would receiue ſatisfaction rather by the reaſon of actions, then by the euents. His guiltineſſe in the fact was ſo apparant, that King Henry in his anſwer, made a yeare or two after to the Dukes diſſembling and deceitfull letter, confidently mentioneth the ſame, where thus he ſpeaketh. Sooth it is, that long time among the people hath beene vpon you many ſtrange language, and in ſpeciall anone after your diſordinate and vnlawfull ſlaying of the Biſhop of Chicheſter, diuers, and many of the vntrue ſhipmen and other, ſaid (in their manner) words againſt our ſtate, making menace to our owne perſon by your ſayings, that yee ſhould be fetched with many thouſands, and you ſhould take vpon * you that which you neither ought, nor as we doubt not will attempt, &c. What cauſe led the Duke to commit this ſo impious a deed, may eaſily now be coniectured, being none other but the common hatred he bare to all ſuch wiſe or valiant perſons, as might in any ſort vphold the moſt iuſt & gracious Henry; & this ſincerity in the Biſhop could not be but a grieuous crime in the Dukes ambitious eyes, whoſe greatneſſe was euen then too intollerable; for where was the Kings iuſtice when ſuch a fact might hope of impunity? The Duke did effect it by his bloudy complices, as he did many other moſt ſeditious and perfidious things, while hee was abſent in Ireland. Thomas Thanie notwithſtanding, calling himſelfe Blew-beard, being a Fuller of Canterbury, and attempting to gather the people, miſcarrieth in his treaſon, and for that was hanged and quartered: this was a preamble to the following tumults. The Duke of Yorkes whole and onely hopes were repoſed in the generall perturbations of his Countrey.

(47) The Duke of Suffolke (a principall pillar of King Henries ſafety) being ſet at liberty, attends the King and Queene in their Parliament at Leiceſter. Behold the humour of the Commons which were ſowred with the peſtilent leauen of Yorkes conſpiracy. They cannot endure the ſight of this Prince, becauſe his re-aduancement ſeemes done in deſpight of them. Calumniations and odious ſurmiſes are exhibited againſt him: he muſt downe, to make way for King Henries moſt vnworthy ruine. The moſt vile part of this Parliamentall accuſation was, that they ſhould charge that for a crime vpon Suffolke, which themſelues had vniuerſally in another former Parliament aſſented vnto, and ratified. Which was the deliuery of Anion and Main vpon the marriage, concluded (for the good of England, if others had not inuerted or interrupted the ſucceſſe by their temerity) with Renate, Father of Queene Margaret. Neither did the enuy only of the ſecret Yorkiſts ouerlade this noble Gentleman, but the impotency of the Duke of Sommerſets faction, whoſe raſhneſſe and vanity hauing loſt all Normandy, would gladly find any others ſhoulder, vpon which to caſt the imputation, either in part or whole. In that former Parliament aſſembled immediately vpon Suffolkes returne from that treaty with Renate out of France, this was the ſumme of the whole proceedings: Suffolke (as he was very eloquent) made knowne to both Houſes, his counſels and ſeruices, and the effect of his Embaſſie, praying they might be approued, and enrolled for his diſcharge. Whereupon * the next morrow, Burley, Speaker of the lower houſe, and the body thereof, repaired to the Kings preſence, then ſitting among the Lords, and there * humbly required, that the requeſt of the Marqueſſe (afterward created Duke of Suffolke) might be granted: and the Lords made the like petition, kneeling on their knees. The King condiſcended to their deſires, and ſo the whole matter was recorded for his acquitall.

(48) What can be more euident? or who can enough admire the vanity of popular mutability? The Duke (the principall marke, though the Biſhop of Salisbury, the Lord Say, and others were alſo accuſed) vnable to ſtand the puſh of ſo generall an oppoſition, muſt be baniſhed. The King vnwillingly giues this ſentence againſt the Duke, or rather againſt his owne life and ſafety: fiue yeares are limitted to his exile. Being vpon the ſea, hee is taken by his enemies, who at Douer-road ſtroke off his head vpon the ſide of a Cocke-boat. This diuelliſh murther (for it was none other, the Kings authority being not vſed therein) committed vpon ſo great a Prince, was the leſſe pittied, for that he was noyſed among the people to haue beene a priuie actor in the noble Duke of Gloceſters death, who periſhed (ſaith a learned * Authour) by the fraud and practiſe of a woman, (belike) Queene Margaret. The Biſhop of Salisbury beforeſaid, more impiouſly, and irregularly loſt his life in the following tumults, being murthered (after he had finiſhed diuine Seruice) by his owne Tenants, who dragged him from the Altar to an hill-top, and there (while hee was making his laſt prayers) cleft his ſacred head: The Lord Say Treaſurer of England, fell likewiſe into the peoples fury, and had his head cut off by the commandement of that execrable Rebell Iacke Cade, at the Standard in Cheape, as yee ſhall hereafter learne.

(49) This William Duke of Suffolke * was indeed a great and worthy perſon; for when his Father, and three Brothers had valiantly powred forth their liues for their Countrey in the warre of France, he ſerued in them foure & thirty yeares, in ſeuenteene of the which hee neuer returned home, hee was once taken priſoner, being then but a Knight, and payed for his ranſome twenty thouſand pounds ſterling, he was fifteene yeares Priuy Counſellour, and thirtie yeares Knight of the Garter. Notwithſtanding all which, the ſame Authour truely addeth: That as for theſe cauſes he was in higheſt grace with the King, ſo he was the more diſgracious or hated of the people, and for * certaine very ſleight matters, and thoſe not very apparant, hee was driuen into baniſhment, and (as you haue already heard) was intercepted vpon the Sea in his paſſage to France, and by his aduerſaries killed. What honeſt heart doth not melt at the relation of theſe violent contempts of all Religion, honour, reaſon and iuſtice? yet are they but the drops which doe forgoe thoſe many bloudy ſhowres, which the cloud of Yorkes faction rainde vpon our miſerable Nation. They who murthered this great triumphant Gentleman, were certaine perſons who wafted vpon the Seas in a Barke called the Nicholas of the Tower, which belonged to Iohn * Holland Duke of Exceſter, Conſtable of the Tower of London, whom Gods reuenging hand ſhall not leaue vnpuniſhed.

At Seuenoke Cade abides, probably not without encouragement from ſecret Traitours, and after long fight ſlew Sir Humfrey, with many others. Hee armed himſelfe in the dead Knights abillements, with guilt ſpurres. The King and Queene hearing of this miſhappe, leaue the Tower of London to the cuſtody of the Lord Scales, and of that renowned Eſquire Mathew Gowgh; and London it ſelfe to the Lord Maiors fidelity, themſelues departing to Kenilworth. The headlong crewes of London fauour the Rebell, and giue entrance. Robert Horne Alderman, like an honeſt wiſe man, would haue had them reſiſted. This free neceſſary ſpeech endangered his life; honourable in his memory for the hazard onely, what ſhould hee haue beene if hee had gloriouſly loſt it? but money buyes out his perill with the Tyrant, who fined him at * fiue hundred Markes. The time was very ſlippery and looſe; for the Eſſex-men alſo were encamped vpon Mile-end by London: All men are afraid of their own eſtates; ſuch ſecret well-wiſhings attended vpon the Arch-Rebels pretences. The King before he had left London, was enforced (by ſuch hollow friends as were about him) to commit the Lord Say, Treaſurer of England to the Tower, after that the valiant and loyall Sir Humfrey Stafford was ſlaine, and the newes of his vnlucky defeate were confirmed.

(52) Cade therefore being admitted into London vpon the ſecond of Iuly with his forces, (where for a ſhort while, to delude the people with a ſhew of conſcience, they abſtained from robberies) ſtrikes with his ſword vpon London-ſtone, ſaying; Now is Mortimer Lord of this Citie. At night he returnes into Southwarke: One * Robert Poinings of Southwarke Eſquire, was his Sword-bearer and Caruer. It is needleſſe to be particular in this Rebels behauiour: The next day he returnes, and the Lord Say is beheaded in Cheapſide (as is before ſaid) at Cades commandement, and his body cut into quarters. The King being by the loſſe of ſo truſty and graue a ſeruant, not a little weakened.

(53) The next tragedy was Cromeres an Eſquire, and high Sheriffe of Kent, (the Lord Sayes ſonne in law) who is drawne out of the Fleet (and to appeaſe the Eſſex Rebels) ſacrificed, by beheading, without any tryall, at Mile-end. The Citie ſtirres not for all this. Malpas and Gerſtie, two rich Citizens, at whoſe houſes Cade had ſeuerally dined, being ſpoyled and robbed by him (leſt perhaps it might appeare, that he who durſt commit treaſons, had not alſo the heart to commit felonies) teach what others are to expect. The Maior, Thomas Chalton and the wiſer wealthy ones, ouer-ruled by faction till then, ſee their danger now, and ſecretly ſend to the Lord Scales for ayde. Mathew Gowgh at night is come among them as ſent by him. The Kentiſhmen, hearing their entry was barred, runne furiouſly to armes. Cade endeauours to open his way by force; but in deſpight of all his power, the Citizens made good & defended London-bridge againſt him, though with the loſſe of many valiant and honeſt men, for the conflict endured all night, till nine in the morning. Among ſuch as were ſlaine on the Kings ſide, were Iohn Sutton Alderman, Mathew Gowgh himſelfe, and Robert Heyſand Citizen. This Gowgh (an Eſquire of Wales) was a man of excellent vertue, manhood, and zeale to his Countrey, and of great renowne in the warre of France, where he had ſerued with ſpeciall commendations faithfully, for the ſpace of aboue twenty yeares. His deſerts at this time deſerued a Statue in the City, for whoſe ſafety hee ſpent his laſt bloud. To giue a quicke end to theſe miſeries, impunity is proclaimed for all offenders, and ſent to them in the Kings name by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellour, vnder the great Seale of England: the rebels are ſcattred with this aſſurance of their ſafeties, and euery man retires in peace from following ſo peſtilent an Impoſtor. A * thouſand Markes (when Cade afterward attempted new troubles) are promiſed to him, who kils or takes this counterfeit Mortimer. Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the happineſſe to diſcouer and kill him at Hothfield in that County: his wretched carkaſe was brought to London, where his falſe head was ſet ſentinell vpon London-bridge, and his quarters were aduanced for terrour in ſeuerall parts of Kent. There died alſo by the ſtroke of Iuſtice twenty and ſixe more, wherof eight were executed at Canterbury, and the reſt elſewhere in Kent and Suſſex. The multitude it ſelfe * came naked in their ſhirts to the King on Black-heath, humbly praying mercy, which they obtained.

(54) The Kentiſh rebellion thus pacified, farre greater & farre more dangerous troubles enſued, *as it * fareth in humane bodies, which relapſing into ſickneſſes, are ſhaken ſo much the more terribly.* Theſe troubles had their fountaine and mediate Originall from Richard Duke of Yorke, no degenerous ſonne of that Richard whom K. Henry the fift had created Earle of Cambridge, and enriched with much wealth, honouring him aboue others, in regard of his bloud & parentage; *but * no bounty, nor benefits could change a treacherous diſpoſition*, for (as you haue heard before) he he conſpired to murther his benefactor King Henry the fifth, as the Duke of Yorke (his true progeny) laboured to depoſe this King Henry his aduancer. The humors of the popular body, were, in the laſt commotion, not obſcurely diſcouered. The Commonweale had perhaps ſome few enormities, through the abuſe of Magiſtrates and men in place, but yet ſuch, as the malady was infinitely leſſe pernicious then the remedy. Vpon this intelligence the Duke comes ſodainly out of Ireland, and to begin his vſurped cenſureſhip and dictature, apprehends * Iohn Sutton Lord Dudley, Reignald Abbot of Saint Peters at Glaſtenbury, and another, whom he impriſoneth within his Caſtell of Ludlow. Intollerable beginnings of more intollerable ſequele. Edmund Duke of Sommerſet was the man, who (after Suffolks death) moſt ſupported the Kings ſide by * his vigilancie, cares, dangers, and good Counſels, endeauouring by all meanes to cleare the Realme from factions, and to preſerue the King and ſtate in quiet.

* Polyd. Virg. l.23.

(55) Yorke ſeeing this, doth finde that Suffolke periſhed in vaine, if Sommerſet held like grace; againſt whoſe perſon he had a particular pretence of quarrel, for that the City of Caen in Normandy, which was the Duke of Yorkes charge, was rendred vp to the French by him, when the Engliſh affaires grew deſperate in thoſe parts; Sr. Dauid Hall Knight, being at that time Captaine there for his Lord and Maſter the Duke of Yorke, and not allowing it, although the renowned Talbot himſelfe was preſent at the render, & became an hoſtage for performance of the Capitulations. Yorke hereupon conſults with his ſpecial friends, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his Sonne, (who was afterward that moſt ſeditious & great fighting Earle of Warwick) Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, Edmund Brooke Lord Cobham, and others, how Yorke might get the Crowne of England, and for that cauſe how to ruine or fret out the Duke of Sommerſet, who ſtanding, they were to looke for ſtrong oppoſition. In the end, they conclude to take armes, but yet to ſmother the mention of the Duke of Yorkes title, giuing out to the world for the reaſon of their doings, that they meant all honour and obedience to king Henry, & only to remoue certaine bad men from about his perſon, who afflicted the people, and made a pray of the Common-wealth: which, to gaine the more credit, & to blind the good King, the ſubtile Duke declares by Proclamation; * wherein, thus ſpeaketh that ambitious Hypocrite. God knoweth, from whom nothing is hid, I am, haue been, and euer will be, his true liegeman, &c. And to the very proofe it is ſo, I offer my ſelfe to ſweare that on the bleſſed Sacrament, and receiueit, the which I hope ſhall be my ſaluation at the day of doome, &c. In that it was the euill hap of the Duke of Sommerſet, that Normandy was loſt during his Regency, his enemies had the more commodity to incommodate him with the people, who forbare not at his returne to offer to him ſundry diſhonours and iniuries, till vpon paine of death they were reſtrained, for breach of which Proclamation, one had his head cut off in Weſt-Cheape London.

* Dat. 9. Ian. 30. H. 6. at the Dukes Caſtell of Ludlow.

He publiſheth a declaratory ſchedule in his iuſtification.

(56) The King (notwithſtanding all his Coſens Arts and diſſimulations) ſeeing the hooke through the baite, and the ſnake through the graſſe, by the aduiſe of his truſty friends, chiefly of Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, thinkes not fit to relye vpon his enemies good nature, but hauing a ſtrong power, and ſtore of honourable men to conduct them, hee marcheth toward Wales againſt the Duke. The King did herein wiſely, but not ſo much as the cauſe required. Yorke hauing notice of the Kings approach turnes aſide, & with all ſpeed marcheth toward London. That City, (the vaine hope of all Rebellions,) would not harken; Thereupon he ſlides with his people into Kent, the neſt of his hopes, and at Brent-heath neere Dertford (a towne about twelue miles from London) encampeth, meaning to fight. The King is not ſlow, but leauing his march toward Wales, pitcheth vp his roiall Pauillion vpon Black-heath, with a purpoſe to teach his Coſen of Yorke more duty. Behold the fortune of England. God puts an excellent opportunity into the Kings hands, of tearing vp the danger of his houſe by the rootes, for the Duke was farre inferiour in numbers. Such therefore as ſecretly fauoured him, fearing his ouerthrow, were willing to aduiſe a reconcilement. Meſſengers goe betweene the hoaſts. The Duke in his wonted manner, *pretends loialty and particular iniuries, as that the Kings ſeruants, Sir Iohn Talbot at Holt Caſtell, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheſhire, and others in other places, were ſet to harken vpon him. That by * two of the Norrices, Bulkley, Gruſt, Bould, (and other Gentlemen) he was forbidden to land at Bewmaris, or to haue any refreſhment, affirming that he* (the Duke of Yorke) was againſt the Kings intent, and as a Traitor. The King ſtoopes ſo much as to anſwer the Letter, letting him to know: That the ſuſpition vniuerſally conceiued of his behauiours moued thoſe effects: neuertheleſſe, in regard of the humble obedience which was now proteſted, hee, for the eaſing of the Dukes heart, doth declare, repute, and admit him as a true and faithfull ſubiect, and as his welbeloued Coſen. The Duke then aduanceth his practiſe one ſtep further, and writes to the King, that Iuſtice might be done vpon all perſons of what degree ſoeuer, which were guilty, or noiſed to be guilty of treaſon: aiming at the Duke of Sommerſet, whom he doubted not to ouerwhelme with ſleights and calumnies, as hee and his had done the Duke of Suffolke.

The King marcheth againſt the Duke of Yorke.

The Kings army being greater then the Dukes, peace is vnhappily made.

* Ex literis Regis & Ducis.

(57) The King is contented (ſuch weake or treacherous counſels he relied vpon) that Sommerſet (for his ſatisfaction) ſhould be commanded Priſoner to his * owne houſe, and Yorke (hauing firſt diſſolued his Armie) ſhould come in perſon, and put himſelfe into the Kings hand. When he was come, he exhibites a great complaint againſt the pride and auarice of the Duke of Sommerſet, and cunningly accuſing none but him, he ſeekes the good will of all others. A cunning drift as any, conſidering that hereby he deriued vpon his enemy all the enuie of the people, and left him ſingle to withſtand the effects. Sommerſet (a Prince of great ſpirit and wit) not thinking it reaſonable, as well in regard of his owne honour as the Common-wealths intereſt, to endure ſuch indignity, preſents himſelfe to the King againſt his accuſer, and reſoluing not to be tender-mouthed in the ſo apparent perill of the King and Realme, whoſe quiet was vndermined, anſweres Yorke face to face, and, in plaine termes accuſeth him of higheſt treaſon, as hauing conſpired to depoſe the King, and take vpon himſelfe the Soueraignty: vehemently vrging: That * the Duke of Yorke might be committed and arraigned, to the intent that by his deſerued death, and the diſenablement of his ſonnes, Ciuill warre might be extinguiſhed, praying finally that God would not ſuffer the enemy of the Kingdome to eſcape the hand of iuſtice.

* Polyd. Virg. l.23.

* The Duke of Sommerſet confidently accuſeth the Duke of Yorke of treaſon.

(58) This had in likelyhood beene done, but that the publique faith ſeemed to ſtand engaged for the Dukes indemnity, he hauing come in vpon the Kings word, and alſo for that the hearts of men were not well aſſured to the King, which by executing Yorke would perhaps haue beene more vnſetled, becauſe (not looking into the depth of the Kings perill) it would haue beene thought that he had beene deſtroyed to gratifie Sommerſet, and not to ſecure the Realme. There was hope likewiſe to recouer Aquitaine, for that Burdeaux had offered to returne: Laſtly, the Dukes ſonne and heire, Edward Earle of March (afterward King) was reported to be ready with a great force of Welſhmen to ſuccour his Father. Vpon theſe and other reaſons, the Duke is no longer reſtrained, as vpon Sommerſets moſt weighty accuſations he had beene, and to aſſure the gentle and indulgent King of his alleageance, hee makes his ſubmiſſion, and ſolemnely TAKES HIS OATH to be true, faithfull & obedient ſubiect. This was done vpon the tenth of March in the Church of S. Paul in London; the King himſelfe, and moſt of the chiefe

Let vs haſten to their view, leſt God perhaps may quietly ſeeme to haue beene mockt to his face by a vaine ambitious man.

Hope conceiued to recouer Gaſcoigne.

(60) To diuert theſe home-breeding rancors and practiſes, by employing the wits and bodies of men in other more honeſt things, the Earle of Candal (ſonne * to Captal de Budie, who had vpon neceſſity ſubmitted his Seignouries to Charles the French King, but reſerued his perſon out of that obedience) & the Lord L'Eſparre, come ſecretly from Burdeaux and pray an Armie, for that Burdeaux and the Gaſcoigns would returne to the Engliſh, if they might be ſupported. An Armie is decreed for their reduction. Iohn Lord Talbot, the firſt Earle of Shrewsbury of his name, as Generall in that enterprize, lands in Gaſcoigne, where hee doth ſundry exployts, and the fame of his former cheualrie flying before with terrour, makes many places the rather to yeeld. Burdeaux her ſelfe ſecretly opens a gate vnto him, which the French Garriſon perceiuing fled out at a Poſtern, but many being ouertaken were ſlaine by the Lord L'Eſparre and the Engliſh. New ſupplies and victuals arriue, whereof the Earle of Shrewsburies younger Sonne, (Vicount Lile by his Wife,) was a principall conducter. Burdeaux thus throughly man'd and fortified, the Earle is aduertiſed that the French lay at ſiege before Caſtillion, a place of importance vpon the riuer of Dardonne. Thither the Earle marcheth, and with too great a confidence charging the enemie vpon vnequall termes, was there ſlaine, together with his ſonne the Viſcount Lile, and others. Burdeaux receiued ſuch as fled. The Engliſh fortunes and hopes which began to quicken, made this vnhappy Cataſtrophe in * Iuly, to the infinite loſſe of our nation and griefe of the Gaſcoignes, who generally miſliked the French, and inclined to the Engliſh, hauing ſo honorably, and for ſo long a time gouerned thoſe dominions. This was the end of that great Earle, after he had for the ſpace of twenty and foure yeares ſerued his Prince and Countrey in the French warres, with higheſt commendation; * a moſt noble and moſt valiant man, by whoſe vertue the Engliſh name did chiefly become terrible in France. Burdeaux it ſelfe, & all other places after this, were by ſiege brought again vnder the French King, who proſecuted thoſe affaires in perſon. From that time forward the Engliſh neuer obtained there any hold or further footing, the felicity of this attempt breaking all combinations of the Gaſcoignes. This Dutchie of * Aquitaine contained foure Archbiſhopricks, foure & twenty Biſhopricks, fifteene Earledomes, two hundred and two Barons, and aboue a thouſand Captainſhips and Bailywicks. The loſſe of ſo goodly an inheritance, which had continued Engliſh for almoſt 300. yeares, the world may eaſily coniecture how iuſtly it was grieued and lamented for. In this falne eſtate of the Engliſh, the Queene vpon the thirteenth day of October, was deliuered of her firſt ſonne, who was named Edward, prouing the childe of ſorrow and infelicity.

(61) It were to be wiſhed we might now rather number the following euils of England, then deſcribe them; for, what can we learne out of ſuch vnnaturall and ſauage deſtructions, but matter of horrour and deteſtation? but ſith they muſt be handled, (the law and neceſſity of our taske exacting it,) the ſooner to be quit of ſo vnpleaſing obiects, it will be beſt abruptly to thruſt into the narration. The Duke of Yorke (wickedly careleſſe of an Oath ſo religiouſly and publiquely taken,) to make his way to the Crowne more eaſie, hath now procured his chiefe and moſt fearefull enemy the Duke of Sommerſet to be ſodainely arreſted of high treaſon, (doubtfull whether by any authority but his owne) in the Queenes great Chamber, and ſent to the Tower of London, vpon pretence that he had capitall matter to charge him with. Yorkes principall friends (vpon confidence of whom he dared ſo high things) were Richard Neuill Earle of Salisbury, ſecond Sonne of Ralfe Neuil Earle of Weſtmorland, whoſe daughter the Duke of Yorke had married. This Richard was Earle of Salisbury in right of Alice his Wife, ſole heire to Thomas Montacute, the famous Earle, ſlaine at the ſiege of Orleance. The Dukes other maine hope was Richard Neuill (Sonne of the former Richard Neuill,) who in right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, (ſole-Siſter, and heire of the whole bloud to Henry Beauchampe Duke of Warwicke) was by this King Henry the ſixt created Earle of Warwicke in a moſt vnhappy houre both for the King and Kingdome, being * inuicto animo &c. a man a man of an vndaunted minde, but flitting faith.

(63) The King in the meane ſpace, while the Duke of Sommerſet was thus endangered, lay ſicke; and Yorke (as Regent) ſwayed and ouer-ſwayed in Court; but when the King (perceiuing malice and practiſe to be the chiefe baſes of Yorkes accuſations) had recouered his health, and reſumed the gouernment, Sommerſet is ſet at liberty, and made Captaine of Callis; Yorke and his adherents repayre to open force: They leuy their army about the Marches of Wales, with which they repayre toward London, the maine object of Pretendents. The King hearing of his enemies approach, is accompanied with Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, Humfrey Earle of Stafford, Henry Piercie Earle of Northumberland, Iames Butler Earle of Wiltſhire and Ormond, Beaufort Earle of Dorcet, Iaſper Teder Earle of Pembroke the Kings halfe-brother, Thomas Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, the Lords, Clifford, Sudley, Berners, Roſſe, and others, and with them enters into Saint Albans in warlike manner, hauing certaine thouſands of common Souldiers. Thither alſo the Duke of Yorke and his adherents came. This was toward the end of May: The Dukes requeſt to the King was, that hee would deliuer ſuch perſons to be deſeruedly puniſhed as he would name. The King (to let them know who he was) returnes this confident anſwere: That hee and the reſt were Traitors, and that rather then they ſhould haue any Lord from him who was with him at that time, he himſelfe would for their ſake in the quarrell vpon that day liue and die.

The King marcheth to Saint Albans againſt the Duke of Yorke.

(64) The Yorkiſts hereupon aſſaile the Kings people within the Towne, and Warwicke breaking in through a Garden, a ſharpe battell is begun. The loſſe fell lamentably vpon King Henries ſide; for beſides the Duke of Sommerſet, there were ſlaine the Earles of Northumberland and Stafford, the L. Clifford, with ſundry worthy Knights and Eſquires, of which forty and eight were buried in Saint Albans, there being ſlaine aboue fiue thouſand of K. Henries party, and of the Yorkiſts about ſixe hundreth. The King himſelfe was ſhot into the neck with an arrow; & other of his chief friends were likewiſe ſore wounded and taken. The Earle of Wiltſhire, and Thomas Thorpe Lord chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, with others, ſaued themſelues by flight. The Duke of York, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwick, with the King, (whom they in ſhew did vſe moſt reuerently, and as if they had meant nothing vnto him but good faith) vpon the morrow ride to London, where in Iuly immediately following, a Parliament is holden in King Henries name. The fore-runner whereof was a Comet, or Blazing-Starre, which appeared in the moneth of Iune, the beames whereof extended themſelues into the South. The firſt popular act of this aſſembly was, to reſtore the memory of Humfrey Duke of Glocester to honour, declaring him to haue beene a true ſubject to the King and Realme.

The Duke of Sommerſet ſlaine and the King taken in battell.

Humfrey Duke of Glocester declared to haue beene a true ſubject.

(65) The next prouiſions which the Yorkiſts made, were for themſelues, and their owne ſecuritie, willing and commanding that the Duke of Yorke and his partakers ſhould incurre no blame by reaſon of the journey at Saint Albans: the whole fault whereof was laid vpon the dead Duke of Sommerſet, the Lord Chiefe Baron, and one William Ioſeph Eſquire, who (ſay they) kept from the King a pacificatorie Letter which the Duke of Yorke had ſent. It is a wonder and a ſhame to reade how officiouſly theſe violent Lords (meaning nothing leſſe) behaued themſelues to the King, of whoſe Majeſty they will needes ſeeme to be the onely Champions and Conſeruators. The Duke of Yorke in the ſame Parliament creates himſelfe Protector of England, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earle of Warwicke (his ſonne) Captaine of Callis: they ſpared as yet to touch King Henries life, becauſe the people did wonderfully honour, eſteeme, and reuerence him for his ſingular holineſſe, and for that he had great friends left aliue, and a ſonne. In the meane ſpace, that they might without trouble, and at their pleaſure, vncrowne or kill him, they by little and little diſplaced the ancient Counſellors, and ſubſtituted their aſſured fauourites. Another Act of that abſolute force and fraud which they exerciſed in this dreadfull perturbation of all things, was the drawing of John Holland Duke of Exceſter out of Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, conuaying him to Pomfret-Caſtle in the North.

Hereupon the Duke of Yorke is diſplaced from the Protectorſhip, a ridiculous title to be aſſumed, where the King was aged about fiue and thirty, and had no other fault or vnfitneſſe, but that he was too good to liue among them. An. Reg. 34.

The Duke of Yorke is diſcharged of the vſurped Protectorſhip.

(67) The King hauing thus recouered his dignity and authority, but not ſufficient means to ſuppreſſe his dangers, the French take courage at our inteſtine diuiſions, and landing at Sandwich with fifteene thouſand men (part of their forces) they kill the Maior, Baliffs, and other officers of that Towne, with ſundry Gentlemen of the Country, ſpoyle all they could lay hand vpon, and among all, they rob two great veſſels laden with merchandiſe, which lay there bound for London, and departed. Another part of them, burnes Foway and certaine other townes in Deuonſhire. On the other ſide, the Scots hoſtilly entred into Northumberland, but vpon notice that the Duke of Yorke approached with a power, they returned, hauing not as yet done any great harme.

The French take Sandwich in Kent, and Fowey in Deuonſhire.

(68) Theſe indignities and loſſes might haue vnited the disjoyned affections of true Engliſh hearts, which was greatly deſired by ſuch as loued their Countrey: For which purpoſe the King, Queene, and their chiefe friends, being at Couentrie, the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke are ſent for by the Kings Letters vnder his priuy Seale, to giue their attendance, whither they come, but they (eyther warned of ſome plot contriued againſt them, or fearing it, or faining to feare) ſodainely leaue the Court, without leaue, the Duke departing to Wigmore in the Welſh marches, the Earle of Salisbury to his Caſtell of Midleham in the North-Country, and the Earle of Warwicke to Callis, whoſe bodies though thus diuided, their mindes continued moſt firmely factionated. But the King (a patterne of Chriſtian* goodneſſe) being tender ouer the generall eſtate of his Countrey, and wonderfully deſirous to reconcile differences among his ſubjects, that they might the better withſtand their imminent forreine enemies, returnes to London, there to conſult how to effect his holy wiſhes. The great Lords are perſwaded to * meete there; which they did; but yet not without ſtore of followers, for the Duke brought with him foure hundred men, the Earle of Salisbury fiue hundreth, the Earle of Warwicke ſixe hundreth: The Dukes of Exceſter and Sommerſet eight hundreth, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Egremond and Clifford fifteene hundreth. This was the faſhion of that ſwording age.

The King at Couentrie, from whence the Duke of Yorke, and the Yorkiſts, depart ſodainly.

Cambr. Eutbrey* pag. 214.

* In Ianuar. An. D. 1458. An. Reg. 36.

The Lords meet the King at London to compoſe all quarrels.

(69) In March, the King and Queene with a very royal company alight at Weſtminſter, to accompliſh (if it were poſſible) this charitable and neceſſary worke of attonement and reconciliation. Godfrey Bolein was at that time Lord Maior of London, (being the anceſtor of two renowned and vertuous Queenes of England Anne, ſecond Wife to King Henrie the eight, and Elizabeth their daughter,) through whoſe great vigilancie and prouidence, the Citie ſtood ſo well guarded, that the Kings peace was dutifully kept, notwithſtanding the great Lords of both the factions (Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians,) were with ſo great troupes of followers lodged within, and about the the ſame: for during the whole time of their abode he had *fiue thouſand Citizens in Harneſſe, himſelfe riding daily about the City and Suburbes, to ſee the publique quiet preſerued: and for the night watch there were aſſigned to three Aldermen two thouſand corſlet-men.

* Rob. Fab. Chron.

(69) During this watch, a great Councell was holden by the King and Lords, where at length by the diligent trauaile, good exhortation, and prudent aduiſe of the Archbiſhop of Canterburie, and of other learned and godly Prelates, the parties offended were induced to a communication, and afterward to a finall accord: the points whereof, conſidering they held ſo ſhort a while, (for as * one ſaith truely the diſſimuled loue-day hung but by a ſmall threed) it were friuolous to dwell in their reheatſall. The King himſelfe (a ſingular teſtimony of the opinion which all parties had of his integritie) was whole arbitrator of their differences. Certaine ſatisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of Yorke, with the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury, for the death of Edmund Duke of Sommerſet; and others ſlaine at S*t*. Albans. And the ſame Duke of Sommerſet, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Clifford, (ſlaine in that battell by the Yorkiſts) are declared for true Liegemen to the King at the day of their deathes, aſwell as the Duke of Yorke, the Earles of Warwicke and Saliſbury. So both parts ſtand juſti fide and recti in curia. Many other articles and awards were made, to ſolder and glue together their alienated hearts and affections. The rejoycement cauſed by this ſeeming peace (which on the behalfe of the Kings perſon was vndoubtedly ſincere and true) was wonderfully great among all good Engliſhmen, who flocked to the publique celebration thereof. For vpon our * Ladies day in Lent, a ſolemne proceſſion was made within the Cathedrall Church of S*t*. Paul in London, where the King (adorned with Crowne and robes of Majeſtie) went in perſon, before whom went hand in hand the Duke of Sommerſet, and the Earle of Salisburie, the Duke of Exceſter, and the Earle of Warwick, and ſo of either faction one and one, and behinde the King himſelfe, came the Queene and Duke of Yorke with great familiarity in all mens ſights. O religion, O honour, O ſinceritie, that your diuine vertue ſhould not haue contayned theſe ſpirits in the harmony of ſweet obedience; but if you could not, what alas ſhould? England muſt be more ſeuerely ſcourged, then that ſo goodly a bleſſing of publike reconciliation ſhould continue, whereby the proud tops of her Nation (offenſiue to God and Men) being taken off, the way might be opened to other names or races, which as yet were nothing thought on.

The quarrels ended by the Kings award with ſhew of common-liking.

* Martij 25.

(70) There is no reaſon to doubt, but that the Duke of Yorke, (a man of deepe retirement in himſelfe) ſecretly continued his purpoſe for the Crowne, notwithſtanding all theſe his verniſhed pretences, and did onely therefore not as then put for it, becauſe he preſumed the time was incommodious. Againe the Queene (true head and life of the contrary part) as well in regard of her ſelfe, her husband, and young ſonne, may in likelihood be thought to haue laide downe any thing, rather then the wakefulneſſe and jealouſie, which former perils, and the enemies preſent ſtrength, might worthily keepe aliue in her. The thinne aſhes therefore, which couered theſe glowing coles, were thus againe firſt vnraked and ſet to blaze.

The probable condition of things after the reconcilement.

(71) The King and many of the Lords, ſtill being at Weſtminſter, there hapned (or perhaps * was plotted) a fray betweene one of the Kings ſeruants and a follower of the Earle of Warwick, who hurt the Kings ſeruant. Hereupon his fellowes of all ſorts, (as Cookes with their ſpits, &c.) in great diſorder aſſaile the Earle himſelfe, as he was comming from the Councell, and had there ſlaine him, but that the euill fate of England and his owne, reſerued him to doe and ſuffer greater miſchiefes. The Earle hardly gets to his Barge, and reputing all things vnſure about the King, gets ouer to his place at Callis. The Yorkiſts directly charge the Queene with this, as with a plot drawne for the Earles deſtruction. Not long after this, the young Duke of Sommerſet is ſent Captaine to Callis. Warwicke will reſigne no roome, notwithſtanding the Kings commaund, alleaging he was made by Parliament: Sommerſet is rejected, with danger to his perſon. Warwicke partly maintaines himſelfe, and ſuch as ſtucke to him in that charge, with ſpoyles which he got at Sea; How lawfully it appeares not; though Warwicke is ſaid to haue beene Admirall by Patent, though now reuoked. The Ordinary Bookes haue, that he, with foureteene ſayle of men of warre, ſet vpon three Caricks of Gene or Genoa, and two of Spaine, greater then the Caricks: three of which Merchant-fleete (which how they ſhould be lawfull prize, we ſee not) he vanquiſhed after two dayes fight, with the loſſe of about an * hundreth men of his owne, and a thouſand of theirs: The booty was worth, at meane rates, ten thouſand pounds; ſuch alſo as followed the Duke of Sommerſet comming into his hands, he beheaded at Callis. Theſe were ſtrange darings in the Earle of Warwicke; whom yet the vnskilfull, and drunken multitude ſo highly praiſe: but what are theſe in regard of them which will preſently follow?

* Rob. Fabian, who alſo reports a much greater number of Merchants ſhips.

(72) The Duke of Yorke in the meane time, and Warwicke with his father, the Earle of Salisbury (the Triumuirs of England) conſult of their affaires: Salisbury is reſolued with ſword in hand to expoſtulate the danger and injury offered to his ſonne at Weſtminſter. The Queene (a Lady of incomparable magnanimity and fore-ſight) confident in this, that now King Henry, or the Duke of Yorke muſt periſh, and that one Kingdome was not wide enough for both their Families, beſtirres her ſelfe to maintaine the poſſeſſion of a Crowne, and to aduance to the ſame her owne fleſh and bloud Prince Edward, by ruining his houſe, whoſe whole building conſiſted of Lancaſtrian beneficence. She conſults, ſhe ſends, ſhe ſpeakes, ſhe giues, and ſtrengtheneth her ſelfe with friends on all ſides, chiefly in Cheſhire, cauſing her ſonne to diſtribute ſiluer Swannes (his badge or deuiſe) to all the Gentlemen of that Countie, and to many other through England. Salisbury ſets forward from his Caſtell at Middleham, with foure or fiue thouſand men. Iames Touchet Lord Audeley, encounters him vnaduiſedly vpon Blore-heath neere Muckelſtone. The fight was long and bloudy, but in the end King Henries euill-fortune gaue the better of the day to the Earle of Salisbury, where, beſides the valiant Lord Audeley himſelfe, were ſlaine not fewer then two thouſand and foure hundreth, but the chiefe loſſe fell vpon the Cheſhire-men, who ware the Princes Liuerie.

The ciuill warre begins againe.

Battell at Blore-heath, where King Henries ſide hath the worſt.

(73) The Earle of Salisbury in this ſort opened to himſelfe a way to Ludlow, where the head of their combination, Richard Duke of Yorke, buſied himſelfe to gather forces: being met, they conclude, that ſeeing the matter was now become deadly, they would deale in cloudes no longer, but fight it out to the extremity. Men are drawne out of all parts with large hopes and promiſes of ſharing in their fortunes, and the Earle of Warwicke bringing with him from Callis (which he left with his friends) that valiant Captaine Andrew Trolop, and a Band of ſtout and choyſe Souldiers, comes to the generall Rendeuou of the Yorkiſts, the Caſtell of Ludlow. The King in the meane ſpace, (and not before it was neede and time) hath aſſembled a great puiſſance of faithfull Subjects, and being * attended with the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, and other of his chiefe friends marcheth againſt his enemies. His firſt worke was, to offer them generall pardon. It is refuſed, and called by them a ſtaffe of Reede, or Glaſſe-Buckler. The ſword muſt decide the quarrels: whereupon the King commands his Standards to aduance: while he was in his March, * a letter fraught with the wonted wonted hypocriſies) is deliuered to the King. There are in it among many other inſinuations theſe alſo: Moſt Chriſtian King, right high and mighty Prince, and our moſt dread Soueraigne Lord, &c. We ſent vnto your good grace by the Prior of the (Cathedral) Church (of Worceſter) and diuers other Doctors, and among other by M. William Linwood Doctor of Diuinitie, which miniſtred vnto vs ſeuerally the bleſſed Sacrament of the body of Ieſus, whereupon we and euery of vs depoſed of our ſaid truth and dutie.

The horrible abuſe of Chriſtian Sacraments to beguile the King.

(74) Thus theſe prophane and ambitious men play with GOD, who in the end will ſeuerely be auenged on them for their impiety: but the letter made no ouerture of any courſe, vpon which they would yeeld to lay downe Armes, alleadging, they would but make their way to the King for redreſſe of abuſes, and that they were enforced to ſtand together for their owne defence, againſt ſuch great Courtiers and Fauourites, as (ſay they) intended their deſtruction; meaning indeede ſuch perſons whoſe vigilancy and manhood might protect and guard him from their practiſe and violence. The King is now in ſight, whom the Triumuirs Yorke, Warwicke, and Salisbury, being ſtrongly entrenched before Ludlow, *meane to aſſaile. Andrew Trollop (who had in the Kings pay done great ſeruice vpon the French) was acquainted with all their counſell, and finding himſelfe extreamely deceiued, (for hee thought, and ſo by the Earle of Warwicke was made to beleeue, that the preſeruation of the King was intended, and not deſtruction) abandons the Yorkiſts camp at mid-night, & with a choiſe number of truſty men preſents himſelfe and ſeruices to the King, who graciouſly receiued him and his. The truth of the Triumuirates plot, and bottome of their conſpiracies was thus made clearely knowne: The Yorkiſts vpon notice of Trollops act, deſpairing of ſucceſſe at that preſent, flie. The Duke of Yorke with the Earle of Rutland his yonger ſonne into Ireland, the Earle of March his eldeſt ſonne and heire, Warwicke and Salisbury, with much difficulty eſcape to Callis, which place (as *one ſaith probably) if Henry had in time taken from his enemies, they had without queſtion beene forthwith irrecouerably ruined.

*Polyd. Virg. li. 23.

(75) The multitude which ſerued vnder Yorke found mercy, but their Tenants were many of them executed, maimed, or generally ranſackt. The towne of Ludlow it ſelfe was ſpoyled to the bare wals, and Dutcheſſe of Yorke depriued of all her goods. What leſſe could be the effects againſt the friends of ſuch aduerſaries, vpon ſo publique an act and aduantage? The poynt is followed more ſharpely vpon the great Offenders in the next Parliament, which was holden at Couentrie: there Richard Duke of Yorke, Edward Earle of March, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Edmund Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Alice Counteſſe of Salisbury, (in whoſe right her Husband was Earle) two or three Lords, nine Knights, and certaine other, were openly of high Treaſon attainted, and their whole eſtates confiſcated.

The Duke of Yorke and others attainted of high treaſon by Parliament.

(76) Callis, a moſt important piece, being in the meane ſpace violently poſſeſt by Warwicke, the Duke of Sommerſet, the Lords Roſſe and Audley, are ſent with forces to take it; their ſucceſſe was euill, for the Duke was glad to flie, his Souldiers were robbed, by Warwicks men, of their harneſſe, the Lord Audley is taken into the Towne, and the Lord Roſſe hardly eſcaped. Letters are hereupon written into forraine parts, entreating * that no relieſe be miniſtred to the Traitors who kept Callis againſt the King, and all men are at home forbidden to tranſport any victuall or refreſhment thither. Euident it is, that the Councell of England rather wiſhed that the Town and Caſtel had beene French againe, then as it was; neyther therein erred they, for it could not be ſo miſchieuous to the maine of their cauſe, as now it was. The Duke of Sommerſet being in Guines, a neighbour-Caſtell, doth daily by his Souldiers skirmiſh with the *Caliſeans: Warwicke meditates other things. He muſt ſpeake with the Duke of Yorke, at whoſe commandement all Ireland, (where he abode) ſeemed to be readie; but is aduertiſed that the King had certaine Ships, which lay at Sandwich to tranſport ſupplies and ſuccours to the Duke of Sommerſet. He meanes not to leaue ſuch a perill behinde him vnremoued; hauing therefore eſpyed his time, hee wils his people to ſlip ouer in the night to Sandwich, which they accordingly did, tooke the Lord Riuers, and his ſon Anthony Wooduile priſoners, and brought away all the Ships, except one called Grace de Dieu: one Sir Baldwine Fulford Knight, hauing (after this) aſſumed to doe ſeruice vpon the Earle of Warwicke, and to take him, returnes empty. Warwicke ſayles now to Ireland. The King makes the Duke of Exceſter Admirall, and giues him commiſſion to apprehend the Earle of Warwicke. The Duke with a great Nauie puts forth to Sea from Sandwich. Behold the ill carriage of things: At Dertmouth many of his Souldiers, pretending want of money and victuals, forſake him. Meane-while the Earle of Warwick paſſeth by, the Duke, not daring to aſſaile him, nor hee willing to aſſaile the Duke, for that he was Admirall and of the Kings bloud. Such was the act and cunning of the Yorkiſts, to pretend reuerence vnto that which moſt of all they thirſted to ſhed. Fiue hundreth freſh ſouldiers attend at Sandwich, to be ſhipt ouer to the Duke of Sommerſet for ſafe-conducting him into England. Warwickes men ſodainely come vpon them, ſlew Montfort their Captaine, and many other, and diſarmed the reſt. Such was the diſtracted eſtate of our poore Country at this time, through the pride and reſt-leſſe ambition of one or two vnhappy men. But though nothing was more plaine then that the Duke of York ſought the crowne of England; yet nothing is truer, then that they as yet pretended nothing leſſe, for the veneration of King Henries purity of life, would haue preuailed with the people greatly to their prejudice.

The Earle of Warwickes men take the Lord Riuers and ſome of the Kings Nauy at Sandwich.

The King armes to Sea, but cannot take the Earl, who returnes from Ireland to Callis.

(77) The King failing thus to obtaine the perſon of Warwicke, or his Towne of Callis, the Yorkiſts ſend ouer certaine Articles into Kent, in which (as if they were the onely Patriots and beſt Subjects of the world) they complaine of certaine generall enormities concerning injuries done to the Church, and the ill miniſtration of juſtice, abuſe of purueyers and takers, the Kings pouerty by the corruption of his officers, and the like plauſible ſtuffe: where they ſpeake of the King, they ſequeſter him from all exception, as being of ſo noble, ſo vertuous, ſo righteous, and ſo bleſſed diſpoſition: (theſe are their words and the truth) as any Prince earthly. Where they ſpeake of their enemies, (that is, the Kings principall friends and faithfull Subjects) they name the Earle of Salisbury, the Earle of Wiltſhire, & the Lord Beaumont, which muſt euer be an honour to their memories, and put the blame (if it were blame-worthy) of ſuch attaindors which were enacted againſt the Yorkiſts at Couentrie, vpon theſe three Lords ſpecially. Where they ſpeake of themſelues and their intentions, they profeſſe all ſincerity and loyalty to King Henry, and that they only meant to come vpon their guard to ſpeake with him concerning the common-wealth, and their owne ſafeties, and that now they would attempt the ſame againe, in the name of the Land, and not to ſuffer ſuch miſchiefes to raigne vpon them. The concluſion of their cunning and painted pretences hath theſe fained holy words: Requiring you (the people) on Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to aſſiſt vs, doing alway the duty of Liegemen in our perſons to our ſaid Soueraigne Lord, to his eſtate, prerogatiue and preheminence, and to the ſurety of his moſt noble perſon, whereunto we haue euer beene, and will be as true as any of his ſubjects aliue: whereof wee call God, our Lady Saint Marie, and all the Saints in Heauen, to witneſſe, and record. But of the thing it ſelfe, (that is to Crowne the Duke of Yorke) they make not the leaſt mention: What wanted in theſe men to the height and depth of humane malice? They preuaile with the multitudes; a ſhallow-braind, but a great great and many-headed beast. The Lord Fawconbridge is sent to sound their affections, and to draw the purulent matter to an head: hee findes great forwardnesse. The Earles of March, VVarwicke, and Salisbury aduertised of all things, land in Kent. But the people onely were not deluded; for Thomas Bourchier Archbishop of Canterbury, & other graue men, beleeued they meant sooth; which that they might the rather doe, the Earle of Warwicke made open oath vpon the Crosse of Canterbury, that they had euer borne true faith and alleagiance to King Henry. A strange humor in the English, that could neither brooke bad nor benigne Princes. The King had before their comming quit the City of London, as not greatly trusting the affections which the people therof bare toward such as the Yorkish faction had made odious about him, and appoynted the Rendeuow of his forces at Northampton, where he abode. The enemy (shewing friend) aduanceth thither. It is a shame to reade that some of the great Prelates would simply be drawne to countenance such an enterprise: but their intentions were different; they hoped to reconcile enmities, the Earles to make Yorke King. Mean-while their complices labor to take the Tower of London, within which there were for King Henry these loyall Nobles. The Lord Scales, Hungerford, Vescie, Louel, De la ware, and Candal a Gascoigne, with sundry others.

The Earle of Warwicke lends his side an Oath.

(78) At Northampton things were carried thus: The King meaning there to abide his aduersaries, when it was not thought meete to admit the Earle of Warwicke to his presence, (which thing was colourably sued for to raise a ground of justification for battell) they prepare on both parts. The Earles of March and VVarwicke (with like or greater cunning, then they had desired admission to the Kings speech) let cry through the field, that no man should lay hand vpon the King, nor common people, but vpon the Lords, Knights, and Esquiers.

(79) The hoasts joyne. No stroake they gaue but seemes to wound vs also. Let vs swiftly turne our eyes from so vnnaturall slaughters. The * Lord Grey of Ruthen began the discomfiture of the Kings side, for he (let the World judge with what commendation,) hauing the poynt, did quit his place, and fled to the Earles. The Kings army is defeated, and vtterly broken. Many were slaine and drowned. Polydor and Grafton say tenne thousand: The chiefe of the Nobles who there lost their liues, were the Duke of Buckingham, Iohn Earle of Shrewsburie, (a * most hopefull young Gentleman, and in all poynts like his heroyicke Ancestors) Iohn Vicount Beaumont, Thomas Lord Egremond, and among sundry other prime men, * Sir William Lucie, who making hast to the fight, was vpon his first approach chopt downe with an Axe. The Kings Ordnance could not play, there fell so great a raine.

(80) This wofull Battell was fought vpon the * ninth of Iuly. The King (as a man borne to all calamities and miseries; though he not therefore the lesse, but the more happy through that excellent fortitude of minde, with which hee inuincibly sustayned them) comes into his enemies hands; but the Queene and the Prince, and the remains of their scattered fortunes flie into the North, there to reenforce their powers, and to * subdue (as she caused them to be proclaimed) the Kings Rebels and enemies. The Tower of London, after this misfortune, renders it selfe. The Lord Scales is wickedly murthered vpon the Thames by Wherrimen, belonging to the Earle of VVarwicke, as he intended to passe to * Sanctuary at VVestminster. The Earles when they were possessed of the King, continued their admirable hypocrisies (which God will terribly plague them for) thereby to leade the people on, and had to him these words.

* Rob. Fabian.

The main poynts in the Duke of Yorkes pedigree.

(85) Lionel the third sonne had issue Philip his daughter and heire, married to Edmund Mortimer Earle of March, who had issue Roger Earle of March, who had issue Edmund Earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Eleanor, which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without issue. Anne (the heire of that house) marrieth Richard

Richard Earle of Cambridge, the ſonne of Edmund Duke of Yorke, fifth ſonne to King Edward the third, which Earle of Cambridge had Richard commonly (ſaith the Booke,) called Duke of Yorke.

(86) Iohn of Gaunt the fourth ſonne and younger brother to Lionel, had iſſue Henry, who immediately after King Richards reſignation, vnrighteouſly (ſaith the Booke) entred vpon the ſame, for that Edmund Earle of March, ſonne of Roger Earle of March, and of Philip daughter and heire of the beforeſaid Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder brother to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter was then aliue, and that aſwell the ſaid Henry, eldeſt ſonne to Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, as his deſcendents haue hitherto holden the Crowne of England, &c. vniuſtly, for that himſelfe the ſaid Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke was the lawfull heire, being the ſonne of Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, and of Anne before ſaid.

(87) This was the effect of the Duke of Yorkes title, which for the poynts of the Pedegree was very true, though in barre thereof the friends of King Henry, (without denying any part of the premiſes, being all of them more euident then that they could be honeſtly denyed) had not a little to ſay for him: for they could among other things alledge, That Richard the ſecond reſigned vp his Crowne and Regality at large; and that none elſe making claime but Henry Duke of Lancaſter, he was thereunto by the conſent of all the three Eſtates admitted; that Richard Earle of Cambridge was for high Treaſon attainted and executed, & his Iſſue made incapable of any inheritance, that this Richard his ſon now challenging the Crowne of England, being reſtored by the meere clemency and goodneſſe of this King Henry the ſixt, had voluntarily acknowledged him for his lawfull Soueraigne, and ſworne the ſame, and that the ſaid Richard was finally for treaſon attainted, and adiudged vninheritable: they could hereunto haue added ſundry Acts of Parliament, made to eſtabliſh the right of the Lancaſtrian line, the ſucceſſion of three Kings, all Henries, that is to ſay, the fourth, fifth, and ſixth; the politick addreſſes of the firſt of thoſe Kings, the noble victories of the ſecond, & the holy life of the third; which three Kings liues contained of raigne about threeſcore yeares, in which number this was the nine and thirtieth of King Henry the ſixth, who was deſcended of the male line, and the Duke of Yorke but of a female: of which female line none had euer bin in poſſeſſion of the Crowne. Great and weighty poynts, (if any) and the rather to be conſidered, for that King Henries perſon being (in very truth) Priſoner, no act of his to eſtabliſh Yorkes title could bind in law or conſcience, and the leſſe, for that he had a wife, and by her a ſonne, who was at liberty, and ready with Armes to free his father, or hazard to deſtroy the whole Engliſh name. But they who (on Yorkes behalfe) abſtractiuely diſputed theſe higheſt queſtions, knew a rule of law, which ſaith, Iura ſanguinis nullo jure ciuili dirimi poſſunt; and the Lancaſtrians were not without their ſpeculatiue and remote conſiderations, to countenance the particulars of their cauſe. Thus wee ſee that in Monarchies (though the nobleſt forme of Regiment) where lineall ſucceſſion is the rule of inheritance, there ſometimes fall out as great and as indeterminable difficulties, as where Election deſigneth the Succeſſor: whereof the French tragedies which our Nation made among them, and now theſe in England, are without all exception, the moſt fearefull inſtances. For France had heretofore her time of affliction, but now (O deareſt England) it was thine.

Allegations for K. Henry the 6. and the Lancaſtrian title.

(88) While this weighty controuerſie was debated, a Crowne which hung for garniſhment in the middle of the roofe where the Knights and Burgeſſes of the Parliament met to conſult, and the crowne which for like cauſe ſtood vpon the higheſt Tower of Douer-Caſtell,* fell ſodainely downe, which were vulgarly conſtrued * to portend, That the raigne of King Henry was at an end, and that the Crowne ſhould be tranſferred from one royall line to another. But the Queene, her ſonne Prince Edward, and her faſt friends in the North (the ſeat of their hopes) being nothing diſcouraged at their late ill fortunes, prepare all the forces they can to recouer King Henry and the Kingdome; which thing whiles they are purſuing, the concluſion of the Parliament concerning the Crowne was, That Henry the ſixth ſhould raigne, and be King during his life, the remainder to reſt in Richard Duke of Yorke, and the lawfull heires of his body in generall tayle, King Henries heires to be excluded. The Duke in the meane time is proclaymed heire apparant, and called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Cheſter, and Protector of England. The agreement was engroſſed, ſealed, and ſworne vnto. The Queene wil haue nothing to doe in this bargaine, being ſo dangerous and prejudicious to her ſelfe, her Husband, and her ſonne; and therefore when the King (at the Duke of Yorkes inſtigation) ſent for her to repaire vnto him; ſhe relying vpon the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, and other the Kings friends, vtterly refuſeth: Henry continueth King. The Armes therefore, which ſhe taketh for his deliuerance, haue the more juſtice. The Duke of Yorke miſſing the prey he expected, leaues the King with the Duke of Norfolke, and the Earle of Warwicke at London; himſelfe with the Earles of Salisbury and Rutland, and certaine forces,* ſetteth forward to Wakefield to purſue the Queen and her ſonne, ſending direction to the Earle of March that he ſhould follow with all his power. The Caſtell of Sandall ſtandeth pleaſantly vpon a ſmall hill, in view of the faire towne of Wakefield; there the Duke of Yorke (comming thither vpon Chriſtmas-Eue) repoſeth himſelf, and expecteth the encreaſe of his numbers. The Queene aduertiſed, thinkes it wiſdome to fight before the Duke grow too ſtrong; and thereupon marcheth forward, hauing an Army of eighteene thouſand men, led by the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter, the Earles of * Deuonſhire and * Wiltſhire, the Lords Neuill, Clifford, Roſſe, and in effect all the Northerne Nobility. The hoſt (or ſo much thereof as they thought neceſſary to ſhew) preſents it ſelfe before Sandall, to prouoke and dare the Duke to battell. His bloud impatient of theſe braues, and ignorant perhaps, that the enemy had ſo great a multitude, will needes fight, though the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir Dauid Hall (an ancient ſeruant of his, and a great Souldier) gaue him aduiſe to ſtay, till his ſonne (the Earle of March) approached with ſuch Welſhmen and Marchers, as he had in great numbers aſſembled. But God would forbeare him no longer, but like a ſeuere Maſter meanes to take a preſent account: at which he found whether all the kingdomes of the earth are worth the leaſt ſinne, much leſſe a wilfull perjurie.

(89) The Queene therefore addeth ſtratageme and wit to her force, to the entent he might not eſcape her hands; whereupon the Earle of Wiltſhire vpon one ſide of the Hill, and the Lord Clifford vpon the other, lye in ambuſh to thruſt betweene him and the Caſtell; the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceter, ſtand embattelled in the open field. The battels which ſtood in Front, joyne furiouſly, when ſodainely the Duke of Yorke ſees himſelfe incloſed, and although he expreſſed great manhood, yet within one halfe houre, his whole Armie was diſcomfited, himſelfe and diuers his deare friends beaten downe and ſlaine. There lay dead about him the Lord Harington, Sir Thomas Neuil, ſonne to the Earle of Salisbury, Sir Dauid Hal, with ſundry Knights and others, about two thouſand & two hundred; among which were the heires of many Southern gentlemen of great account, whoſe * bloud was ſhortly after reuenged. (90) That mercilesse proposition was common (as the euent will shew) to eyther faction. The Duke of Yorkes head, crowned with paper, is presented to the Queene. Cruell joy is seldome fortunate. Cæsar wept ouer Pompeis head, but the Queene (ignorant how manifold causes of teares were reserued for her owne share) makes her selfe merry with that gastly and bloudy spectacle. The Earle of Salisbury, after wounds receiued, being in this battel taken prisoner, is conueighed to Pomfret Castle; from whence the common people (who loued him not) * violently haled him, and cut off his head; which perhaps was not done without the good liking of others. The Dukes head, together with his, were fixed on poles, and set vpon a gate of Yorke, and with them, (if Grafton say true) the heades of all the other prisoners which had beene conducted to Pomfret.

(91) This battell (called of VVakefield) was fought vpon the last day of December; of whose weathers complexion if their courages had participated, mischiefe might haue made her stop here, which now is in her swiftest course.

An. D. 1461. An. Reg. 39. The Earle of March pursues his fathers designes.

(92) For the Earle of March, sonne, and heire to this late valiant Duke of Yorke, hearing of this tragicall aduenture, giues not ouer: but, hauing gathered an army of about twenty thousand to march against the Queene, he findes employment neerer hand: being certified, that Iasper Teder Earle of Pembrooke, (half-brother to King Henry) and Iames Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltshire, had with them a great force of Welsh and Irish to take him. The youthfull and valiant Earle of March, whose amiable presence and carriage made him gratious with the people, (and the rather for that he had the generall good word of * women,) meanes to try his fortune against the said Earles. He sodainely therefore turnes backe from Shrewsbury, and at a place called Mortimers-Crosse neere Ludlow, where the enemy abode, he sets vpon them. It was Candlemas-day in the morning, at which time there appeared, (as some write) three Sunnes, which sodainely joyned in one. This luckie prognosticon, and ominous Meteor, exceedingly fired the Earle of March, and was (some say) the reason, why he vsed for his Badge, or royall deuise, the Sunne in his full brightnesse. The Battels maintaine their fight with great fury; but, in the end, the Earle of March obtaines the victory, killing of his enemies three thousand, and eight hundreth men; the Earles saued themselues by flight. The sonne of honour and fortune did thus begin to shine, through Clouds of bloud and miserie, vpon Edward, whom shortly we are to behold King of England. There were taken * Sir Owen Teder (father to Iasper Earle of Pembrooke,) who was beheaded by Edwards commandement, as also Sir Iohn Skudamor Knight with his two sonnes, and other.

(93) The Queene on the other side (hauing ordered her affaires in the North, setled the estate thereof, and refreshed her people,) within a while after drawes neere with her Northern army to S*t*. Albans. There came before them an euill fame of their behauiour to London, whose wealth lookt pale knowing it selfe in danger; for the Northern army, (in which were Scots, Welsh, and Irish as well as English,) made bold by the way with what they liked, making small distinction of sacred or prophane, after they were once past the riuer of Trent, Captain Andrew Trollop being their Coronell. But the Lords of her faction being ready to attempt on her behalfe, assaile the Kings forces within the towne, and after some sharpe affronts, breake through, and driue their aduersaries out with much bloud-shed, till they fell vpon a squadron or battalion of the Kings, wherein there were about foure or fiue thousand men, which made good their ground for a while with great courage, but in the end the Queenes side clearely wanne the day. There perished in this conflict about two thousand.

The Lord Bonuile and Sir Thomas * Kiriel of Kent being taken in the fight, were beheaded, but all the other great men escape. The common people of London doe notwithstanding stand wholly for the beautifull Earle of March, and stand the more confidently, because they had sure intelligence, that he had vanquished the Earle of Pembrooke in the Marches of Wales, and that the Earle of Warwicke, escaping from S. Albans, had met with the Earle of March neere Cotswold, and that both with joynt-forces were marching toward London. These newes made the King and Queene retire into the North, and leaue that City and the Southerne Countreyes to their Enemie, till they might recouer a fairer opportunitie, or more sufficiencies. Edward vpon notice of the Kings departure, entreth London, and giues period to Henries raigne, which is accounted to take end after he had successiuely ruled this Land the space of thirtie eight yeares, sixe moneths, and foure dayes.

(94) Margaret the wife of King Henrie, was the daughter of Reynate King of Ierusalem, Sicilie, and Arragon, Duke of Andegauia, Loraine, Barre, and Calabria, Earle of Prouince, Cenomania, and Guize. She with great pomp was conueyed to South-hampton, and thence to the Abbey of Tichfield, where the yeare of Grace 1445. and twenty two of Aprill, she was solemnely married to King Henry; and honourably attended by the greatest Estates of the Land, was crowned at VVestminster the thirtieth of May following. She was exceedingly beautified in face, and of goodly feature, of a great wit, and deepe pollicie, but of stomack farre aboue her sexe, as in the managing of those troublesome times did too well appeare. She was his Wife twenty sixe yeares, and twenty nine daies: and (after her Husbands depulsion from his regall Throne) her forces being vanquished at the battell of Tewskbury, in a poore Religious House, whether shee had fled for the safetie of her life, was taken prisoner, and so carried Captiue to London, where she remained in durance, till Duke Reynate her father did purchase her liberty with great summes of money, vnto whom she returned, and lastly died in her natiue Countrie.

CHAPTER XVII.

EDward, whose birth was at Roan in Normandy, and bearing the title of March in England, hauing wonne the battell at Mortimers Crosse, (though the Lords his Confederates had lost that of Saint Albans) from Ludlow hasted towards London, and on his way was seconded by Richard Neuill, the stout Earle of Warwicke, to the great encrease of his number and power, which so terrified Queene Margaret, now ready to possesse the South, that with her Husband and Sonne, in a perplexed feare, she returned againe into the North; vpon which aduantage Edward now Duke of Yorke presently played. For London vn-resolued whether Prince to obey (the one very powerfull, and the other in possession) daily consulted for their safest estate; when on the suddaine Edward with Warwicke entred their Gates, whose warlike Visages so daunted the aduerse affected, that they began with the first to make him way to the Throne, and the Noblemen likewise made him offers of their seruice, to establish his claime, neither were the Clergy to learne the obseruance of time, or to sway with the man vpon whom the World smiled. All these set in Counsell to conferre of the State, Duke Edward made knowne his title to the Crowne, and in well-set termes declared, how the body of the whole Parliament formerly had thereunto consented, and Henry himselfe subscribed with his owne hand; whose title, though now carried through three descents; yet what right Lancaster had, they all knew, and how insufficient this last man was for rule, France to their dishonour did witnesse, where all was lost through his neglect, whose simplicitie euer minded more his priuate deuotions, deuotions, then the potent managing of a Soueraignes command.

(2) Theſe things vrged (and moſt of them true) their voices went current, that Edward was the vndoubted King, whereunto the Londoners the ſooner yeelded, for that his dreaded Northerne Army was then encamped in Saint Iohns field: neither was any reſeruation made (as before) of Henries naturall life, but he is now abſolutely neglected, as vnworthy of his Crowne, how acceptable ſoeuer he had raigned till then, whoſe following miſeries were not ſo much lamented, as his conſtant patience was admired in vndergoing the ſame. Edward thus mounted, before his foote had well touched the firſt ſtep, was vpon Sunday the ſecond of March, among his Northerne Souldiers proclaimed King; William Lord Fauconbridge Earle of Kent declaring his claime, and diſabling King Henry of ſtile or Gouernement, whoſe weake head (as he alledged) had ouer-long blemiſhed the Engliſh Crowne.

(3) Vpon the next day, with all pompe he was conueied to Weſtminſter, and ſet vpon the Kings ſeat in the Hall, where holding the Scepter of Saint Edward in his hand, the voice of the people was againe demanded, and againe granted; ſuch was the hap of vnfortunate Henry, and condition of the multitude euer to diſlike the preſent, and to affect the new: but no interim left to diſſwade or attempt, the next day his ſtile and title was againe proclaimed by the name of King Edward the fourth, being the fourth of March, and * about the 20. yeare of his age.

(4) Theſe ſodaine alterations made the richer ſort ſomewhat fearefull, eſpecially, thoſe whoſe hart ſtood firme for King Henry, (who was now in the North new muſtering of men) and among thoſe, London afforded many, as King Edwards jealouſie ſuſpected, whereof one Walker a ſubſtantiall Citizen and Grocer was a ſufficient proofe, who for wordes ſpoken concerning his owne ſonne, that hee would make him heire of the Crowne, (meaning his houſe hauing that Signe) was the eight day of this Kings raigne apprehended, and beheaded in Smithfield. And albeit his words intended no treaſon, (the Grocer not once dreaming to touch King Edwards title) yet the time being when the Crowne lay at ſtake, the tenture of the Law made them his death. This rough beginning moued many to doubt, that they had wronged themſelues in wronging King Henry, which opinion was more confirmed in that hee retained * a great ſumme of money borrowed of the Staplers-Merchants, and diſburſed in his affaires, whoſe reſtitution he vtterly denied with an auſtere commandement to ſurceaſe the demaund. But hearing how Henry was beloued in the North, and what followers were gathered to recouer him the Crown, vpon the twelfth of March with a complete Army hee ſets forth of London, accompanied with his brethren, and many other Nobles: with whom marching towards Pomfreit, he there appoynts the Lord Fitzwater to keepe the paſſage of Ferribrig, omitting no directions of a worthie commander.

The valiant Lord Fauconbridge fearing leſt this beginning would giue an edge to the ſequell, got ouer the Riuer at Caſtleford, three miles from the Bridge, meaning to incloſe the takers vpon their backes, which Clifford perceiuing, ſought to auoyde, and whether for haſte, heate, or paine, put off the gorget he wore, when ſodainely an arrow without an head, ſhot from the Bow of ſome layde in ambuſh, pierced through his throat, and ſtucke in his necke, which ſet a period vnto his life.

The Northerne men feeling the arrowes, but not ſeeing the Archers, made haſte to acquite them with the like, and ſhot their whole ſheaues of arrowes without intermiſſion, but ſhort of the marke by threeſcore yards at the leaſt; which ſtorme being paſt, and all their ſtore ſpent, the worthy Fauconbridge aduanced forward, and within reach of his Archers ſore galled the enemie, making a double aduantage of what they had done: for their owne quiuers being full, when the others were empty, they gathered vp and ſhot theirs, againſt their owne ſhooters, yet left ſome of them ſticking to gall the legs of their purſuers: by which only ſtratagem, as was conſtantly auerred, the battell and day was loſt and wonne.

Lady Margaret of Scotland promiſed in mariage vnto Prince Edward.

indeed the better warrier) passed thence into France, where, of King Lewis and her father Renate she obtained more men then her coffers were able to relieue with pay; the bane of all courage in aduentures of warre.

An. D. 1461. King Edward crowned.

(11) Victorious Edward, after those his prosperours successes in the North, in triumph returned to London, and the eight & twentieth of Iune with great solemnity was crowned at Westminster, where in S. Peters Church, the next day it was againe most solemnly set on his head, and the third day so crowned he came to Saint Paules in London, and therein was censed with great applause of the People. In Nouember following a Parliament began, wherein K. Henry, Queene Margaret, and Prince Edward their Sonne, were disherited of their right to the Crowne; the Dukes of Excester and Sommerset, and the Earle of Deuonshire, with an hundred and forty moe, were attainted also, and disherited; so fortune dallieth in setting the Dice of her fauours, or frownes.

King Henry and Prince Edward disherited by Parliament.

An. D. 1462. Queene Margaret returned into Scotland.

(12) Queene Margaret stored with men, but in want of money, with her French powers made into Scotland; whose comming was most welcome to the two Kings there, and thence, with great shew of enterprize, hoised her sailes for England, but hauing touched the bay of Tinmouth, (whether vpon better aduise, or feared with their owne shadowes,) she with her French put backe to the Sea, where such a sore tempest tooke them, as had not Queene Margaret in a small Caruell got vnto Barwicke, she had not liued to vexe the new King, nor seene the vnfortunate losse of her Husband, her Sonne, and Realme, nor the miserable calamities of her owne olde age. Her French, by Bastard Ogle, were beate into Holy Iland, many slaine, and foure hundred of them put to their ransomes.

Bastard Ogle ouercommeth the French.

An. D. 1463.

(13) This fainting French enterprize, though it dulled the edge of some spirits, yet did it nothing daunt the courage of the Queene, her better hopes being fixed vpon the Scots valour; so, (leauing Prince Edward for safety in Barwicke,) with her Husband and Scots shee entred Northumberland, tooke the Castle of Bamburgh, and so passed forward vnto the Bishopricke, their forces daily increasing, through the confluence of such English as fauoured King Henrie.

Queene Margaret entreth Northumberland in hostile manner.

(14) King Edward hearing these stirres in the North, made his preparation both by Sea and Land, and with his Brethren, and Nobles, came to Yorke, from whence he sent Iohn Neuill Lord Montacute, with a power of men, as somewhat mistrusting the loialties of the Northumbrians, who passing forward, vpon Hegely-Moore was sodainely encountred by the Lords Hungerford and Roos, with-whom was Sir Ralph Piercy, a most valiant Knight; but Montacute, accompanied with such as would neither looke backe, nor stand gazing on, abode the encounter, and at the first push put backe the two Lords, and finally slew the said Piercy, who no waies would depart out of the field; but in dying said, I haue saued the birde in my breast, meaning his oath made to King Henrie.

(15) Lord Montacutes Sunne thus mounting in the Horizon, cast forth the rayes of his rising fame, which as he well hoped would higher ascend. And therefore learning by espials, that Henries hoast lay incamped vpon a plaine called Liuels, neere vnto Hexham, by the Water Dowill, he hasted thither, & so valiantly assaulted their Campe, as after great slaughter, in chase were taken Lord Henry D. of Sommerset, the Lords, Roos, Mollins, and Hungerford, all which were beheaded, and Sir Ralph Gray, who first solemnly disgraded, his guilt spurres cut from his heeles by the Master-Cooke, his Sword broken ouer his head, his Coat-armour rent, another reuersed put on by the King at Armes, was so led to his execution. King Henry himselfe got away (as Stow saith) into Lancashire, where, with some few hee liued full hardly in Caues, and vnknowne, more then a yeare, but (saith Grafton) he fled into Scotland, which is more likely.

(16) Edward thus cleared of the Cloud-threatning storme, thought best ere others did light, to prouide for himselfe, and therefore he raised Bulwarkes, built new Fortresses in places of danger, put forth his espials vpon the Marches of Scotland, and commanded that none should keepe Henrie or Margaret in secret, whose sight, he feared, would draw the affections of many, which otherwise stood in case of obedience. But ouer-borne Henry (whether past all feare, or inforced by destinie) in disguised apparrell past into England, where he was soone apprehended by one Cantlow; but Stow saith, by Thomas Talbot in Cletherwood besides Bungerley Hippingstones in Lancashire, being betrayed in Waddington Hall as he sate at dinner, and thence brought to London with his legs bound to the stirrups, arrested by Warwicke, his guilt spurres taken off, and committed Prisoner to the Tower of London.

(17) The Lyon thus pent, his pawes cut or pared, and Queene Margaret in France with her father Renate; King Edward now quiet, set his minde vpon Gouernement for the good of his Realme. In his Court of Kings Bench he vsed to sit in person certaine daies together, to see how his lawes proceeded with justice; ordayned penall Statutes against excessiue pride in Apparrell, especially against long picked shooes then vsually worne, which grew to such an extreame, that the pikes in the Toes were turned vpward, and with siluer chaines, or silke laces tied to the knee. But among many good prouisions, one proued very bad, as the sequell shews; for concluding a league with King Henry of Castile, and Iohn King of Arragon, he granted a license to transport certaine numbers of Coteswold Sheepe, which are since growne to such an exceeding increase, as the Clothes made of their Woolles is a great hindrance to our Marchants, which aduenture in the Leuant Seas.

(18) His next care was to finde a fit Queene, both for the hope of Issue to succeede, and for alliance and power to assist (if need were) against Henries claime. First therefore minding to send into Scotland, to desire in marriage the Ladie Margaret, (sister to King Iames the third) thereby to frustrate Henries further hope; was made to beleiue that the said Ladie was, by reason of sickenesse, not capable of conception, which altogether declined his affection from that way. Next, as some say, a motion was made for Lady Elizabeth, sister and heire apparant vnto Henry King of Castile, as a match most conuenient, considering King Edward had thereunto a Claime, whose great Grandmother was one of the heires of Castile, being the daughter of Don Peter the King, besides which high match, and combination of alliances, a hope was conceyued that the Dutchies of Guien and Aquitaine, might be recouered by the assistance of these Castilians, without great charge or trauell to the English. But the tender spring of the one, and the lusty growth of the other, would not be grafted into one stocke to beare fruit, shee little aboue sixe, and hee about twenty three, farre vnfit to abstaine till shee could giue him content.

(19) A third Princesse was assaid, against whom could be no exceptions, for birth, beautie, yeares, or Alliance, which was Lady Bona, daughter of Lewis Duke of Sauoy, and sister to Carlot the French Queen, at that time residing in the French Court. This double string was thought most fit for King Edwards bow; for the Duke more remote, might strengthen him abroad, and the French neerer home would be made a good neighbour, hauing the Night-bird still singing in his eare: especially to cast a rubbe in King Henries way, whose hopes lay most vpon Lewis, for that Renate of Anjou, stiling himselfe king of Naples, Sicil, and Ierusalem, had more honour by that verball stile, then rents or reuenues to maintaine his estate, or any subjection acknowledged by them; so as if King Lewis were Edwards, Anjou was not to be feared

This match being most approued in counsell, none was held more fit to solicite the businesse then Lord Richard Neuill the great Earle of Warwicke, a man esteemed for power a Demy-King, and for magnificence and hospitality matchlesse: in whose house at London (as some haue verified) sixe Oxen were spent euery day, and most Tauernes in the City full of his meat.

Warwicke wooing and entertainements in France.

(20) Warwicke in great state arriued at Tours, and his message knowne, was accordingly entertained in the French Court, where he wrought the Queene her selfe to be the chiefest Agent; who drew on her sister Bona, with recommending the state and stile of a magnificent Queene (a sound very tunable in a Ladies eare,) and her Husband Lewis, with assurance of a potent and wise Allie, a pleasing theame to soft-natured-Princes, as the French King was. And indeed to all she vndertooke all good contentments; so as on that side all things were cleare, and Warwicke dismissed with Courtly French complements, the Earle Damp-martin was to passe into England for the finall confirmation.

K. Edwards last & sodaine choise of his wife.

(21) But whilest Warwicke had beene industriously wooing in France, King Edwards affection in England was working another way; for being on hunting in the Forrest of Wychwood beside Stony-Stratford, hee there found other game, that made game in his eye, which was the Lady Elizabeth Gray attending the Dutchesse of Bedford her mother, who then soiourned at his Mannour of Grafton, whither hee repaired for his recreation. She had beene attendant vpon Queene Margaret the Wife of King Henry the sixt, and had beene married vnto Iohn Gray Esquier, knighted and slaine at the battell of S. Albans, vpon King Henries part, who now was a suiter vnto the King, for some thing taken away in the extremity of that time, to be restored towards the maintenance of her estate. But howsoeuer her suit pierced his eare, her sweetly composed feature strangely affected his heart; more formall she was, and louely in countenance, then either tall, or exceedingly faire; yet both sufficient to meete in one person, of an excellent witte, a sober demeanour, a modest looke, a feminine smile, and her speech vttered in such a naturall eloquence as her answeres euer set on edge King Edwards desires, which howsoeuer distastefull to the appetite of his wanton bed, (affirming with blushes, that as shee accounted her selfe most vnworthy of the name of his Queene, so she held her selfe of more worth, and her chast honour dearer then to be his Concubine) yet held they him in chase till she had taken him in the snares of her loue.

(22) Their many meetings and louers complements, made the olde Dutchesse of Yorke (the Kings Mother) much to suspect it would bee a match; to hinder which, with a Parents authority she entred discourse, alleadging it honourable, safe, and of much profite to linke with some great Princesse in forraigne Lands, both for the increase of possessions abroad, and (as the case stood) to bee assisted at home: that Warwicke had gone so farre in his suite in France, as if in himselfe now were the stay, she feared their displeasures would not be staied. To marry his Subiect shee held it vnprincely, especially one without reuenewes, alliance, or riches, no other thing mouing, but a wanton dotage on the person; and although that in Lady Elizabeth nothing was to be misliked, yet was there nothing so excellent, but the same was incorporated in farre greater Ladies, more meete as she thought of a Queenely estate. A Virgin (quoth she) is most fit for a sacred Prince his side, whose head is annoynted with holy Oyle, and whose Maiesty is outwardly more sublime then the Leuiticall Priests: yet were they forbidden to make widdowes their wiues, lest the holy callings should be defiled with the staine of Bigamy.

The counsell and conference of the olde Dutchesse of Yorke with her Sonne K. Edward.

How and vnto whom it was expedient for a King to marry.

(23) When his Mother had said, and expected his answere, the King who had taken counsell of his owne desires, and knew himselfe to bee out of his mothers rule, partly in earnest, and partly in pleasance, made her this reply: That marriage being a spirituall type, ought rather to be conioyned where God had framed the parties to consent (as this of his was) then in regard of any temporall respect whatsoeuer. That his choise was pleasing to himselfe, and would be to his Subiects he certainly knew, whose amity before all other Nations hee most preferred and desired; neither could he giue them better occasion of loue then in this, that being their Soueraigne, hee disdained not to marry into their Tribes; and so likewise for his Issue, there could not any Prince be better beloued then hee that was their naturall Prince so borne of both Parents. That if forraine alliances were so needfull, hee had many of his kin, to contract them, and that with content of all parties: but for himselfe, to marry for possessions, or to please others with displeasing his own affections, hee saw it no wisedome, hauing already sufficient of the one; and the other offended, euen sweet pleasure would seeme sowre pils; especially, the choise that is made by another mans eye. That there are many comparable to her, said hee, I make no question, and am the more glad, let them haue them that like them, I will not repine, neither I hope will any abridge me of that which I allow vnto others: the Prouerbe is (Mother) that marriage goes by Destiny, but to be wiued against a mans own liking, is an earthly Purgatory: And therefore my Cosen Warwicke I am sure, neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in choise of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye, then by mine owne; as though I were a Ward, that were bound to marry by the appoyntment of a Guardian: I would not be a King with that condition, to forbeare mine owne liberty, in choyse of mine owne marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in forraine land, it proues oftner the occasion of more trouble then profite; and we haue already title by that meanes, to so much, as sufficeth to get, and keepe well, in one mans dayes. That she is a widdow, and hath already children, by Gods blessed Lady I am a Bachelour, and haue some too, and so each of vs hath a proofe, that neither of vs is like to be barren. And therefore (Madam) I pray you be content, I trust in God she shall bring a young Prince, that sha'll play on your lap, to your great pleasure, and your selfe shall blesse the wombe that bare such a babe: and as for your obiection of Bigamy, let the Bishop hardly lay it in my way, when I come to take Orders; for I vnderstand it is forbidden a Priest, but I neuer wist that it was forbidden a Prince.

K. Edwards reason for his owne free choise.

His Mothers deuise to crosse his purpose of marriage.

(24) The Dutchesse seeing the King so set on his owne choyse, that she could not pull him backe, tooke it in such disdaine, that vnder pretext of her duty to Godward, she deuised to frustrate the match, and rather gaue furtherance, that Lady Elizabeth Lucy should be his Queene, whom not long before hee had with wanton dalliances enticed to his bed: for which act, vnder pretence of a contract with her, whose husband he was before God, (as shee alleadged) his Mother openly obiected against this his intended marriage, in the discharge (forsooth) of her owne conscience, which was the cause of such an obstacle, as either the Bishops durst not, or the King, proceed to the solemnization of this Wedding, till the same were clearely purged, & the truth openly testified: whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for; which Lady, albeit she was instigated by the Kings Mother, and others, to auerre the same, yet when she was solemnely sworne to speake truth, she confessed that they were neuer assured indeede, howbeit shee affirmed his Grace spake so louing words vnto her, as she verily hoped he would haue married her, and that if it had not beene for such kinde words, she would neuer haue shewed such kindnesse vnto him. This poynt cleared, and no impediment resting, the Lady Lucy instigated to claime marriage of K. Edward.

King

K. Edward married Lady Elizabeth Grey.

King tooke to wife this later beloued Lady, Elizabeth Grey, who had beene formerly married vnto his enemy, and many times prayed full heartily for his losse, in which God loued her better then to grant her her boone, reseruing greater honour for her selfe and her posterity.

The descent and parentage of the Lady Elizabeth Grey.

(25) She was honourably descended, especially by the surer side, whose Mother was Iaquelin, daughter to Peter of Luxemburge Earle of S. Paul, and Dutchesse to Iohn Duke of Bedford, Regent of France; after whose death she married Sir Richard Wooduile Knight, and among others bare vnto him this Elizabeth, Englands faire Queene, who being priuately married at the Mannour of Grafton, was afterwards crowned Queene at Westminster with all due celebrations, vpon the sixe and twentieth of May, Anno, 1465. Her Father then by this new made sonne in law, and Soueraigne Lord, was created Lord Riuers, and made high Constable of England, her Brother Lord Anthony, married to the sole heire of the Lord Scales, and her Sonne Thomas Grey, borne to her first Husband, was created Marquesse Dorset, and married to the heire of the Lord Bonuile.

The Queenes kinred highly preferred.

Earle Warwicke sore offended against king Edward.

(26) But when Warwicke had knowledge the wanton King had got a new Wife, and his courting of Lady Bona, to be but a ball to make Edwards play; hee stormed not a little, whose credite hee tooke to be crackt in the French Court, and himselfe rather thought to haue dallyed in this motion, then to deale by commission from his King, for which cause hee conceiued so inward an indignation, that his affection was withdrawne from King Edward, and thenceforth ranne vpon Henrie, retained in prison, to which end hee temporized with the present King, applauded the Queene, and bare countenance in Court with no discontented shew: The King as wary as Warwicke was, cast no eye of dislike, or of any suspition, gaue him countenance in Court, and in familiar conference heard him before others; yet lest the stem of his greatnesse should ouertop his Crown, and his Brethren, the spreading branches, shadow his designes, hee tooke the Chancellorshippe from George Neuill, the one of them, then Bishop of Excester, afterward Archbishop of Yorke, and from the other Iohn Neuill Baron Montacute, the Earledome of Northumberland, bestowing the same (at the suite of the Northumbrians, set on by himselfe) vpon Henry Piercy, whose father was slaine at Towton, and himselfe at that present fled into Scotland for safety. Whereupon Montacute was remoued, and to auoide suspition was created Marquesse, a greater name, but farre lesse in power. And to haue a stake in store howsoeuer the Dice chanced to turne, hee sought to ioyne friendship with forraine Princes, hauing offended France for the refusing of his Queenes sister: so as he sought, and obtained the amity of Henry King of Castile, and of Iohn King of Arragon, and tooke a truce with his neighbour the Scotish King for fifteene yeares following.

(27) But these confederates for the more part too farre to be called for by whistle, fortune beyond expectation set him another euen at his elbow, which was Philip Duke of Burgundy, Prince of Flanders, Brabant, and Zealand, whose onely sonne legitimate, (Charles Earle of Charoloys a widdower, and without any Sonne) he sought to conioyne to King Edwards faire Sister, not so much for any loue hee bare to the House of Yorke, himselfe being a Lancastrian by his Mothers side, as to bandy against Lewis King of France, whom he had lately ouercome in a battell at Montleherry, and as then stoode vpon his defence, as he was sure King Edward did. This motion King Edward and his Councell well-liked, only Warwicke withstoode it, in fauour of the French: but the Lady Margaret sent ouer according to her estate, and Warwicke left fuming with a discontented minde, after some complements of mirth with his brethren the Archbishoppe, and Montacute, at his Towne of Warwicke, brast forth into warlike consultations for the deposing of Edward, & restauration of Henrie, whose wrongs (as he alleadged) did crye for right at their hands. The Bishoppe lightly consented to side for King Henry; but the Marquesse would hardly bee drawne from King Edward, which Warwicke perceiuing, layd his lime-twigges yet another way.

Phil. Com. l. 3. c. 4.

(28) For being a man of a deepe reach and wit, hee well saw that George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, bare not the best liking to the sway of the times: him therefore hee sought to allure to his fist, which once mand, Edward should loose the best Faulcon for his game; him therefore by Problemes hee meant first to proue, and according to their digest, purposed to proceed. So falling in familiar conference with Clarence, beganne to complaine of some vnkindnes in the King, both in breach of some promises, and staine of his honour in the French Court. The Duke as discontented as Warwicke, interrupted his tale before it was told: Why my Lord (quoth Clarence) do you looke that a Leopard should haue no spots in his skinne, or a Camelion no colours but one? in faith you are deceiued, and loose but your labour to wash the naturall Blackamore? for will you haue him kinde that is by nature vnkinde, and to be respected of him that respects not his owne bloud: or thinke you (a Cosen and Allie) to be raised by him, that seeth (if not seeketh) his owne Brethrens fals? For the heire of the Lord Scales (you see) hee hath married to his Wiues brother, the heire of the Lord Bonuile and Harington to his wiues sonne, and affianced the heire of the Lord Hungerford to the Lord Hastings, marriages indeed more meete for his two brethren and kinne, then for such new fondlings as he hath bestowed them vpon. But by my George I sweare, if my Brother of Glocester would ioyne with mee, wee would make him know that we are all three one mans Sonnes, and of one and the same Mother.

Earle Warwicke ploteeth king Edwards deposition.

Warwicke draweth Clarence into action against the king his brother.

(29) Earle VVarwicke hauing that which he greedily sought after, seconded the resolution with his owne assistance, imparting now boldly what confederates he had made, and to ioyne more faithfully in this his designe, he proffered Clarence his eldest daughter Lady Isabel in marriage, faire and well qualified, with the one halfe of his Wiues inheritance, she being sole heire vnto Henry Beauchampe Earle of VVarwicke her brother, and nothing inferiour to any of those whom Edward had bestowed vpon others, which no sooner was spoken, but was as presently embraced, and the plot conferred how to proceede, which was concluded, forth-with to saile vnto Callis, (whereof the Earle was Captaine, and where the Virgine Lady lay) as well to confirme the contract betwixt them, as to be absent when the commotion should begin, as the safer from suspition, and the surer to strike when the Ball came to hand, to stirre which, the Archbishop and Montacute were appointed for the North.

Warwicke and Clarence make affinity.

An. D. 1469.

The occasion pickt to make Malecontents.

(30) The occasion pickt to make Malecontents, was the abuse of Charity vnto an Hospitall dedicated to Saint Leonard in the Citie of Yorke, whose reueneue stood most vpon corne, yearely received from Farmers in the Country, as an Oblation of their first graine. This, the factious made their onely ground, vnder a holy pretext (forsooth) that the poore were defrauded, and the Master and Priests onely fed and waxen fat. To redresse which, one Robert Hulderme entred in action, and with fifteene thousand strong enterprised for Yorke, in which City the Lord Marquesse Montacute was President for King Edward, who with a small number, but well chosen, issued out against the enemy, put them backe, and stroke off the head of their Captaine before the gates of Yorke: but whether he did it in policie to grow more in trust with the King, or else of duety of obliege, not moulded throughly to the commotion, is vncertaine. But certaine it is, the rebels were nothing daunted at Huldernes death, but rather made the more resolute to continue what they had begunne.

(31) To which end they chooſe them two Chieftaines, of greater account, and eminent calling, which were Henrie, Sonne and heire to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Henry Neuill, Sonne and heire to the Lord Latimer, the one of them being Nephew, and the other Coſen-germane vnto the Earle of Warwicke; theſe but young, and not altogether experienced in Armes, chooſe for their Tutor Sir Iohn Conyers a Knight of ſuch courage, skill and valiantneſſe, as in the North-parts few were his like: who meaning to ſtrike at the head, determined to march forthwith to London, proclaiming in his way, that Edward was neither a iuſt Prince vnto God, nor a profitable King vnto the Common-weale.

Two Captaines made by the rebels.

Sir Iohn Conyers choſen generall of the rebels.

(32) King Edward hearing of theſe Northerne proceedings, and that his Brother and Warwicke were preparing againſt him, ſent for the Lord Herbert, whom he had created Earle of Pembrooke, to be his Generall in the North (who partly to deſerue the Kings liberality in aduancing him to ſuch honour, and partly in emulation he bare toward Warwicke, being the ſole obſtacle (as he tooke it) why he obtained not the Wardſhip of the Lord Bonuils daughter and heire for his eldeſt ſonne) did not a little reioyce of that his imployment. And therefore accompanied with Sir Richard Herbert his Brother, and eighteene thouſand well-furniſhed Welſhmen, marched towards the enemy, and after him was ſent Humfrey Lord Stafford with ſixe thouſand Archers to ſecond him in his warres. Theſe Lords meeting together, had notice by eſpials that the Northern made forwards towards Northampton: to intercept whom, the Lord Stafford lately made Earle of Deuonſhire was imployed, & Sir Richard Herbert, who with two thouſand horſe layd themſelues couertly by the ſide of a wood, and ſodainely ſet vpon the rereward, the reſt hauing paſſed: but the Northerne very nimbly turned about, and bad the Welſhmen ſuch welcome as few of them returned to tell of their entertainement.

The Lord Herbert Earle of Pembrooke made Lord generall.

Diſcontents betwixt Pembrooke and Warwicke.

The Lord Stafford repulſed.

(33) The King vnderſtanding of this hard beginning, muſtred his ſubiects on euery ſide, intending to cope with the Northerne himſelfe. And Earle Warwicke as forward to forward his fortunes, gathered his friends, with purpoſe to encounter with Pembrooke and his Welſh. But before any ſupplies came to either of both; it chanced the Armies to meete at vnawares, vpon a faire plaine called Danesmore neere to the Towne Hedgecot, three miles from Banbury, and preſently fell to a bickering, wherin Sir Henry Neuill Knight, ſonne of the Lord Latimer, vpon a luſty courage, venturing ſomewhat too farre, was taken priſoner, and notwithſtanding hee yeelded himſelfe to his Takers, was cruelly ſlaine, which vnmartiall act reſted not long vnrepaied with the loſſe of moſt of the Welſh the next day. For the field withdrawn, the L. Stafford repaired to Banbury, and there tooke his lodging, where his affections were much enamoured vpon a faire Damſell in the Inne. But the Earle of Pembrooke comming to the ſame Towne, tooke into the ſame Inne, and commanded the Lord Stafford to prouide him elſewhere, contrary to their agreements made before, whereat Stafford was diſpleaſed, and departing thence with his whole Band, left the Earle naked of men in the Towne, and diſabled the field of the Archers, whereby the day was loſt vpon the Kings part, for which he ſhortly loſt his owne head.

King Edward prepareth againſt the Earle of Warwicke.

Pembrooke and Stafford fall out for their Inne.

(34) The Northerne enflamed for the death of young Neuill, the next morning moſt valiantly ſet vpon the VVelſhmen, and by the force of Archers, draue them from their ground of aduantage, which Pembrooke wanting, ſupplyed with his owne proweſſe, and Richard his brother with his Pollaxe twice made way through the battell of the Northern, without any mortall or deadly wound: ſo that by their valours it was verily ſuppoſed the field had beene wonne, had not Iohn Clappam an Eſquire and ſeruant to Warwicke diſplayed his Lords Colours with his White-Beare, and from an eminent place cried a Warwicke, a VVarwicke, whereat the VVelſh were ſo terrified, as they turned and fled, leauing their Generall and his brother alone in the field, who valiantly fighting, were incompaſſed and taken, with the death of fiue thouſand of their men. The Earle with his brother Sir Richard Herbert were brought to Banbury, where with ten other Gentlemen they loſt their heads, Conyers and Clappam being their Iudges.

(35) This ſecond victory thus got, and the Northerne now fleſhed; vnder the leading of Robbin of Riddiſdale, haſted to the Kings Mannor of Grafton, where the Earle Riuers Father to the Queene then lay, whom with his Sonne Iohn, they ſodainely ſurprized, and in Northampton ſtrucke off their heads without any iudgement. The deaths of theſe Lords the King greatly lamented, and ſought to reuenge: firſt therefore writing his Commiſſions for the apprehenſion of Lord Humfrey Stafford of Southwicke (who by diligent ſearch was found at Brentmarch, and beheaded at Bridgewater, as he worthily deſerued) next hee prepared a mighty Army, and with the ſame marched towards VVarwicke, his company increaſing euer as he went.

The Earle Riuers with his ſonne Iohn ſurprized and beheaded.

Lord Stafford beheaded.

(36) King Edward ſet downe his tents at Wolney, foure miles from VVarwicke, where the Duke and the Earle of VVarwicks hoaſt lay ready for Battell, but by the mediation of friends a peace was intreated, and letters written from either parties, expreſſing the grieſes and wrongs ſuſtained, with proffers of redreſſe, in amending all, and in ſhew ſo farre it proceeded, as the King conceiuing a certaine hope of peace, reſted ſecure, not fearing any foule-play, which politique VVarwick (by his ſpiall perceiuing) thought it not wiſdome to looſe the aduantage, and thereupon in the dead of the night with a ſelected Company he entred the Kings Camp, killing them that kept the watch, tooke the King in his bed, and brought him his priſoner to his Caſtle of VVarwicke, and thence by eaſie iournyes in the night had him conuayed to Middleham Caſtle in Yorkeſhire, not farre from Richmond, where vnder the cuſtody of his Brother George Neuill Archbiſhoppe of Yorke he was retained.

(37) His vſage was Princely, and according to his eſtate, which he often acknowledged to the Archbiſhoppe with all kinde thankes, and complements of wordes, whereby hee wrought himſelfe into ſuch truſt and fauour, as hee had the Forreſts to hunt in, and the Parkes for his pleaſure, whoſe pales are well knowne, vnſufficient wals to pen the Lyon in, as appeared by this King, who being abroad and on hunting, Sir VVilliam Stanley, with Sir Thomas Burgh brought him freſh horſe, and ſuch a crew of followers, that his Keepers more feared their owne liues, then were forward to force him backe againe to priſon, and ſo let the game goe without further chaſe. King Edward thus eſcaped, VVarwicke like a wilde man furiouſly raged, but ſeeing no remedy, made vſe of neceſſity, and gaue forth that himſelfe ſo cauſed it, hauing power to make Kings, and to vnmake them againe.

(38) The King forthwith repaired to Yorke, where with great honour hee was ioyfully receiued, and abode certaine daies, which made him well hope of a further ſupply of friends and men, but fayling thereof, and fearing the Archbiſhops purſuite, with a ſmall traine he poſted to Lancaſter, where hee found the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlaine well-accompanied for his Conuey. His ſpirits then reuiued, and traine daily increaſing, with ſpeedy iourneyes hee came vnto London: where all his ſtudies and conſultations were, how to be reuenged vpon theſe diſloyall Lords, his brother, and Earle VVarwicke, and they againe fretting at the Archbiſhoppes folly ſought to make ſtronger their factions againſt the King.

diuisions, and no estate sure to enioy what was theirs, the Nobles a new began to sollicite the parties vnto a Peace, hauing first obtained liberty to post too and fro without their impeachments, and so effectually layd downe the state of the Land, whose ruines now were so eminent by these intestine warres, that the Natiues lamented, the Forrein reioyced, and God they saw highly displeased, whose sword thus giuen into their hands, was to be feared would be the destruction of the Englisli, as Nabucadnezzars of Babell was of Iudea, and indeed so effectually wrought, that the Duke and Earle vpon perfect confidence came to London, accompanyed with a small number in respect of their great danger: where falling into conference with the King, hee tasked them with disloialty, and they him with ingratitude, so that their spleenes were nothing appeased, but much more increased, and with high words departed, the King vnto Canterbury, and they againe to Warwicke.

An. D. 1470. A commotion in Lincolneshire.

(39) The stout Earle, whose stomacke must haue vent, otherwise the Caske must needs breake, caused new stirres to be raised in Lincolneshire, vnder the leading of Sir Robert Wels, an expert souldier, and sonne of the Lord Wels, who with thirty thousand Commons disturbed the Countrey, and in euery place proclaimed King Henrie; setting downe his battell not farre from Stamford, meaning to abide the encounter of his opposers; which when the King heard of, he sent for the Lord Wels his father, commanding him to write to his sonne to surcease the Warres, and so marching towards Stamford tooke Wels in his company, with a good hope that the sonne would not beare Armes against his owne father in field; but howsoeuer he had writ, or the King conceiued, Sir Robert went on in his former designes, which so sore moued Edward, that he beheaded Lord Wels with Sir Thomas Dimocke that had married his daughter, although hee had giuen them promise of safety and life.

The Lord Wels and Sir Thomas Dimocke beheaded.

(40) Young Wels then hearing of his Fathers death, sought the reuenge vpon this vntrusty Prince, and not staying for Warwicke, who was in preparing to come, set manfully vpon the King and his power, where betwixt them was performed a most bloudy fight, till at last Sir Robert was taken, with Sir Thomas Deland, and others, whereat the Lincolnshire men were so terrified, that casting off their Coates, they all ranne away, in regard whereof this battell to this day is called, the battell of Loscoat-field, wherein were slaine ten thousand men at the least: after which victory the King commanded Wels, with many other of note to be put to death, as the cheife causers of these dangerous Commotions.

(41) This vntimely conflict and vnfortunate ouer-throw, made Clarence and Warwicke, at their wits end, who vnprouided to field against Edward, gaue way to necessity, and from Dartmouth in Deuonshire embarked themselues and wiues for France, both to instigate King Lewis, no friend vnto Edward, and to secure themselues in Callis (whereof Warwicke was Captaine) till fortune had changed the hand of her play. These, crossing the Seas, cast Anchor before the Towne of Callis, and gaue notice they were ready to land, but the Lord Vawclere a Gascoigne, whom Warwicke had substituted his Deputy, discharged diuers peeces of Ordnance against them, and sent word flatly they should not come there: meane-while the Dutchesse of Clarence fell in trauell, and was there on Shippe-board deliuered of a faire Sonne, which Child the Earles deputy would scarcely suffer to be baptized in the Towne, nor without great entreaty permit two flagons of wine to be conueyed aboard to the Ladies lying in the hauen. For which his good seruice, King Edward by his letters Patents made Vawclere chiefe Captaine of Callis, and discharged the Earle, as a Traitour or Rebell against him.

(42) Charles Duke of Burgundy, being then at S. Omers, owing Earle Warwick an old grudge for gainestanding his marriage, thought now a fit time to requite the discourtesie; and therefore sent many thankes vnto Vawclere, with promise of a thousand Crownes pension by yeare, if he stood firme for his Wiues brother King Edward, himselfe laying the Coast to impeach his arriuage. But how Mounsieur Vawclere stood affected, whatsoeuer shew hee made, Comines the French kings Historian doth tel, who sent Warwicke word of the danger he stood in, of the said Duke, and of Duras the Kings Admirall, so as to land would be his finall confusion: His counsell therefore was that he should make into France, vnto whose King he should be most welcome; and as for the Town of Callis, he willed him to take no thought, but promised to make him a good reckoning thereof, when time should best serue. Whereupon the Earle wayed anchor for Normandy, and in his way tooke many rich Ships of the Duke of Burgundies Subiects, which netled him not a little, but yet found no docke to rub out the smart.

(43) King Lewis hearing of the arriuage of Warwicke, and knowing his troubles to arise for his Ambassage to Bona, and faith vnto France, sent certaine Princes to conduct him to the Castell of Amboys, where a supply was made against all necessities, and himselfe and traine most honourably intertained, whereat the Duke of Burgundy sore repined, and sent Lewis word that he disliked his doings, with threats of reuenge, if he ayded him against his wiues brother. This, notwithstanding the French king gaue all comforts to these fugitiues, and prepared his assistance for their restorations, and the raising againe of godly King Henry.

(44) Queene Margaret hauing fled England and soiourning in France with her Father Renate, (a King in name, but scarcely able to beare the State of an Earle) saw now the Iron hot, and ready to be strucke, therefore with her Sonne Prince Edward, Iohn Earle of Oxford, and Iasper Earle of Pembroke (who lately had escaped out of prison in England) came vnto Amboyse, where by meanes of the French King a combination of Alliance was confirmed betwixt the Prince of Wales, young Edward, and Anne the second daughter to the Earle of Warwicke, then present with her Mother and Sister in France. That King Henry should be againe restored, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earle tooke a solemne Oath neuer to desist whiles they had power, and in the nonage of the Prince they ioyntly were to be deputed his Protectors, and the lands sole Gouernors.

(45) Edward in England hearing what Queene Margaret, his brother Clarence, & stout Warwicke in the French Court had done, was struck into a sodaine dumpe, being as doubtfull of friends, as fearefull of foes, and therefore such as were alied to the Lancastrians, or fauorites of the down-cast K. Henry, he began somewhat roughly to deale with: many therefore that were guilty daily tooke Sanctuary, or yeelded themselues to his mercy, among whom Iohn Marquesse Montacute brother to Warwicke was one, who with fairest words of promises, was receiued into fauour, and vpon whose example many others came in, which notwithstanding meant to stand out if occasion should serue. But no busier was Edward to keepe the Crowne on his head, then these Lords in France were resolute to strike it off: in middest of whose consultations behold how it happened.

King Edward driuen into his dumps.

(46) There came from England to Callis a damsell belonging (as she said) to the Dutchesse of Clarence, who signified vnto Monsieur Vawclere that shee came from King Edward with a declaration of peace, which hee fearing to impart the conditions to other, had made her the instrument, the better to passe without any suspect, and hee glad to heare for the Earles sake (whom he entirely affected) gaue her his safe conduct vnto the Duke of Clarence then at Amboys; where hauing priuate accesse vnto him, shee told, that it was neither naturall nor honourable for him to take part against the house of Yorke; that that the houſe of Lancaſter was not onely by the whole Court of Parliament debarred to be the indubitate Heire of the Kingdome, but that King Henrie himſelfe had diſcharged his Iſſue from claime, as it ſtandeth (ſaid ſhe) vpon Record to be ſeene, contrary to which, as he might well perceiue this marriage of Prince Edward with the Earles daughter, did onely aime and intend to the vtter extinct of the Houſe of Yorke, whereof himſelfe was one, and in neere poſſibility of the Crowne, Edwards Iſſue young, and not many, and the King very wanton, a ſinne commonly puniſhed with want of poſterity, which if it ſo chanced, then hee, or his were the next. Theſe reaſons wayed, ſo ouer-wayed the Dukes further deſignes, that hee promiſed thereafter a more brother-like affection, as (ſaid hee) Edward ſhould finde; with which good newes ſhe returned into England, Warwicke vtterly ignorant what was ſaid or done.

The Duke of Clarence inclineth to his brother.

(47) All now in a readineſſe for the returne, ſhips, money and men ſupplied by the French King, the Admirall of France was ſent to ſecure them from the Duke of Burgundies Fleet, which with an extraordinary number and power lay in the mouth of Seyne, to fight with Warwicke when he ſhould looſe out of Harbour: but ſee how the Heauens fatoured, and frowned vpon the parties, for the night before they ſhould hoyſe ſaile, ſuch a ſtormy tempeſt tooke the Dukes Fleete, lying more remote from the Lee, that they were ſcattered aſunder, ſome into Scotland, ſome into Denmarke, and many of them drowned. But the Seas calmed, and the winde ſeruing faire, the Engliſh ſet ſaile and landed at Dartmouth, whence they had ſhipped into France almoſt ſixe moneths before.

(48) King Edward relying vpon Burgundy abroad, and thinking all friends who fawned at home, gaue himſelfe daily to follow the Hound and the Hawke, and nightly to his Court-pleaſures in dancings and daliances with damſels, little minding their approach that meant to marre his mirth; for Warwicke now landed, proclaimed King Henry, commanding all from ſixteene to ſixty, vpon a great penalty to take Armes againſt Edward Duke of Yorke, the moſt vniuſt vſurper of Henries rightfull Crowne, and vncredible it was, to ſee the confluence of them which came armed to him, who ere-while applauded and approued none but King Edward. Thus making towards London, his company daily encreaſed; which the youthfull King ſeemed little to regard, but verily ſuppoſing hee had now Warwicke in his trappe, wrote to Burgundy to ſecure the Seas, leſt he ſhould eſcape againe into France, and to his Lords of England, to attend him in his wars; but very many neglected his commaund, and few or none made their repaire. Which when Edward perceiued, hee was ſtrucke into a great feare, and with his brother of Gloceſter, the Lord Haſtings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Scales the Queenes brother, hee haſted towards Nottingham, there to determine what was to be done.

(50) Theſe, with the like diſtaſtures, diuulged among the rude multitude, it was a world to ſee the face of this new World, for in euery ſtreet Bonfires were made, in euery Church Bels rung, Ditties were ſung at euery meeting, & euery man cryed King Henrie, King Henrie, whoſe Eccho likewiſe redoubled, a Warwicke, a Warwicke, and indeed all ſo applauded the paſſage now on foote, as King Edward hearing the rumor, thought it not ſafe any longer to ſtay, and therefore with thoſe truſty Lords and ſome others, hee fled from his hoaſt beſides Nottingham, paſſing the Waſhes towards Lynne, with greater difficulties then was befitting a Prince to aduenture; and thus without any order taken for his Realme, in two Hulkes of Holland, and one Engliſh ſhippe, deſtitute of all neceſſary prouiſions, ſet ſaile toward Burgundy, and in the way was encountred by the Eaſterlings, Englands great Enemies, hauing much adoe to cleare himſelfe from their ſurpriſe.

(51) In theſe times of miſerie the Queene (whoſe marriage was the onely cauſe of all theſe ſtirres) vpon the firſt of October had ſtolne out of the Tower, and taken Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, where like a woman forſaken ſhee ſolitarily remained, and on the fourth of Nouember following was deliuered of a Sonne, which without all pompe, more like a priuate mans Childe then a Prince, was there alſo baptized by the name of Edward, who after his fathers death, a while was King of England, as ſhall be ſaid; other Sanctuaries were full of King Edwards friends, that prayed deuoutly for his proſperous health, and well hoped the world would againe turne, as ſhortly it did. One King thus fled, and the other in priſon, the Kentiſh, whoſe conditions are multable at the change of Princes, came to ſeeke prey in London, where they knew it was to be had: Ratcliffe, S. Katherines, and Southwarke they robbed, and within the Cittie did ſome hurt beſides, yea, and ſurely more had done, had not Earle Warwicke in good time come to the reſcue, which encreaſed his name, that was great enough before.

want of ſuch heires vnto George Duke of Clarence, and his heire-males lawfully produced, and the ſaid Duke to be the next heire to his father Richard Duke of Yorke, diſabling his elder brother Edward, by the vertue of his Atteindor; and Iaſper Earle of Pembroke, Iohn Earle of Oxford with other, attainted by the vſurper Edward, to be reſtored in bloud, dignities, and ancient poſſeſſions; and finally, Earle Warwicke the good Common-wealths man, made Gouernour of the Realme in theſe turbulent times, vnto whom was aſſociated George Duke of Clarence, this great Earles ſonne in Law, and Warwickes brother Montacute vpon his ſubmiſſion obtained his pardon, which was the eaſilier gotten for his ſeruice at Nottingham.

(54) Queene Margaret appointed to follow into England, if fortune did fauour theſe great Lords ſucceſſe, now hearing of the faire Sun-ſhine, wherein her Husband King Henry was ſet, amidſt the ſtormie winter blaſts, which the ſeaſon afforded, with Prince Edward her ſonne, ſet ſaile from France, towards that wiſhed and temperate climate, where the ſpring of new Regality beganne to bud forth, but was met with ſuch tempeſt and ſtorming ſeas, as ſhee was forced to returne, and deferre her iourney vntill another time, to her great griefe and ſore diſcontent. In like perplexity was the Burgundian Duke, who neither durſt giue Edward his outward aſſiſtance (the French and VVarwicke being ſo mighty oppoſites) nor leaue him in diſtreſſe, leſt the ſparkes of diſcontent ſhould flie from the eyes of his faire wife, and therefore to know whether Vawclere the Gouernour of Callis ſtood reſolute for him, according to Couenants, hee ſecretly ſent Philip Comines the hony-mouth Hiſtorian, to drop ſome of his ſweet eloquence into his gold-thirſting eare.

(55) Comines comming to Callis, and obſeruing the ſequence for which he was ſent, ſaw euery man weare the Earle of Warwicks badge, for no head could bee gallant that was not adorned with his ragged ſtaffe, nor no dore frequented that was not painted with his white Croſſe. Inſomuch that Vawclere himſelfe had a Iewell in his Hatte, wherein was a white ragged ſtaffe, embroidered with gold, and others his followers the like wrought in ſilke, gold, and ſiluer; and to ſtampe the print deeper, a liking report was brought to the towne, that Warwicke had prepared foure thouſand valiant men to warre vpon the frontiers of Burgundy. But Comines in conference ſo wrought with the Councell, and they againe with Earle VVarwicke, as he was contented to leaue off the enterpriſe, Duke Charles promiſing to ſide with K. Henrie.

(56) King Edward hearing what his brother of Burgundy had done, and being daily ſolicited from his friends in England, thought it no policy long to delay, leſt Henry ſhould take growth to a bigger ſteame; and therefore repairing to his brother in the towne of Saint Paul, required his ayde, as the onely man on whom hee relied, aſwell for the bond of alliance in the marriage of his ſiſter, as alſo in regard of the orders which they both ware, the King that of his, which was the golden Fleece; and the Duke the Gartar and Roabe of Saint George. In the Court of Burgundy at that time lay Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, coſen-germane remoued vnto Duke Charles, a great enemy againſt the houſe of Yorke, and now ſet himſelfe to thwart King Edwards ſuite, alleadging, that it was more honourable for the Duke of Burgundy to ſide with the Lancaſtrians, from whom he was deſcended by his Grand-mother the daughter of Iohn of Gaunt: as alſo in the vprightneſſe of King Henries title, held good in her brother, & his Grand-father, and in her Nephew his father without all exceptions.

(57) The Duke perplexed betweene theſe great ſupplicants, did then, as many doe now, ſpeake much, and meane nothing leſſe, or elſe ſay little, and meane to doe much. To Sommerſet, for Henry, he outwardly promiſed all helpe and aſſiſtance, but neuer gaue the leaſt, and to Edward no comfortable words of ſupply, and yet vnderhand hee hyred him Shippes, furniſhed him with munition, and lent him fifty thouſand Florences in money. And now the ſeaſon ſeruing for warre, King Edward with two thouſand ſtrong beſides his Mariners made ouer for England, attempting to take land in Norfolke; but thoſe coaſts guarded, hee waffed more Northward; and entring Humber, landed at Rauenſpur in Yorkeſhire, when laying aſide all claime to the Crowne, and pretending nothing but his Dutchy of Yorke, he ſhewed the rude multitude the Letters and ſeale of the Earle of Northumberland, which as he affirmed, and made them beleeue was ſent for his ſafe conduct to enioy the ſame, and in euery place where he came proclaimed King Henry himſelfe, wearing an Eſtrich Feather, which was Prince Edwards Liuery, and paſſing to Yorke in no other ſhew then a Subiect, his oath firſt taken to be true to King Henry, entred the City, which preſently hee ſurpriſed and aſſumed to himſelfe.

(58) Earle Warwicke now hearing that Edward was landed, before he had marched very farre in the maine, ſent ſtrait charge to his brother the Marqueſſe Montacute then reſiding at Pomfret (with a ſufficient Army to ſecure thoſe parts) that hee ſhould not ſuffer his acceſſe vnto Yorke, leſt he grew more potent, then was to bee wiſhed; himſelfe making ready with all poſſible ſpeed to repaire into thoſe parts; but whether the Marqueſſe purpoſely winked, or elſe (and that rather) would not ſee at all, hee made no great haſt to fore-lay his way to Yorke, neither ſought to empeach the paſſage: when Edward from thence marched in a more hoſtile manner towards Nottingham; taking his way not farre from Pomfret, and as it were through the middeſt of his enemies; which encouraged many to fauour his deſignes, holding that Montacute was either a friend, or afraide to deale againſt ſo powerfull an enemy.

Earle Warwicke writes to his brother Marqueſſe to impeach King Edwards paſſage.

(55) The White Roſe thus bloomed, and the red falling his leafe, all tooke the time of this pleaſant ſpring, and flocked to Edward as to their Aprill Sun, who now more able, and therefore more bold, made forward towards Leiceſter, where the Earles of Warwicke and Oxford with a great power were, but becauſe Clarence was abſent, they let Edward hold on without any encounter, whoſe traine as hee paſſed was like to a riuer that in the running is euer encreaſed with new ſprings, which VVarwicke perceiuing, thought it more then time to giue battell, well knowing that his brothers forbearance had giuen him that head. And to that end ſent vnto Clarence, then about London in leuying of men, but hee ſomewhat too backeward, and VVarwicke too forward, tooke into the City Couentrie, meaning from thence to ſet on the enemy. But Edward, whoſe ſtar had now paſt the darke threatning cloud, pitched his tents neere vnto that Citie in a plaine field, and valiantly bad the Earle come to battell. But hee then miſtruſting (as in truth he had cauſe) that the boldneſſe of Edward was backt by a Clarence, kept cloſe within the Wals, with a purpoſe to ſee how the world would goe.

K. Edward challengeth Earle Warwicke to fight.

(60) Edward loth to looſe time about one Cities ſiege, raiſed his Campe, and haſted forward toward VVarwicke, vnto which Towne likewiſe his brother Clarence, with foure thouſand ſtrong was on march: Theſe meeting vpon a plaine, three miles from the Towne, ſet their battels in Aray, as if they meant to haue fought, but the King, his brother Gloceſter, Lord Riuers, Haſtings, and others, without any gard made towards Clarence, which when he beheld, himſelfe accompanied with ſome of eſtate, encountred his brother with a louing countenance and friendly cheare, ſo as no ſparke of hatred was perceiued betwixt them, but with all brotherly affections entred into amity and peace, which afterwards proued the confuſion of the Duke. Clarence thus got, ſought to

K. Edward drawe-eth towards London.

K. Edward and his brother Clarence meet and are reconciled.

Clarence ſeeketh to draw Warwicke vnto K. Edward.

to draw VVarwicke into the ſame traine, to which end he ſent certaine meſſengers vnto him; firſt to excuſe his owne fact, as too vnnaturall for him to vnſheath his ſword againſt his owne brother, as alſo he ſought to ſtay the effuſion of Engliſh bloud, which in theſe quarrels lay ready to be ſhed: His peace with Edward he promiſed to worke, and that with ſuch honour as Warwicke ſhould know himſelfe not onely a father to Clarence, but likewiſe vnto Edward, great Englands King. Vnto all which motion VVarwicke gaue eare only, with this reply, Goe tell your Duke (ſaid he) that I had rather be an Earle, and alwaies like my ſelfe, then a falſe and perjured Duke, and that ere my oath ſhall be falſified (as his apparantly is) I will lay downe my life at my enemies foote; which I doubt not but ſhall be bought very deere.

The words of Warwicke in anſwere to Clarence.

K. Edward marcheth forward.

(61) This ſtout reſolution made Edward more warie, and therefore to obtaine London, the only key that opened the doore to the Crowne, he haſted thitherward, whoſe Citizens hearing of the increaſe of his hoſt, and waying that Henrie was but a milke-ſop to him, thought it moſt ſafety to ſayle with the faireſt winde, and therefore ſet open their Gates, and with publique applaud cryed, King Edward. Which when the Duke of Sommerſet with others, left to attend the innocent King Henry, heard, they fled for their liues; and left him in the Biſhops Palace at London, where his Competitor King Edward tooke him, and ſent him againe priſoner to the Tower. With ſo many windes are the ſailes of their ſhips filled, which ſeeke the Port of their ſafety by the affections of the people: for euen the ſame day had Henrie beene carryed through the Citie (as it were) in triumph, and had heard the ſhouts of the Commons in euery ſtreete crying; God ſaue King Henrie.

London receiueth King Edward.

K. Henry againe taken, and ſent to the Tower of London.

(62) But Earle VVarwicke hearing how things went in London, and now fully conceiuing that the hazard of Battell muſt determine either with, or againſt him, being come to Saint Albans, fell into a deepe conſideration what was to be done: His aſſiſtants were Iohn Duke of Exceſter, the Earles of Oxford and Sommerſet, and Marqueſſe Montacute his Brother, whom notwithſtanding he did not greatly truſt, being alwaies too-fauourable to the contrary Faction. Theſe in Counſell held it beſt pollicie to follow the Enemie, and before the body grew too-great, to lop off the branches, leſt they ſhould ſhaddow their Sun-ſhine too farre. In which reſolution, they haſted forward, and came vnto Barnet, with a full purpoſe to recouer London: but Edward well knowing the ſtate of the City vnfurniſhed for ſiege, and ready to take ſtampe of any impreſſe, meant not to be pent within thoſe weake wals; and therefore taking with him vnfortunate Henry, leſt any confederacy ſhould be made in his abſence, he marched with all poſſible haſt, to encounter his oppoſites, before they came too-farre, and vpon Gladmore neere vnto Barnet ſet downe his Tents cloſe to the enemy, the eue of Chriſts reſurrection, ſo careleſſe is Mars of diuine celebrations, that the holieſt Feaſt is prophaned, when his Sword is drawne.

Earle Warwicke commeth to S. Albans.

K. Edward carrieth King Henry with him to battell.

(63) The next day being the Paſchall whereon Chriſt roſe from death, which with due reuerence is celebrated in all the Chriſtian World, theſe Engliſh contenders for a terreſtriall Crowne, with Irefull hearts and hands as ready, made ready to digge each others graues: for at breake of day Warwicke began to Marſhall his Army, which he diuided into three Battalions: The right Wing was led by the Marqueſſe his brother, with the Earle of Oxford, conſiſting chiefly of Horſe-men, himſelfe with the Duke of Exceſter led the left; and the maine battell was commanded by Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, which was ſupplied for the moſt part with Archers. K. Edward likewiſe ordered his men. The fore-ward was led by Richard Duke of Glouceſter his brother, a good ſouldier and ſufficient for aduiſe, the middle by himſelfe, and his brother Clarence, hauing King Henry in their company; And the Rere-ward was commanded by the Lord Haſtings, euer moſt firme for the Houſe of Yorke, reſeruing a freſh ſupply, when occaſion ſhould ſerue.

The ordering of the battels.

(64) The Battels joyned, were manfully maintayned by the proweſſe of Oxford, vpon that part of the Kings, againſt which he fought, which with great violence he forced backe, ſo that many of them fled to London, bringing newes that with Warwicke went the day: and ſurely in great forwardneſſe it was, had not fortune thwarted it by an vnexpected chance: for the day being foggy, and ouer-caſt with Miſts, hindred their eyes of any farre ſight, ſo as the ſtarres embroidered vpon the Earle of Oxfords mens Coats, were miſtaken for the Sunne, which King Edwards men wore, in which errour Warwickes Battell let flie at their owne fellowes, who were in great forwardneſſe to haue wonne the day, and they not knowing the cauſe of the error cried, treaſon, treaſon, we are all betraid. Whereupon the Earle of Oxford with eight hundred fled the Field, leauing the chance to be caſt for the Crowne; which when Warwicke perceiued, with words like a Souldier, he incouraged his men, and ſeeing the freſh ſupply of his enemy draw now vnto fight, he furiouſly ruſhed into the midſt of their Battell, wherein he aduentured ſo far as he could not be reſcued, but valiantly fighting was ſtrucke downe, and among them ſlaine, hauing re-paid his danger with many a wound. The Marqueſſe Montacute made forward to ſecond his Brother, (who till then had beene the Mars and Make-King of England) but was ſo ouer-laid by his oppoſites, that they ſent his Soule likewiſe from his body, whereby was ended that bloudy daies taske.

(67) Edwards affaires thus farre proſper ed t London, the windes that had croſſed Queene Margaret before, came fauourably about to fill her Sailes for England, & indeed to accompliſh the decree, which Heauen had appointed: ſhe with her ſonne Prince Edward and their French followers landed vpon Eaſter-eue at Weymouth, and the Counteſſe of Warwick at Porteſmouth, who hearing the ſorrowfull newes of her Husbands death, tooke Sanctuary within the Abbey of Beaulieu. And Queene Margaret vnderſtanding of the loſſe of Barnet-field, with-drew aſide to the Abbey of Ceerne, vnto whom preſently reſorted Edmund Duke of Sommerſet, with Lord Iohn his Brother; Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire, Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, Iohn Lord Wenlock, and Iohn Longſtrother Prior of Saint Iohns.

Queene Margaret, with Prince Edward, landed at Weymouth.

The Lords comfort Queene Margaret.

(68) Theſe, with many words of hope, comforted the ſorrowfull Queene, and proffered her their aſſiſtance assistance to erect Prince Edward her sonne, though it were done with the losse of their owne liues, requiring her onely to vndertake the authority of the war, and themselues would vndergoe the charge and burthen thereof, by whose valour and power, they doubted not to daunt the pride of the vsurping Edward; who now held himselfe sure, and began to grow careless. To these their resolutions the warlike Queene most gladly consented, and gaue all encouragements vnto them she could; when falling in counsell how to proceede, her care (according to the naturall affection of a Mother) was most vpon the safetie and life of her sonne: and therefore aswell for their owne parts (if fortune should faile in this their first attempt) as for the feare which the Yorkist would possesse (who whiles Prince Edward his corriuall liued, could not account the Diademe his Bride) shee thought it best to send him backe againe into France, till GOD had set the Crowne where it should stand: whence he might supply them with new forces, or at least-wise ouer-awe Edward for tyrannizing too farre. But the Lords contrary-wise alledged, that Prince Edward being the morning-Sunne of the Lancastrians hopes, and the rayes very splendent to most English eyes, was to be present in field himselfe, whose sight would both heat the courage of his own Souldiers, and attract the glance of his aduersaries hearts, eyther to fight faintly, or else, and that rather, to come to his side. Thus their counsell at that time preuailed; and thus resolued, euery man departed to make ready his power, the Queene with her French repayring to Bathe.

Queene Margarets care for Prince Edward her sonne.

The opinions of the Lords.

(69) But Edward in London had not sat two daies in rest, before he heard of Queene Margarets arriuage, and the confluence of people out of Cornewall, Deuonshire, and of the Westerne parts, which hourely flew to giue her assistance; wherefore committing to the Tower King Henry, and George Archbishop of Yorke, with a selected company, he marched to meet them, intending to cut off many springs before they should joyne to the body of a Riuer, whose streame without danger could not be passed: therefore from Windsor, Abington, Chichester, and Malmesbury he proceeded; seeking and vrging his enemies to battel: but the Queene and her forces fearing to abide in Bathe, remoued to Bristow, Berkeley, and Gloucester, & lastly at Tewkesbury, Duke Sommerset, her Generall, pitched downe his Tents, not staying the comming of the Earle of Pembroke: his battell he marshalled into three fights, whereof himselfe and his brother Iohn Lord Sommerset lead the foreward; the middle Battalion was commanded by Edward the young Prince, vnder the conduct of the Lords Saint Iohn and Wenlocke, and the Rereward gouerned by Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, a mortall enemy against the house of Yorke.

The ordering of Queene Margarets battels.

(70) King Edward, who was come now within sight of his enemies, diuided likewise his Army into 3. Battalions, committing the Foreward vnto the guidance of his Brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, a good Souldier, and of a deepe reach and pollicy: the Main he vndertooke to gouerne himselfe, and the Rereward was commanded by the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine. The field thus marshalled, and the signe of battell being giuen, a most bloudy fight began, the King had planted his Ordnance at most aduantage, which Gloucester frankly bestowed among the Dukes men, and they lodged betwixt ditches, bushes, and hedges, with their showers of arrowes galled Gloucesters followers, so as by his command his battell gaue backe, as though they would shrinke, which Sommerset no sooner perceiued, but that he came on, and ouercome with courage, came out of his strength, when by a certaine passage before-hand prouided, he came vnto the place where King Edward was embattelled, thinking verily that Wenlocke had followed at his backe, who as it seemed meant nothing lesse.

The ordering of King Edwards battels.

The battell at Tewkesburie.

(71) The aduantage espied, Duke Richard made good his retreat, and with fresh supplies of two hundred spears so charged Sommerset, as his battell was disordered, and put to fearefull flight, himselfe recouering the Middle-ward, found there the L. Wenlocke idle, whilest others were thus working for their liues, whom he most opprobriously reuiled in the termes of a Traitor, & with his battell-axe stroke his braines out of his head; when presently Gloucester, and after him the King entred the Trench, wherein all of the Queenes part went to wracke; for there were slaine in this battell on her side, Iohn L. Sommerset, Iohn Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, the Lord Wenlocke in manner as we haue said, Sir Iohn Delues, Sir Edward Hampden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir Iohn Lewkener, with three thousand others besides.

This battell was fought vpon Saturday the 4. of May, the 11. of King Edwards raigne, and yeare of Christ, 1471.

L. Wenlocke slaine for not following Sommerset.

Lords slaine at Tewkesbury.

(72) Among them that fled, Prince Edward was one, whom Sir Richard Crofts apprehended before he got to Tewkesbury, but Edmund Duke of Sommerset, Iohn Longstrother, Prior of Saint Iohns, many Knights and Esquiers tooke Sanctuary in the Abbey, and other places of the towne, notwithstanding they were taken forth and arraigned before Richard Duke of Gloucester, who that day sat Constable of England, where they were condemned, & had iudgement of death, which they immediately suffered vpon a Scaffold set vp in the Towne. With these two Lords died twelue worthy Knights, besides others of inferiour degrees.

Prince Edward apprehended.

The Duke of Sommerset and others executed.

(73) Then was Proclamation made for the apprehension of Prince Edward, promising to his taker an annuity of an hundred pounds during his life, and if the Prince were liuing, his life to be spared: vpon which promises Sir Richard Crofts presented young Edward vnto the King, whom with a sterne countenance he a-while beheld, and as sternely demanded, how he durst so presumptuously with Banner displayed enter into his realme; whereunto the Prince made this reply; to recouer (said he) my Fathers Kingdomes and his most rightfull inheritance, possessed by his Father and Grand-father, and from him immediately belonging vnto mee; how darest thou then which art his subject, display thy colour against him thy Liege-Lord? which answere moued King Edward so much, as with his Gantlet he dashed the Prince on his mouth, whom Richard Duke of Gloucester with others of the Kings seruants most shamefully murthered, euen in his presence, and at his feet: whose body was buried without all solemnity among other poore and meane persons, in the Church of the Monastery of the Blacke-Fryers in Tewkesburie.

Prince Edward apprehended, and his answers.

Prince Edward most shamefully slaine.

(74) Queene Margaret in this fatall day of battell fled towards Worcester, and by the way tooke into a poore Religious House in that her present distresse: but three dayes after shee was apprehended and brought vnto Worcester to King Edward, who committed her to sure and strait keeping, in which City she a while remained. But sodain news brought him, that the Northern-men were in Armes, and meant to aduenture for her liberty, the Conquerour marched to Couentrie, and there made preparation further to proceed: which when these hot spirits perfectly vnderstood, their courages grew colder, and their weapons cast away, they came thronging to Edward to offer him subjection; yet the Lancastrians were not so minded, but rather intended once more to try whether fortune would afford them her smile.

Queene Margaret taken out of her Sanctuary.

The Northerne men submit vnto King Edward.

(75) A fit instrument they had to forward the enterprise, namely Thomas Neuil, bastard Fawconbridge, Son of L. Fawconbridge Earle of Kent, a great supporter of King Edwards Crowne: howbeit this Bastard being a man of a turbulent spirit, and forward for action, Earle Warwicke had made him his Admirall to keepe the narrow Seas, that none should haue way to strengthen King Edward, which his office he executed beyond his Commission, and became a taker of all Merchants goods, being ayded with 300. (76) His enterpriſe deſperate, and his name growne fearefull at Sea, he meant to make it no leſſe on the Land; for putting in at Douer, many miſgouerned and looſe perſons daily drew to him, ſo as his power grew to be ſeauenteene-thouſand ſtrong: with theſe through Kent he made his way towards London, meaning to doe much, the land ſo moleſted with inteſtine warres; and lodging his hoaſt on the South-ſide of London, commanded the Citizens to giue him acceſſe, that with King Henry, (whom he meant to releaſe from the Tower) he might paſſe through their ſtreetes, to meete and encounter the vſurping Edward. But the Londoners knowing the rudeneſſe of theſe Rake-hels, kept their gates ſhut, & guarded the ſame with ſufficient ſtrengths: whence ſome Lords of the royall-bloud therein reſiding, ſent vnto Edward of their preſent danger, who preſently ſent them fifteene hundred of his beſt Souldiers, after whom in perſon he warily marched, leading with him his priſoner Queene Margaret, whoſe bounds he well knew, gaue him the full ſcope of liberty.

The Citizens withſtood his entrance.

(77) Fawconbridge in the mean-while thirſting after ſpoyle with his Ships, ſecured the Thameſis aboue S^t. Katherines, purpoſing with his land-forces to paſſe the Riuer at Kingſton: but hearing that Edward was on his March, and fearing to be cut off from the benefit of his Ships, he altered his minde; when to open his way into London, he cauſed the Bridge to be fiered, and three thouſand of his men being ſet ouer Thameſis by his Ships, diuided themſelues into two Companies, the one aſſaying to enter at Algate, and the other at Biſhops-gate, both which they likewiſe ſet on fire, ſo that the Citie was in three places fired and aſſaulted at once, but with ſuch euill ſucceſſe to the aſſailants, that ſeauen-hundred were ſlaine, and the bold Baſtard driuen to his Ships.

Fawconbridge forced backe to his ſhips.

(78) Vpon the twentieth of May, the Conqueror Edward, with his captiue Queene Margaret, entred London, and ſo into the Tower, the one in pompe commanding the place at his pleaſure, the other in teares to remaine a moſt penſiue priſoner, where her husband, the down-caſt King Henry was kept in hard durance. The place being thus charged with the preſence of two Kings and their Queenes: the Crooke-backe of Gloceſter intended to cleare by taking him away that ſtood in his Brothers way, whoſe Succeſſor as is thought he then meant to be; and making his inward minde more deformed then were his outward Lineaments, without regard of bloud-defiled hands, ſtabbed the moſt innocent Henry to the heart with his Dagger, in which act at once began the ones happy reſt, and the others foule guilt, which accompanied his conſcience to the day of his death.

King Henry murthered in the Tower by Richard Duke of Gloceſter.

(79) The body of this murthered King was vpon the Aſcention-Eue layde in an open Coffin, and from the Tower guarded with many bils and glaues, was ſo carried through the ſtreetes vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where it reſted vncouered one day, and began to bleed againe afreſh, a ſorrowfull ſpectacle to moſt of the beholders, and thence was it carryed to the Blacke-Fryers Church, where it likewiſe lay bare-faced, and bled as before, all men being amazed at the ſorrowfull ſight; and laſtly, it was put into a Boat without Prieſt, Clarke, Torch, or Taper, ſinging or ſaying, and was ferried vnto the Abbey of Chertſey in Surrey, and there without pompe interred: But afterwards King Henry the ſeauenth tranſlated his body vnto his Caſtle of Windſor, where in a new Tombe at the entrance into the Chancell of the Chappell, and South-doore of the Quier, it was princely beſtowed, but ſince the Tombe is remoued, and where the Corps is now laide is not vulgarly knowne.

(80) Thus liued and thus died this innocent and juſt King, who had beene proclaimed in his Cradle, crowned in his Infancy, and againe at more age had the Emperiall Diademe of France ſet on his head, liuing vprightly, louing his Subjects, and raigning thirty eight yeares, was in that time toſſed with variable ſucceſſe, for twice he was impriſoned and depriued of his Crowne, betrayed, ſmitten, and wounded, and in all things became a worthy example of fortunes vnconſtancy. He was of ſtature very ſeemely, of body ſlender, of face beautifull, and by a naturall inclination abhorred all vice, farre from pride, giuen to prayer, well read in the Scriptures, vſing workes of Charity, and ſo chaſte, as no ſuſpition of incontinency could be conceyued in him: nay, ſo farre to the contrary, that when certaine Ladies preſented themſelues before him in a Maske, with their Haire looſe, and their Breaſts vncouered (he then a Bachelour, and able of marriage) hee immediatly roſe vp, and departed the preſence, ſaying; Fie, fie, forſooth yee are too blame. Oath he vſed none, but in weighty matters, his affirmation was forſooth, and forſooth; very mercifull to the poore, and ſo pittifull to Malefactors, as he commanded the quarters of Traitors to be taken downe from the Gates, and buried, and ſo farre from reuenge, that he willingly pardoned the greateſt offences againſt him; for a Ruffian intending his death, wounded him in the ſide with his Sword, what time he lay priſoner in the Tower, and being reſtored to his kingly eſtate, he freely forgaue the fact; and another like Ruffian ſtriking him on the face, he puniſhed with this only reprehenſion; Forſooth you are to blame to ſtrike me your annointed King: for theſe and his other patient vertues, King Henry the 7. aſſayed to haue him canonized a Saint, but Pope Iulius the 2. demanding too-great a ſumme, the King went no further in the ſuite: notwithſtanding, in the repute of the vulgar he was taken for no leſſe, ſo as his red Hat which he had worne, healed the head-ach, when it was put on, as the ſimple beleeued.

(84) In which times of feare, Iaſper Earle of Pembrooke, with his Nephew young Henry Earle of Richmond, fled into Britaine, where, of that Duke they were moſt courteouſly entertayned, with aſſurance made, that no wrong ſhould be offred them, during their ſtay in his dominions. The Storie of Iohn Earle of Oxford.

(85) But Iohn Earle of Oxford, who had withdrawne himſelfe from Barnet-field firſt into VVales, and thence into France, was farre more vnpatient of thoſe rough times, for hauing gotten ſtore of prouiſion by ſtrong hand at Sea, with ſeauenty-ſeauen men onely ſurprized Saint Michaels-Mount in Cornewall, and made that peece good againſt the King, which he kept and re-uictualled, but whether by force or fauour King Edward much ſuſpected, and therefore the more willingly came to a compoſition with his Subject, who vpon the pardon of his life deliuered the Mount to the King: and as ſome ſay the rather, for that his minde was then troubled with many ominous ſignes. For certaine Boornes about this time burſt out of the Earth, as Woe-mere at Market in the County of Bedford, whoſe name carried the quality of his nature. In Kent, at Canterburie, Leuiſham, and Langley-Parke, at Croyden in Surrey, and at Hungeruill neere Dudley-Caſtle one running very foule: all of them predictions, as that credulous age beleeued, of great troubles to come: and therefore not truſtiug a new reconciled enemy, King Edward ſent the ſaid Earle Priſoner vnto the Caſtle of Hames in Normandy, where he remained the ſpace of twelue yeares, vnto the laſt of King Richard the third, moſt ſecurely guarded, and ſo ſtraitly kept, as Ladie Margaret his Counteſſe could not be ſuffered to haue acceſſe vnto him, in all that time. Neither was ſhee allowed any thing out of his reuenewes, or from the King, to maintaine her eſtate, but was forced to liue vpon the Charity of others, and by the workes that ſhe made with her Needle; both of them very ſhort to ſupply her great wants. This vnmercifull and almoſt vnhumane vſage, was the more extreamely followed, for that Oxford himſelfe, his father and brother, had euer ſided with the Lancaſtrians. And her ſelfe being ſiſter vnto Richard Earle of VVarwicke, the Capitall obſtacle againſt King Edwards proceedings, was held either dangerous, if her wealth ballanced her birth and eſtate, or elſe vnworthy of his fauour, whoſe good fortunes as was ſuggeſted, ſhe euer maligned.

The Story of Lord Henry Holland Duke of Exceſter.

(86) But much more miſerable was the eſtate of Lord Henry Holland, Duke of Exceſter, and Earle of Huntington, who flouriſhed ſo long as King Henries pillar ſtood crowned on his baſe, and the Lancaſtrians (of whoſe Houſe himſelfe was) ouer-ſwaide the times; he being the ſonne of Lady Elizabeth, the ſecond daughter of Iohn of Gaunt, and hauing married the ſiſter of Edward the then raigning King, was notwithſtanding driuen to ſuch want, as he may ſerue an example to all, how vncertaine Adams ſons are of any continuing greatneſſe. For (ſaith Philip Comines) I once ſaw the Duke of Exceſter runne on foot bare-legged, after the Duke of Burgundies traine, begging his bread for Gods ſake, but he vttered not his name, he being the neereſt of the houſe of Lancaſter, and brother in law vnto King Edward, and being knowne what he was, Burgundy gaue him a ſmall penſion to maintaine his eſtate.

Phil. Comines, lib. 3. cap. 4.

(87) But when King Henry was againe reſtored, and the Title of the Crowne laid vpon the ſucceſſe of Barnet-field, this man, Lord Henry, bare himſelfe moſt brauely againſt King Edward, and in fight was ſtruck downe, and left for dead, where, in his bleeding wounds he lay moſt part of the day, but yet recouering, and got to Weſtminſter, he there took Sanctuary to ſaue his life, for which, he became Suiter vnto the King; but his wife, Lady Anne, ſiſter vnto King Edward, ſued as earneſtly for a diuorce, which with great inſtancy ſhe laſtly obtained againſt him. How he releaſed himſelfe from the wrath of the King, is vncertaine, and how he came by his death no man can tell, for his body was found caſt vpon the ſhoare of Kent, as though he had periſhed by ſhipwracke vpon the Sea.

(88) Now Edward, to finiſh all factions, thought beſt to lop off both bough and branch, that gaue any ſhadow to the Lancaſtrians deſignes, to which end he rather picked, then found occaſion of treaſon, in George Neuill Archbiſhop of Yorke, whoſe goods, lands, and Lordſhips, he ſeized vpon, got poſſeſſion of his rich Plate and Iewels, whereof one in his Miter was of ſuch valew, as the King cauſed it to be ſet in his Imperiall Crowne, and the Archbiſhop to be ſent ouer Sea to the Caſtle of Hames, where he remained a Priſoner a long time after, with no ſuch curteous intertainement as himſelfe had vſed to Edward when he was his Priſoner.

The Archbiſhop of Yorkes goods ſeized vpon.

(89) But the eſcape of Pembrooke and of Earle Richmond troubled the King not a little, the onely men now left to bandy againſt him, and therefore were moſt followed with a ſuſpitious eye. Inſomuch as Edward wrote vnto the Duke of Britaine their receiuer, with promiſes of heapes of gold to haue them ſent backe and deliuered vnto his hands: but the Duke that had giuen them his ſafetie before, anſwered the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, that it ſtood not with honour, ſo to betray theſe diſtreſſed Princes, fled to him for reliefe, yet, he faithfully vndertook, that they ſhould be ſo followed, as King Edward ſhould ſleepe quiet from their moleſtations, which being no better, Edward notwithſtanding made the beſt of it.

K. Edward ſends into Britaine to recouer Richmond and Pembrooke.

(90) All now in quiet, and Edward raigning without any Competitor, or malignant diſturber, cauſed a high Court of Parliament to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter, wherein he re-eſtabliſhed thoſe Acts, which Henry had abrogated, and abrogated thoſe that were made againſt his Fauourites; at which ſeaſon the Duke of Burgundy ſent his Ambaſſadors vnto Edward, crauing his ayde againſt the French King, which was the more willingly heard and granted, as well for his fauors receiued of the Duke, in time of his neceſſitie, as for ſpleene againſt Lewis, who had aided Warwick to diſpoſſeſſe him of his Crown. And indeede this was a ſparke, that was likely to ſet the hearts of the Engliſh on fire to recouer France, loſt by Henry the laſt King.

Burgundie ſends for ayde into England againſt France.

An.D.1474.

(91) All things in a readineſſe, King Edward repayred to Douer, and there embarked himſelfe for Callis, with the greateſt Army that euer from England ſet ſailes into France: for he had in his Company fifteen-hundred Noble-men, and men at Armes, all of them mounted, and moſt of them barbed, who with the Archers on horſe-backe alſo, made vp the number of fifteene thouſand, beſides a great number of foot-men and others to pitch Tents, to attend the Artillerie, and incloſe their Campes. Before the Kings departure from England, he had ſent Gartar King at Armes vnto King Lewis with a letter of defiance: whoſe contents demanded no leſſe, then the whole Realme of France, which if he refuſed, hee threatned to inuade his Dominions with fire and ſword.

(92) The Letter receiued, and read in ſecret by Lewis himſelfe, he priuately ſent for, and conferred with with the Herald, telling him that it was not Edward, but Burgundy that raked abroad these dying sinders, who as a man discomfited and vnfurnished for warre, would draw in the English, by his slie dealings, to their inestimable Charges, to supply his defects; that Burgundie being of the House of Lancaster, hated most deadly the Family of Yorke; and more for feare then loue married Edwards sister. As touching the Constable he told him, though Edward had married his Neece, yet he would deceiue him, as he had done his owne Master of France, who had heaped many and extraordinary benefits vpon him. And lastly with the gift of three hundred Crownes, and the promise of a thousand more, he instigated the Herald to worke a peace. Gartar very thankefully tooke the French Gold, and counselled Lewis to send a Herald vnto his Master King Edward to demand a safe-conduct for conference: and so openly rewarded with thirtie Elles of Crimson-Veluet he departed.

K. Lewis moueth Gartar to be a meanes for peace.

(93) King Lewis nothing so pompous as other Princes are, nor attended with Heralds continually in his Court, was therefore inforced vnto this present shift: he caused a seruant of the Lord Hales to be arrayed like an Herald in a trumpets banner, and sent him in haste into King Edwards Campe; where hauing audience, he shewed the great desire the King his Master had of peace, whose amity with England he had euer held, excusing his receit of VVarwicke with the necessity of time, whom he aided not against Edward, but against Burgundy, who as he instantly alledged, had now drawn the English to this excessiue charges, that he might thereby conclude a better composition for himselfe, and to amend the broken state of his owne affaires; lastly, he desired that the King of England would grant a safe-conduct vnto the Ambassadors of the French King his Master, who should more fully informe his Majestie, and giue his safe-conduct for a further conference in these affaires: and so wisely this counterfeit worded his message, that the King and Nobles liked well the ouerture, and thereupon granting a safe-conduct sent with him an English Herald, to receiue the like and other assignements from the French King.

(94) But when the Duke of Burgundy vnderstood that a peace was trauersed betwixt Edward & Lewis, he stormed not a little, and with no small haste from Luxemburgh, accompanied with sixteen horse only, came to his brother King Edward, and in a great rage reproued him of breach of promise, and vncourteous requitall of his former kindnesse, that thus would enter amity with his great foe, and in outward semblance more ready to bite then to barke, burst into these reproofes.

The Duke of Burgundy commeth to the King.

Edw. Hall fol. 231.

"Haue you (quoth hee) Brother, passed the "Seas, entred France, and without killing of a poore "flie, or burning of a silly Sheepe-coate taken a shame- "full truce? Oh S. George! Did Edward your noble "Ancestor euer make Army into France, and retur- "ned without Battell or Conquest? That victori- "ous Prince King Henry the fifth (as neere of kinne "vnto you as mee) whose bloud you haue eyther "rightfully or wrongfully (God knoweth) extin- "guished and destroyed, with a small puissance con- "quered Normandy, kept it, and neuer would come "to composition, till he had the whole Kingdome of "France offred him, and was made heire apparant "vnto that Crowne. Contrariwise, you without a- "ny thing done, proffer of Battell, or gaine of honor, "haue now condiscended vnto a peace as profitable "for England as is a poore Peascod: haue I (thinke "you) for my particular vse drawne the English for- "ces into France (which am able of my selfe to de- "fend mine owne cause?) I tell you plainly no; but "rather to aid you, to recouer your ancient Territo- "ries wrongfully withholden: and that you shal wel "know I need not your aide, I will heare of no truce "with the French, till three moneths after your "arriuage in England at the least; And thereupon "furiously arising, he threw downe the Chaire, "wherein he had sat, and offred to depart.

Burgundies hot speech vnto King Edward.

(95) "Nay stay Brother Charles (quoth King "Edward) sith I with patience haue heard you speake "what you would, you shall now perforce heare "from me what you would not: First therefore for "my thus entrance into France, no man knoweth the "occasion better then your selfe: for, mauger your "owne great power you speake of, you doe remem- "ber I know, how the French King tooke from you "the faire Towne Amiens, and the strong Pile Saint "Quintins, with diuers other peeces which you nei- "ther durst, nor were able eyther to rescue or defend, "since which time he hath gotten from you, your best "bosome friends, and secret Counsellors, so as your "selfe stood in doubt (determining to besiege Nusse) "whether the losse would be greater in your absence "(the French King waiting as a Fox for his pray) or "gaine more in Germany by your power and pre- "sence: and to keepe this Wolfe from your Fold, "was the principall cause why you so earnestly prai- "ed me, and continually sollicited me to passe ouer "the Seas, promising mountaines, but performing "not a Mole-hill, bragging a supply both of horse "and foote, but neuer sent me a hoofe, nor a Lackie. "Thinke you (Brother) if we had entred this enter- "prize in our owne quarrell, we would haue expe- "cted your ayde? I assure you nothing lesse; for if "we had intended any such Conquest, we would "with Souldiers, fire, and sword, haue so infected the "ayre with the flames and slaine of France, as should "haue annoyed your Countreyes of Flaunders and "Brabant, and giuen you leasure to sit still and tell of "our euer-atchieued great victories, nothing doubt- "ing but to haue gotten and kept with like man- "hood, and in as great glory, as any of our Ance- "stors before vs had done. But the occasion of "warre being yours, and you wilfully (I will not say "cowardly) neglecting the same, I meane not to pro- "secute, for the French King neuer offended me nor "my Subjects, except in fauouring Warwicke against "me, nay I may say against you; and now offreth "such honourable ouertures of peace, which I by "Gods grace meane not to forsake, but will obserue "and keepe. God send you joy thereof, quoth "the Duke, and so abruptly departed from the "King.

(96) The peace thus resolued vpon, betwixt the two Kings of England and France, the place appoynted for conference was neere vnto Amiens, and the parties assigned for the French, were the Bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France, the Lord S. Pierre, and the Bishop of Eureux. For the English, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, & Doctor Morton Lord Chancellor of England. These meeting, presently fell to a conclusion of peace: the conditions whereof were: That the French King should forthwith pay to the King of England seauenty two thousand Crownes. That the Daulphin should marry Lady Elizabeth, King Edwards eldest daughter, and that she should haue for her maintenance the Dutchy of Guienne, or else fiftie thousand Crownes yearely to be paid in the Tower of London, for nine yeres space. This peace was so acceptable to King Lewis, as he sent sixteen thousand Crownes to be distributed amongst the English Souldiers, with Plate and great Presents to men of any sort: and indeed gaue them such entertainment in Amiens as was most bounteous, whereof if any desire further to know, let him read Comines vpon the same text.
